CONGRESSIONAL RECORD AND APPENDIX.

FORTY-THIRD CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

PART V.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

[From May 19, 1874, to June 15, 1874.]

Fort Reynolds, in Colorado Territory, and the Government buildings thereon, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, asking that bounties be granted to the surviving soldiers of the Mexican war, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions; which was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2798) for the relief of John J. Hayden, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2412) for the relief of Sheridan O. Bremner, late a private of Company E, Eighteenth Regiment Wisconsin Infantry, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2893) for the relief of F. O. Wyse, late a lieutenant-colonel, &c., reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 311) for the relief of William J. McIntyre, reported it without amendment.

ALEXANDER HENDERSON.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the petition of Alexander Henderson, praying for a balance of salary due him as consul at Londonderry, Ireland, have instructed me to report a bill (S. No. 828) for the relief of Alexander Henderson, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the bill was read three times and passed. It provides for the payment to Alexander Henderson of $234.71 for balance of salary due him as consul at Londonderry, Ireland.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FLANAGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 829) for the relief of Henry Warren, of Texas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WRIGHT (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 830) to regulate the interchange of traffic between connecting railroads in the Territories of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McCREERY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 831) for the relief of Colonel D. R. Haggard, of Kentucky; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KELLY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 832) providing for the adjudication and issue of patents in mission-land cases in the State of Oregon and the Territories of Washington, Idaho, and Montana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. WRIGHT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 9) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of both Houses concurring,) That the following be proposed and submitted to the States for adoption as a further amendment or article to the Constitution of the United States:

ARTICLE XVI.

SEC. 1. All claims and demands against the United States shall be presented or prosecuted within ten years at least next after they accrue or arise, and not after. And it shall not be competent for Congress or any Department of the Government, judicial or otherwise, to allow any claim or demand presented after that date.

SEC. 2. Congress shall have power, and it shall be its duty, to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

The joint resolution was read twice; and ordered to be printed, and lie on the table.

R. M. HARVEY.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I desire that House bill No. 2332, for the relief of S. D. Hicks, administrator of R. M. Harvey, be stricken from the Calendar. It was reported adversely by the Committee on Claims and put on the Calendar at my request. It is rather a singular case. It is a bill for the relief of S. D. Hicks, administrator of R. M. Harvey. The memorial was sent to me, and I presented it without knowing anything of the facts; and it now turns out that R. M. Harvey was not dead, but was living and is here in the city. I move the indefinite postponement of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT SINE DIE.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by me yesterday morning.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, directed to adjourn their respective Houses without day on the 22d day of June, A. D. 1874, at twelve o'clock noon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate agree to the resolution?

The resolution was agreed to.

OCCUPYING CLAIMANTS.

Mr. WRIGHT. The morning business being over, I ask the consent of the Senate to call up a bill which was reached on the Calendar a few mornings since, and to which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] made objection; but those objections have been withdrawn. I refer to the bill (H. R. No. 2078) for the benefit of occupying claimants. It has passed the House at this session and been reported by the Judiciary Committee. It actually passed both Houses at the last Congress; and it is important that it should be acted upon soon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none, and it is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAGER. I gave notice that I would call up a bill this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill indicated by the Senator from Iowa is now before the Senate.

Mr. HAGER. I think I ought to have an opportunity to call up the bill of which I gave notice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair cannot act on a notice. The Senator from Iowa first made his motion, and no objection was made.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest to the Senator from California that this bill will not take five minutes.

The Committee on the Judiciary proposed to amend the bill in line 6, by inserting after the word "entitled" the words "in the Federal courts."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 10, to strike out the words "emanated from" and insert "been granted by."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, provides that when an occupant of land, having color of title, in good faith has made valuable improvements thereon, and is in the proper action found not to be the rightful owner thereof, such occupant shall be entitled in the Federal courts to all the rights and remedies, and, upon instituting the proper proceedings, such relief as may be given or secured to him by the statutes of the State or Territory where the land lies, although the title of the plaintiff in the action may have been granted by the United States after the improvements were so made.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. BOREMAN. I should like to have that bill explained. I do not understand it.

Mr. WRIGHT. I will state the object of the bill very briefly, for I trust it will be passed without taking up any time. It has occurred in the Federal courts that some question has been raised as to whether the occupying-claimants' laws of the several States apply in cases tried in the Federal courts as in the State courts; and inasmuch as many actions are brought by non-residents, and thus the question arises in the Federal courts, the object of this bill is to apply the occupying-claimants' laws, or what are known as the betterment laws, in the several States to cases tried in the Federal courts as in the State courts. That is the substance of the bill. It has passed both Houses of Congress heretofore.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 3415) to provide for the care and custody of persons convicted in the courts of the United States who have or may become insane while imprisoned;

A bill (H. R. No. 2738) for the relief of the Foundry Methodist Episcopal church, of Washington City;

A bill (H. R. No. 3154) amendatory of the act to incorporate the Columbia Railway Company, of the District of Columbia, approved May 24, 1871;

A bill (H. R. No. 3407) to change the name of the schooner Jacob Faithful to Eyvor.

A bill (H. R. No. 3406) to relieve Joseph Wheeler, of Lawrence County, in the State of Alabama, from all legal and political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution;

A bill (H. R. No. 3408) to remove the disabilities of L. L. Lomax, of Virginia;

A bill (H. R. No. 3411) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the trustees of the Female Orphan Asylum, in Georgetown, and the Washington City Orphan Asylum, in the District of Columbia," approved May 24, 1828;

A bill (H. R. No. 3412) in relation to the bridge across the Potomac River used by the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company;

A bill (H. R. No. 3413) to provide for the stamping of unstamped instruments, documents, or papers; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 103) authorizing the President to issue Army rations and clothing to the destitute people on the Tombigbee, Warrior, and Alabama Rivers.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S.

No. 253) to authorize the county commissioners of Thurston County, in Washington Territory, to issue bonds for the purpose of constructing a railroad from Budd's Inlet, Puget Sound, to intersect the Northern Pacific Railroad at or near Tenino.

PRESIDIO RESERVATION.

Mr. HAGER. I now move to take up Senate bill No. 492.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 492) authorizing the city and county of San Francisco to use the Presidio reservation as a park and highway.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the use of the Presidio military reservation in the city and county of San Francisco, in the State of California, is hereby granted to the city and county of San Francisco, to be enjoyed solely for the purposes of a park and highway, upon the following express conditions: First, the fee to said reservation, and the right of way through said park, for free communication with the forts, military establishments, and grounds, Presidio barracks, and public buildings of the United States, shall remain in and is reserved to the United States; secondly, that portion, not exceeding three hundred acres in extent, comprising the site of the fortifications at and about Fort Point; and that portion, not exceeding one hundred acres in extent, comprising the site of the Presidio barracks, and the buildings of the United States erected thereon; and also such parts of said reservation as may be hereafter selected by the authorities of the United States for the erection of public buildings or works, and so much land appurtenant thereto as may be necessary or expedient for the use of the United States, are reserved and exempted from the provisions of this act; lastly, the United States military authorities may, in time of war or great public danger, or in case such reservation, or any part thereof, is claimed or occupied by any person other than the authorities of said city and county, or for purposes other than is in this act provided, take possession of the whole or any portion of said park for military purposes, or for the purpose of expelling such persons therefrom, without any liability therefor for damage to said city and county, or any person whomsoever: Provided, That after twenty years from the passage of this act the Government may, upon sixty days' notice to said city and county, retake entire possession of said premises, for any purpose whatsoever, without any liability for any damage therefor to said city and county, or to any person whomsoever.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the committee that reported this bill explain the propriety of our giving to the city of San Francisco twelve hundred acres of land lying in its suburbs, which, if it is not needed for military purposes, may be sold and a million or two of dollars put into the Treasury of the United States. This question was up I think a couple of years ago and was somewhat discussed here when the predecessor of the Senator from California was a member of this body, and the same difficulties were suggested then that are suggested now; that is to say, it was stated then upon reliable information that this tract of land, lying just outside of the city of San Francisco, was of great value, and that it might be sold for the benefit of the United States, if not needed for military purposes, and a million or two of dollars—I think two millions was the lowest estimate then put upon it—be put into the Treasury. Upon what ground it is that we are to grant to the city of San Francisco property of this immense value in order that the city may have a park, I do not understand. I do not know upon what favorite ground San Francisco stands in respect to the Government more than New York, or Boston, or any other of the cities of the country near which there are military reservations, and which would find it very convenient if they could have them for parks and other public purposes which tend to the pleasure and convenience of the inhabitants.

Mr. SPENCER. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I think he misunderstands the object of the bill, as reported by the committee. I was a member of the committee that reported it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am much obliged to the Senator from Alabama. With due deference to him, I think I do understand the bill. That is a difference of opinion between the Senator and myself, and each of us has a right to entertain his own opinion. I have the bill before me, and its begins by granting the use of the Presidio military reservation to the city and county of San Francisco for the purposes of a park and highway upon the very important express condition that the fee to the reservation shall remain in the United States; that is to say, it shall not be the subject of taxation or any other thing which may, so far as the State of California is concerned, impose a burden upon it; but the city shall hold it in such a way that the State can impose no burden upon the city in respect to it whatever, and the real enjoyment and possession of the same shall belong to the city.

That may not be disposing of this property for the benefit of the city; it may not be a grant in fee, as the Senator suggests it is not, if by fee you mean the ultimate property in the soil; but if it were anywhere else than here, the bill might justly be styled a contrivance by which the city would get all the benefit of a fee without any of the burdens, as it respects that State or the United States, which might otherwise be imposed upon it. If I misunderstand this section of the bill, I shall very gladly listen to the Senator from Alabama in describing what it does mean.

Mr. SPENCER. The committee endeavored, if I remember correctly, to preserve the right of the United States to sell or dispose of the property whenever it might choose to do so. Their idea was that this land was a barren waste lying there, and if the city of San Francisco chose to improve it and use it for a park, and the United States did not want to sell it, we could well afford to give the city permission to do that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will ask whether there are any papers on this subject with the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that there are, but they are in the Secretary's office.

Mr. SARGENT. I will state that I am extremely busy upon the Committee on Appropriations, and as I have a few words to say on this subject which will not occupy five minutes, if the Senator from Vermont will allow me to say them while the papers are being obtained, I shall be obliged to him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With pleasure.

Mr. SARGENT. The bill before the Senate, Mr. President, is different from any other bill on this subject ever brought forward. The fee and the beneficial use of this park is in the Government of the United States, and is intended to remain there. It is a large tract of land necessary to the defense of the city of San Francisco. By looking at a map, which is in the possession of my colleague, and which I presume he will exhibit to the Senate, it will be seen that the whole extent of this land is either occupied by fortifications or covered by the guns of fortifications, so that the erection of buildings or the use of any portion of this land for ordinary commercial purposes would interfere with its defensive purposes. Consequently, it is impossible for the Government to sell this land without crippling the necessary defenses of the city of San Francisco. The city of San Francisco would have no objection to the sale of the land, provided it could be sold, but any portion of the land sold would be a little piece picked out here and there; and the result of erecting buildings, of putting factories upon it, of erecting tall chimneys, &c., would simply be to put obstacles in the way of the range of the guns and be a covering force for an enemy desiring to assault the fortifications from the land side, which military men say would be an extremely improper thing.

Here is this stretch of barren waste which cannot be sold by the Government for these reasons unless the necessary defenses of the city of San Francisco are to be abandoned. The city comes in and says, "Now let us lay out roads through this reservation; allow us to plant some trees here and there along these lines of road; allow us to beautify this property; we do not ask the fee of it; we do not ask anything except this privilege, and that our people may drive through it. It will make your fortifications more accessible to the city. It will make it more convenient for the Government to transport anything that it desires to transport to any part of this reservation. It will make the hospital which you are erecting there more accessible for your patients. Instead of supplies to your hospitals and fortifications being dragged through deep sand to reach their destination, they can go over beautifully macadamized roads."

This cannot be any injury to the Government. It will simply beautify the environs of the city of San Francisco. The bill provides that the Government at any time can resume full possession; the Government at the end of twenty years can terminate it at any rate; and I understand that my colleague, who has more especially the charge of this bill, is willing that an amendment shall be made providing that the Government may terminate the arrangement to-morrow, or any time when it is found that any claim is set up by the city of San Francisco, or any use of the property made which is inconsistent with the theory of the bill as we understand it, or whenever the Government from any motive whatever, concealed or expressed, good or bad, shall see fit to terminate this arrangement, and without making any compensation for damages to the city of San Francisco or any one else.

The city of San Francisco simply asks the privilege of beautifying this land, not to occupy it with any building, not to incumber it in any degree, but simply to put roads through it over which the wagons of the Government as well as the teams of the citizens may travel; and by the map which I see the Senator now holds in his hand he will see that to sell it would be simply to destroy it for military purposes. The military authorities themselves are extremely unwilling to yield up an inch of the land. They say it is all necessary for military purposes, and that putting buildings on it or occupying it for commercial purposes would destroy the value of the fortifications.

If it is an injury to the Government to plant some beautiful trees upon this land, or to lay out roads through it, if it is a benefit to the Government to allow it to remain a barren waste, a nuisance under the doors of our city, of course we ought to give the doubt to the Government and insist that no use of it shall be made. I think really it will benefit the Government to improve this property in this way, and with the amendment declaring that at any time the Government may resume possession with or without reason, it seems to me any objection to the bill must vanish.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, in the RECORD of to-morrow, in the middle of my speech, there will be a very extraordinary bowlder, as the geologists say, which, I fear, will not harmonize very well with the beginning and the end of my remarks. But the Senator from California was right, being obliged to be absent from the Senate, in stating now what he has stated. Of course Senators will understand that I am not the proprietor of this park, and therefore have no special interest to defend in what I say about this bill; but the tax-payers of the United States are the proprietors of this ground, which amounts in quantity to fifteen hundred and forty-one acres. I have here a map of the city of San Francisco and of this park and of the surrounding country, which has been handed down to me as a legacy from former Senators, who had it when this same effort was made heretofore to get this land from the Government. It first started as a demand for an absolute donation, that we should give it entirely to the city, with the idea that they were to use it as a park. If we are to give it to the city, I do not know why we should oblige the city of San Francisco more than any other city to have a park, and in fact the city of San Francisco and its people have encroached largely on this reservation already with their houses and blocks, and they have persuaded us in one way or another by acts of legislation to release all our claim to that part which they have squatted upon, amounting to some hundreds of acres already. The manifest destiny of the thing—nobody can disguise that from his eyes when he sees the shape of the ground there—is that with western enterprise the city will gradually encroach upon this park to the northward, and by and by it will be covered with houses clear up to the crest, and there will be fine streets and fine city lots, and somebody will have received a great benefit, while the people of the United States, who own the property, can no doubt receive, if the property is to be disposed of, a very large sum of money for it; and the question with me is whether we owe any such duty toward the city of San Francisco as to require us to give up this land for its benefit. That is what it comes to. You call it a park and a use now. Next year or the year after you will have a bill providing for a more permanent occupation, and by and by a little bill will go through which will release the interest of the United States, because it will be said, "This land has been occupied by the city; they have laid out roads; they have authorized people to put houses on the border facing it," and so on. In other words, the thing will go on just as it has gone on hitherto until two years ago, when a rest was made by resistance to encroachments on the east and on the south.

I think that is wrong. We have released some of the reservations to the city already, by which they have received very large benefits, and the city itself, if that has anything to do with the question, has a park nearly as large, although not in the same shape, as this Presidio park, within a mile of it, directly south of it and going clear out to the sea. When the city was laid out it was laid out by somebody who fully understood the true principles of laying out a town, and from the center of the city going westward toward the Pacific, and south of the bay of course, you come to the cemeteries of three or four different denominations, the general cemetery and I think a Catholic cemetery, and then some masonic and Odd-fellows' cemeteries, which occupy a large space of ground, and then a wide space takes you into the grand park of San Francisco, which, judging from the scale of the map before me, I should say was nearly half a mile wide—the Senator from California can tell me—and extends the whole distance of two or three miles, three miles probably, over to the Pacific. To the north of this and lying in the corner, fronting north of the bay and west of the sea, is this military reservation of fifteen hundred acres, of which there are probably about twelve hundred left. The city of San Francisco has already absorbed by gradual accretion about three hundred acres of this land, I should judge from the size of it, but perhaps not so much; at any rate a considerable quantity of it, as is shown by the angles on the map, from where the old lines of the reservation were.

From the lay of the land it is quite obvious, I think, that there is no great need of this property for a military reservation; that is to say, the building of forts upon it is unnecessary. The city is now already laid out the whole distance to the Pacific to the south of this reservation, and according to the statements of the petition, which I take to be true as it respects the lay of the land, it is thus described, and I will read the whole petition so that you can see how valuable this ground is:

> The undersigned, citizens and tax-payers of the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, respectfully represent:
> First, that the so-called Presidio reservation, now belonging to and in the possession of the United States, consists of over two and a half square miles of land, and is situated on the immediate northwest side of the city of San Francisco, commencing near the intersection of Baker street with the bay, and running thence along the shore line of the bay to the Golden Gate, the entrance to the harbor.

That is the north line of this property.

> That this reservation contains the only extensive body of arable land near the city of San Francisco and on that peninsula suitable for a park; that the soil of this land is generally good, is well watered with springs; that it mostly faces to the east and south, and is in full view of the bay and city of San Francisco.

Now I beg Senators to observe that, because in a military point of view the slope of this ground is important. You will see that the petitioners say that it faces away from the sea; that is to say, the crest of the land between the sea and the city outside of the bay is close by the shore, I suppose, and the land slopes to the eastward and south toward the city. So, then, if it were built over by houses and you had fine streets there, it would not be exposed to the guns of the ships of an enemy which should lie off the harbor; and all that the United States would absolutely need for military purposes in that respect would be to have its line of forts, as it now has some fortifications, on this crest at the point of the entrance of the harbor and facing the sea, because on the other side it would be merely defending this land against an attack from the city; and the holding of that fort after the city of San Francisco had been conquered by an attack inland would be rather useless; it would be rather a waste of money.

You can see, Mr. President, from the statement of these petitioners that the slope of this land is such that if you were to allow it to be built over, it would not be exposed, close to a fortification, as houses in many cities might be, to a fire from the ships of an enemy lying at anchor or sailing along the shore outside of the point, but they would all be covered by this high ridge which, according to the petition, intervenes close to the shore between that and this slope of land which descends toward the city. The consequence is that it might just as well be occupied for all the purposes of commerce and trade and residence as is all that part of the city which lies right along adjoining; and in fact we did have a few years ago one or two reservations in here [illustrating by referring to the map] which some how or other, for public uses or in some other way, lawfully I have no doubt, the city of San Francisco has captured by law and got. This is left; and the next step of course is to make this as agreeable and useful to the city of San Francisco as can be. I do not know that I blame the San Franciscans much for wishing to get this piece of property, although as I point out to you they have a park of their own laid out on the original plan of the city, apparently with a grand highway reservation on the sea, directly south of this and but a mile distant, and between that park of theirs and this reservation the whole city is laid off into blocks. I do not know how much it is occupied, because a city on a map may be more extensive than it is on the ground, but it is all laid off in city lots the whole way by this reservation clear out to the bend of the sea.

Now, Mr. President, I do say for the interest of the people of the United States who own these thousand acres of land, if there be that much left of it, that it appears extraordinary to me, as it has to other Senators when this matter has been pressed hitherto, that any member of Congress should find himself willing to give up even the use of this property to the city of San Francisco or to anybody else. The question ought to be decided, as it appears to me, upon this simple principle: If this land is necessary for the building of forts for the protection of San Francisco, then keep it absolutely free and build your forts upon it. If it is not necessary, as in my opinion it is not, and as when this matter was pressed two or three years ago it was not pretended that it was for military purposes, then let the United States dispose of this land as they do of similar land in the Eastern States about the cities of New York or Boston or wherever they have occasion to give up military reservations or military ground; sell it in the regular way and put the money into the Treasury to the credit of the people who are the owners of property. That is the proper thing to do.

Now we are told that the War Department do not want to give it up. What evidence have we of that? The committee have not reported anything on the subject in writing; we only have the report of the bill. I cannot find among the papers any report upon the subject at all. I do find a letter, however, among the papers from the Secretary of War addressed to the Senator from California, which, with his permission, as it is among the papers, I will read.

Mr. HAGER. There are other papers in the House connected with the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is this a public paper which the Senator is willing to have read?

Mr. HAGER. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, which is the legislative, &c., appropriation bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask the Senator from Maine, with the assent of the Senator from California, if he will allow me to offer a resolution at this time calling upon the War Department for information touching this park and the views of the War Department in respect to its necessity for public purposes?

Mr. HAGER. Will the Senator allow me a minute? If the Senator will accept this amendment, I am perfectly willing it shall be incorporated in the bill, and it will obviate all the objections he has:

> That at any time after the passage of this act the Government may, on six months' notice to said city and county, retake possession of said premises, or any part thereof, if the same shall be required for public use or for purposes of sale.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would not be satisfactory to me.

Mr. HAGER. If the Senator will draw any amendment that will be satisfactory to him, by which the Government may retake possession for any purpose whatever, I am perfectly willing. We merely want the privilege of driving upon this piece of ground for purposes of health.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What I wish now, and what I think every Senator ought to wish, is to get official and responsible information from the Department of War upon this subject. I had supposed when this matter was brought up the day before yesterday I believe, from what was said, that we had that official information in the papers. I understood it to be so stated. I have sent for the papers, and the only document on the subject, except the petitions and the resolutions of the city councils and of the Legislature of California, that I find is a letter from the Secretary of War addressed to the Senator from California, and which does not touch the point as to whether it is needed for military purposes or as to whether this bill ought to pass. It only says that a certain modification ought to be made in the bill, without expressing any opinion, as it would undoubtedly have been thought by the Secretary of War officious in him to volunteer an opinion on the subject when Congress had not asked it. What I ask leave to do, and it will make only a delay of a day or two, and now this bill must go over until to-morrow, is to offer a resolution that I will submit calling for information.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senate can go on with the appropriation for the present. I will prepare the resolution and offer it in a few moments.

REPRINTING OF A BILL.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask permission at this time to submit a motion that the civil-rights bill be reprinted. There are no copies of it left.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be entered if there be no objection.

Mr. ALCORN. Will the Senator from New Jersey include in his motion to print the amendments that are pending to the bill?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask that the bill be printed as it came from the committee. Such an order as the Senator suggests would be proper, of course.

Mr. ALCORN. Will you allow the amendments that are now pending to be printed with the bill?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have no objection, subject to the order of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You do not want them printed in with the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill and amendments that are pending will be ordered to be printed, if there be no objection.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The amendments will not be printed with the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be printed separately.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

Mr. RAMSEY. Will it be in order now to offer amendments outside those of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not yet; the committee's amendments are first in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations have been disposed of, as the Chair understands.

Mr. RAMSEY. Then I have one that I wish to offer, with the consent of the chairman of the committee. It is to correct an oversight in the bill, I imagine.

Mr. BOREMAN. I am informed by Senators who were in the Senate yesterday that all the amendments of the committee were not understood as concurred in in the Senate. Is the bill in the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has not been reported to the Senate. As in Committee of the Whole, the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations were agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. My amendment is in line 1567, where the word "twenty-three" occurs, to make it read "twenty-five;" so as to provide for twenty-five laborers for the Post-Office Department. That is the present force and the force provided for in the code.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not object to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. In line 1587 I move to change the word "horse" to "horses;" and after the word "carriage," in the same line, to insert the word "wagons;" and then in line 1589, after the word "dollars" where it first occurs, to insert these words:

For rent of house No. 915 E street northwest, $4,200.

That is the house occupied by the topographer of the Post-Office Department. The Committee on Appropriations understand the amendment. It is merely to correct an oversight.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is right. I do not object to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to make an inquiry of the chairman of the committee in regard to the amendment made on page 10 in reference to the Public Printer. The amendment reads as follows:

Shall cease and determine and become of no effect from and after the date of the first vacancy occurring in said office; that the title of said officer shall thereafter be Public Printer, and he shall be deemed an officer of the United States, and said office shall be filled by appointment by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Although I do not ask the question by way of finding any fault with the Public Printer or anything of that kind, yet I should like to know whether that language does not continue the present officer in office during his own pleasure instead of the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No, sir; during the pleasure of the Senate, as the committee understand it. He is an officer of the Senate, and this amendment does not change that fact. Being an officer of the Senate, of course he is subject to the action of the Senate. If there is any doubt about that, it may be well to make it certain; but I cannot think there is.

Mr. LOGAN. That is the question. The question in my mind is what power the Senate will have over him after this bill passes. It strikes me, from the reading of the clause, that it is a continuation of the present incumbent in office to be determined by himself.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Would not the case stand in this way? By an act of Congress this man is an officer of the Senate. The Senate was authorized to designate a Public Printer. This amendment does not deprive the Senate of that authority over the officer, as it seems to me; so that he remains the officer as long as the Senate chooses; but when the Senate chooses to vacate the office by its own action, then he is to become the appointee of the President.

Mr. LOGAN. It reads in this way:

That so much of the act entitled "An act providing for the election of a Congressional Printer," approved February 22, 1867, as provides for the election of such officer by the Senate, and provides that such officer shall be deemed an officer of the Senate, be, and the same hereby is, repealed.

This language preceding the words that I quoted before certainly repeals the law that makes him an officer of the Senate; and the moment this act goes into effect he is no longer an officer of the Senate, because that law is repealed. Then you provide that when a vacancy shall occur the appointment shall be made by the President.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator will observe that the repealing clause has been stricken out by the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I was reading it altogether, without noticing that fact. Possibly that may obviate the objection.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The four lines preceding the words in italics are stricken out.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, let us read it with those words out:

That so much of the act entitled "An act providing for the election of a Congressional Printer," approved February 22, 1867, as provides for the election of such officer by the Senate, and provides that such officer shall be deemed an officer of the Senate, shall cease and determine and become of no effect from and after the date of the first vacancy occurring in said office.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That leaves the law to stand.

Mr. LOGAN. The committee construe it that it leaves the law to stand so that the Senate still has power over the officer.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Precisely.

Mr. CONKLING. If I do not interrupt the Senator from Illinois, he has awakened my curiosity, too, upon this point. Very likely under the amendment proposed, the Senate, if it could accomplish it, would retain the power to remove the Public Printer; but how is that to be done? By electing an officer in his place? No; because this clause determines that power. It must be done by an act of removal merely. How is that to be accomplished? It cannot be done by superseding the present officer by the election of another, because the moment the office becomes vacant the appointment becomes that of the President and Senate. So it seems to me, although in theory it may preserve the right in the Senate to determine the tenure of office, that could only be done by a removal; but I do not know exactly how, within the usage and mode of action known in the Senate, you could remove an officer without appointing anybody in his place.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You could do it by a resolution.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Vermont says you could do it by resolution. Perhaps you could pass a resolution declaring the office vacant and that the incumbent be removed. That would be rather a harsh mode of proceeding. It would be one hardly to be warranted except for what is called cause and cause of rather an aggravated kind.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It would be the exercise of the same authority that exists in the Executive Departments.

Mr. CONKLING. No, if my friend will pardon me, that exists by means of nominating an officer to a place already filled, and the theory is that the nomination of another officer creates a vacancy and at the same time fills it up, and thus the previous officer is displaced. But now the Senate is to pass a resolution virtually expelling the incumbent from the office. There the power of the Senate ceases, because the moment that has occured the vacancy exists, and then it behooves the President, and not us, to fill it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator will observe that the object of the provision is that the time shall come when this incumbent shall cease to be an officer of the Senate but shall become an officer of the United States, and having provided the method by which that is to be done, it only remains that the Senate shall carry out that purpose by simply removing him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think there is any difficulty about this matter. My attention was called to it the other day, and I perhaps am responsible for the particular phraseology of the amendment. It was stated to me that it was not desirable (and I concurred in that most entirely) that the Senate should undertake at this present moment to legislate the present Congressional Printer out of office, and especially for a reason that I think is just and indicates fair play toward everybody. This gentleman is in the office and has been in it for some time. So far as I know, and so far as the public accounts show, he has managed the office with great energy and skill and regularity, and has not in any way, so far as I know, misconducted himself. Now he is charged, I understand, by somebody and in some way with some official or personal dereliction. He denies all those charges; and I believe some investigation by some committee is going on upon the subject. Now, to legislate him out of office before that committee shall have reported and before we know what the facts are upon which the charges rest it seems to me would be unjust.

That being the case, and it being desirable, as it was thought, that hereafter this appointment of Congressional Printer should be made as other officers of the United States are appointed, by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and that he should no longer after this time be an officer of the Senate the point was to leave this gentleman, while the propriety of his official conduct is undergoing investigation, not legislated out of office, and thus implying before we have the facts that we condemn him, but to leave him just where he stood, subject to the will of the Senate under existing law; so that whenever the Senate should choose to be of the opinion that he ought to go, either for public or private reasons, either from the ordinary changes in politics and in appointments or for cause which may appear, though of course as to him and all other officers I should hope there would be no cause and I have no reason to believe there will be—but if for any reason the Senate desires that this officer shall no longer continue, then the Senate by this bill has the power to displace him, because by the original act the power to remove this officer as well as to substitute another was given to the Senate.

Now, how is the Senate to exercise this power, the Senator from New York suggests? Of course it can exercise it only in one way under this act, and that is by resolution declaring that on and after a certain day the right of this gentleman to this office shall cease. You can pass a resolution to-day if you like or to-morrow in the morning hour, declaring that at the end of this present session of Congress the title to this office in this gentleman shall determine, and then he goes out without any reflection upon himself or upon anybody else; or if you do not want to do it then, you can wait until the next session; you can do it at any time or do it instantly if you like. It is done in the Departments of course every day. The Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Interior, and every other head of a Department has occasion in the natural course of business, I suppose, every day nearly, to say to a particular gentleman "your services are no longer required," and out he goes; and the President of the United States has often done it. Although, as is said by gentlemen, under certain circumstances it would be harsh, yet as to the power reserved to the Senate to displace this gentleman, thus creating a vacancy and at the same time determining our own right to fill the office, there is no difficulty at all. If there is, of course Senators can change the language.

Mr. LOGAN. The suggestion I made was based on a reading of the whole section together, and I thought it very clear that this gentleman was permanently fixed there as Public Printer, and I merely made the inquiry to ascertain the fact on that point, not out of any desire I had or any knowledge or intimation that I had, so far as the Public Printer is concerned, for I know nothing against him and have no desire to interfere with him. I wish merely to understand whether it was intended that he should be a permanent officer, or whether the power to remove him was still retained in the Senate; and I have no doubt that it is under the amendment as it has been agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have not given much consideration to this subject, but I confess that I fail to see the wisdom or the necessity of any part of this clause relating to the Public Printer after and including the word "provided." I think it will be better to strike it all out and let the thing stand precisely as it does now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is force in that.

Mr. HAMLIN. I cannot understand any necessity for action one way or the other, and I have risen simply for the purpose of moving, if the motion is in order, to strike out all of the proviso beginning in line 222 down to the word "Senate" in line 237. I believe that strikes out all that relates to the appointment of the Public Printer and leaves it just as it is under the existing law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine to strike out the proviso following the appropriation for the compensation of the Congressional Printer and the clerks and messengers in his office.

Mr. MORTON. How will that leave it?

Mr. HAMLIN. Just as it is under the existing law.

Mr. CONKLING. I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Maine, the effect of the amendment being to leave the law as to the Congressional Printer as it stands now. I shall do it, first, because I have heard no reason assigned for changing it, and I understand the present arrangement to be satisfactory in respect of every interest, public or of a kind to which the Senate is bound to look.

I shall vote for it also because, despite the explanation of the Senator from Vermont, it is quite clear to me that the effect of the proposed language would not be merely that which he states, and I think I can make plain in a few words one point in regard to it. The language commits to the Senate the power to expel the Public Printer from office. It comes to that. He is to be removed for the sake of removing him, not because for political or other reasons the Senate prefers another man, but because the Senate affirmatively declares that he ought to go out of that office. That done, it immediately devolves upon the President to nominate an incumbent for the place. Would any Executive feel at liberty to send back to the Senate the name of the very man who had just been expelled by the Senate? It seems to me, manifestly not.

If the object were merely to commit to the President the appointing power, it would be very easy in the ordinary way to commit to the President the appointing power after a certain time. Then if the President nominates the present incumbent and he is confirmed, he would continue to be Public Printer, and in that way he would be eligible like every other man to this office. But under this language, when the Senate has selected him and expelled or removed him from the office, I think it pretty clear that he would not be practically one of those from whom the President would select. Therefore it seems to me that there is no occasion for any change; but if a change is to be made, it should be so made that Mr. Clapp, the Public Printer, like every other printer, would still be in the field, not only in theory but in fact, of selection open to the President. But the amendment of the Senator from Maine avoids the whole question, leaves it where it is, and I think leaves it so properly, and therefore I shall vote for it.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I shall vote for this amendment. I see no necessity for changing the existing law.

I did not rise, however, to say that so much as to say that I think the Senator from Vermont is misinformed in reference to one point. He left the impression on my mind, and perhaps on the mind of others, that there were charges pending against the present Government Printer and under investigation. I am not aware that that is the fact. I am inclined to think there are no accusations pending against him. There have been suggestions that if a very smart and vigilant committee of this House or of the other House or of both Houses were to go at the Government Printer with a satisfactory corps of detectives they might find something on which to ground an accusation, but nobody, I think, has ventured to prefer an allegation against the official conduct of the present Superintendent of Printing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will allow me to say a word in explanation of what I said, perhaps I ought to apologize. The information I obtained was from some of the public newspapers, I think, of the District here; and I may have confounded what they thought ought to be investigated with the idea that some investigation was going on.

Mr. HOWE. I dare say. The Government Printer stands in a very delicate as well as responsible position. He is doing work that a very active profession would like to do, and I imagine he has incurred a very considerable opposition, by way of inheritance perhaps, since the printing of the RECORD was transferred to that office. It is one of the most natural things in the world that suspicion and insinuation should be leveled against the Superintendent of Public Printing; but I believe the Committee on Public Printing in both Houses are tolerably alive to the importance of overlooking the conduct of that office. My impression is that the chiefs of those two committees are quite competent for the position they occupy, and I have myself great confidence that while any Superintendent of Public Printing is supervised by such gentlemen, there is not likely to be a great deal of rascality perpetrated in that office. At all events I think it will be time enough to institute an investigation when somebody says they believe that some particular misconduct is transpiring there.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will say one word on this proposition as it struck the Committee on Appropriations. Evidently there is a desire somewhere that this officer should not be longer continued as an officer of the Senate, as he now is. Whether there is anything in it or not is a matter for the consideration of the Senate entirely, and that is foreshadowed or indicated in the amendment itself. He is called the Congressional Printer, but as a matter of fact he is elected by the Senate and is amenable to the Senate, and so is an officer of the Senate. A desire, therefore, I say probably exists somewhere that he should be called the Public Printer, and to that end the provision as it stood originally in the bill was made. Whether there is any advantage in that or not I do not know. It seems to me not quite obvious whether there is or not, and therefore the committee took no action upon it. They were content to leave it to the sense of the Senate, and I have risen neither to advocate nor tooppose the proposition made by my colleague. I do not think it is very important any way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] to strike out after the word "dollars," in line 222, all referring to the office of Public Printer.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I offer the following as an amendment to come in as an additional section at the end of the bill, and I will say that it is an amendment recommended by the Committee on Finance unanimously and approved by the Committee on Appropriations:

SECTION —. That so much of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes," as provides "for replacing the worn and mutilated circulating notes of national banking associations, and for engraving and preparing in such manner and on such paper and of such form and design as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, new circulating notes for such associations to replace notes of a design and denomination now successfully counterfeited, $600,000: Provided, That each of said national banking associations shall reimburse the Treasury the cost of the circulating notes furnished under this provision" be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

In explanation, I will say that last year a provision was inserted in the appropriation bill providing that all the circulating notes of the national banks should be replaced by new ones, and an appropriation——

Mr. SARGENT. I do not wish to interfere with the explanation of the Senator, but I desire to reserve the right to make a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The sum of $600,000 was appropriated for that purpose; and it was also provided that that sum should be reimbursed to the Treasury by an assessment upon the several national banks. This is found to embarrass the Department very much in relation to issuing certain descriptions of bills which they have been compelled to retire for some months, and it is stated by the Comptroller of the Currency, who is extremely desirous that this amendment should be passed, that it will involve at least an expenditure of not less than $1,000,000; and if all of these notes shall be replaced, it will be at an expense of $2,000,000. And besides this there have been twenty-two millions and almost a half of revenue paid into the Treasury Department by the national banks for the explicit purpose of paying the expenses of engraving and printing these notes. It would seem, therefore, manifestly improper that this cost should be reassessed upon the national banks.

I hope that the Senator from California will not make any point of order. I do not believe that any point of order can be made successfully; but it is so manifestly proper that this amendment should be inserted here now, and is of so much importance, that I cannot think that the Senator from California will insist upon making a point of order even if it were pertinent to the present amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask that the rule which was adopted yesterday be read relative to amendments to appropriation bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That during the present session it shall be in order at any time to move a recess; and pending an appropriation bill to move to confine debate on amendments thereto to five minutes by any Senator on the pending motion; and such motions shall be decided without debate; and no amendment to any such bill making legislative provisions other than such as directly relate to the appropriations contained in the bill shall be received; and no special order shall be made during this session: Provided, That this order shall not extend to the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. SARGENT. I raise the point of order on the amendment. It is new legislation, obviously contrary to the spirit of the rule. It in terms repeals a law of the last Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not like to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, but this amendment merely modifies a paragraph put into an appropriation bill at the last session and saves the Government a considerable amount of expense and a great amount of inconvenience. I cannot see what objection the Senator from California can possibly have to the proposition which is now pending.

Mr. SARGENT. I was upon the committee of conference last year which fixed the law as it was fixed. I remember that it was done after debate in both Houses of Congress. I am satisfied that the action then taken was wise. I know there is very great pressure on the part of the banks to be relieved from the necessity of reimbursing the Government for the expenses of replacing their notes. That subject was all gone over then, and it was decided that it was just and equitable that they should do it and that it was not an excuse for relieving these banks that they were generally taxed. The taxes go into the Treasury as taxes from distilleries, or from customs revenues, or from any other source, and that money is not the property of the banks or a special fund to be appropriated for this particular purpose. At any rate, that was my judgment then, and it is now; and I think the banks are able to pay for replacing the currency if it is issued to them.

I know they make one complaint that there may be some force in, which may be amended by a bill if the Senator will bring it forward, and that is that the plates which are now being used are not worn out to such a degree that the plates themselves need to be replaced. That may be true, or a committee may find it to be true on an examination of the facts; but whether it is intrinsically so or not, I do not know. At any rate, the arguments of last year which were brought to my attention by the necessity which I had to hear them and take part in them, thoroughly convinced me that our legislation at that time was sound and just, and I am not willing that the rule shall be violated by reversing that legislation upon this appropriation bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from California to this point in the case, that the argument of the Comptroller of the Currency—and I do not desire to consume any time about this matter—was that a replacement of new notes for those which had been counterfeited would more endanger the public relative to the frauds of counterfeits than would a continuance of the present style of notes in circulation, for the reason that the people are all familiar with the present form of notes and if new notes were to be issued they would be immediately counterfeited, and there would be far greater danger of the public being deceived by them than there would be if we continue the old notes in circulation.

Mr. CONKLING. I believe there is no question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. None.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope the Senator will not take an appeal from a decision so obviously right, whatever the merits of the proposition may be, in the very teeth of the rule.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I think not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont insist on his appeal?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

The decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. CONKLING. On page 27 of the bill, in lines 635 and 636 an amendment was adopted yesterday in Committee of the Whole, striking out these words, "two clerks at $1,500 each." The amendment, like the original language, relates to the sub-treasury in the city of New York, and I have this morning a dispatch from Mr. Hillhouse which I will read, saying only that anything Mr. Hillhouse gives as a statement to the Senate the Senate is safe in relying and acting on. He says:

The two clerks at $1,500 each, stricken out of the clause in the appropriation bill relating to this office yesterday, are a necessity under the new coinage act. Will you please confer with Senator MORRILL about it.

Pursuant to that dispatch, I have conferred with the honorable Senator from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. The amendment was reported for lack of information sustaining the words as they stood in the House bill, and the chairman of the committee has no objection to their being reinstated; so that I move to reconsider the vote by which that amendment was adopted, that the clause may be left to stand as the House fixed it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the motion to reconsider will be regarded as agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to say a word about that to explain why it was. Those two clerks are new; they are so much additional force——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine object to the motion to reconsider?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I was about to state the reason for the action of the committee. Finding those two clerks provided for in this bill not estimated for, and so being new matter and having no information on the subject, the committee as a cautionary matter struck them out to induce an inquiry at another time and under other circumstances; but I have had a telegram this morning of the same purport with that which the Senator from New York has had, advising me of the necessity for these clerks, which is a sufficient justification; and if the committee had been in possession of those facts at the time the item would have remained in the bill. I have no objection, therefore, that it should be restored.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote having been reconsidered, the question now is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations to strike out this item.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WEST. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer an amendment on page 20, line 477, to strike out the word "fifty-seven" and insert "sixty-two," the effect being to increase the number of clerks in the office of the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department. The Sixth Auditor, in a communication to the chairman of the committee, submits a carefully and accurately prepared table showing the increase of work in the Bureau since 1865, and the increase of force for the corresponding period. The increase of postal business alone since 1865 has been 85 per cent., while the total increase of force on both postal and money-order accounts has been but 41 per cent., and that increase has been exclusively employed in money-order accounts. The committee, having examined carefully the statement made in this communication, recommend this change.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WEST. That will render a change in the word "one," on line 482, to "nine," so as to make it read "$89,620."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WEST. I am further instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer the following amendment: In section 5, line 7, after the word "that," insert "this section shall not operate to prevent the fulfillment of contracts existing at the date of the passage of this act and;" so as to read:

Provided, That this section shall not operate to prevent the fulfillment of contracts existing at the date of the passage of this act, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall at the beginning of each session report to Congress any balances of appropriations for specific objects affected by this section that may need to be reappropriated.

Under the section as reported by the committee, and in accordance with this amendment, the rule is laid down for all disbursing departments that they shall make no contracts extending beyond two years; but as there are some contracts existing at the present time, this amendment validates those contracts and enables them to be fulfilled.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I suggest that the clerk be authorized in the engrossment of the amendments of the Senate to change the footings where that is made necessary by amendments. I believe that is usual.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection that order will be made, and the clerk will be authorized to change the footings where corrections are necessary to be made.

Mr. SARGENT. In line 333 I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to move to strike out "four" and insert "six;" so as to make the appropriation for contingent expenses of the executive office $6,000, the amount allowed for the present fiscal year, instead of $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I have one other amendment from the Committee on Appropriations. In the clause providing for the office of Director of the Mint, after the word "dollars" in line 817, I move to insert:

One computer of bullion, $2,200.

I have in my hand the letter of the Director of the Mint, sent to the committee by the Secretary of the Treasury, recommending this item.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. On page 3, line 61, after the word "dollars" I move to insert the following:

Clerk to the Committee on Commerce, $2,220.

Mr. PRATT. I object to that. The objection is not directed especially to the amendment of my friend from Michigan; but there are several similar provisions in this bill immediately preceding the place where the amendment comes in. I notice, for example, that the clerk to the Committee on Finance is paid $2,220; the clerk to the Committee on Claims, $2,220; the clerk to the Committee on Printing Records, $2,280; and the clerk to the Committee on Appropriations the same amount. I notice that these appropriations are limited to these particular clerks. I do not understand why this is so. The clerks to the other committees receive a per diem compensation of $7.20 per day, I think, and the compensation stops with the expiration of the session of Congress, whereas the compensation to these particular clerks extends throughout the year. Now, I am not aware that these clerks are compelled to remain here during the recess, from the 22d of June say, to the first Monday in December next. Why should they be paid during that time? I hope that Senators who are posted in these matters will make some explanation of the reasons why particular clerks should be selected out and receive an annual compensation, and a pretty large one at that, while the clerks to the remaining committees receive simply a per diem compensation ending with the session.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will state that probably the clerk of the Committee on Commerce has more arduous labor than the clerk of any other committee connected with this body. After the death of the gentleman who was for years clerk to the Committee on Commerce, some time ago, I tried for two years to get a competent clerk for that committee at the compensation allowed by the Senate, and I tried in vain. I changed two or three times, and finally was compelled, in order to obtain a clerk competent to perform the duties intrusted to that committee, to promise a yearly salary and to see that he gets it, even if I have to pay it myself. The duties of that clerk are very onerous. It requires a man fit to be a Senator to be a competent clerk to that committee. He must be a lawyer; he must be an able man; and such a man cannot be had at a compensation of $7.20 a day during the session.

Mr. PRATT. I inquire of my friend from Michigan whether there is anything in the business that comes before the Committee on Commerce which requires that the clerk of that committee should remain here during the vacation?

Mr. CHANDLER. He has to remain here.

Mr. PRATT. On business of the committee?

Mr. CHANDLER. Partially.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offerered by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator from Indiana raises a very proper question and one of general interest, and he very properly suggests that he does not see why the committees specially named are preferred, if this be a preferment; that is to say, why they have salaried clerks and the other committees have not. There are a great many things in the civil service touching this body and the other House, and touching the civil service generally, which would be of a very great interest to anybody who would examine them. He will find these inequalities running through the whole of it, if they be inequalities, or these discriminations. But in regard to this particular subject, to confine myself to that, the clerks who are found in this bill provided for come down to us from many years. Those clerks were provided for in this way at a time perhaps when those committees had a more important relation to the Senate comparatively to other committees than they have at the present time. For instance, the Committee on Claims, to which reference has been made, has long had a salaried clerk, and he was provided for originally when that was a very important committee, comparatively more so than now; and even at this time the duties of no clerk here are more important than those devolved on that clerk, provided he is such an aid to that committee as he ought to be.

In 1854 the committees of the Senate were revised. Mr. Butler, then from South Carolina, I think made a report on the subject, and these particular committees then were designated for salaried clerks, and they have remained so ever since. Then there were very few clerks to committees besides these. Now, clerkships to our committees have become almost universal. Then the compensation of the clerks outside of these salaried clerks was very limited; now it is much larger, as the Senator is aware. I think it would be well (and this is my answer to the Senator) for the committee who may properly have this matter in charge to revise the subject of the clerkships of the committees, and fix the salaries for the clerks of such committees as need salaried clerks. Committees whose clerks have a continuing service to some extent; committees which meet here before the session, for instance, and have duties to perform, and who have some preparation to make to meet the duties of their position. But I would suggest to my honorable friend that it is not the duty of the Committee on Appropriations to examine that question. It is as much as they can do to provide for the service as they find it to exist; and it is not a good practice, as a general proposition, to undertake to provide for it on an appropriation bill. It is too diverse, too conflicting, and it takes up too much time. If the Senator will look at another page in this bill providing for the committees of the House of Representatives, he will see that they very nearly correspond, although they outrun us in number as they do in the number of committees. They outrun us in the number of salaried clerks to committees, and they have larger committees; and they have salaries for clerks to committees which we have not. For instance, there the Committee on the Public Lands has a salaried clerk and ours has not.

Mr. WEST. I inquire of the Senator from Michigan whether he gave notice of this amendment and had it submitted to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. CHANDLER. It has been submitted to the Committee on Appropriations, and I offered it after consultation with the chairman of that committee.

Mr. WEST. I was not aware of that.

Mr. WRIGHT. In view of a remark made by the Senator from Maine, I deem it proper to make a reference somewhat to this question of the salaries of clerks. He made a suggestion that I think is eminently proper; and in view of my connection with a committee of this body I deem it proper for me to refer to it. I can see at once the very great difficulty of and the objection to attempting to arrange this matter of salaries upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. MORRILL of Maine. It cannot be done well.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have uniformly, when this question has been raised in the Senate heretofore as I have at this session, insisted that these matters should all be left out of appropriation bills, or at least that there should be no effort to increase salaries or change them in a bill of this kind, but should leave them substantially as they are by existing statutes. I am satisfied that there are many evils connected with our present system of salaries as applicable to the employés of both bodies of Congress, if not the employés in the different Executive Departments; and there ought to be some general law on that subject, or the entire legislation on that subject ought to be revised. I think there is rank injustice done to many employés in that they get compensation at less than they are entitled to as compared with others.

Upon this subject of the salaries of clerks I have had my attention direction to it not a little as a member of the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, and have had more than one consultation with the chairman of the House committee; and it is our purpose, if possible, to prepare a bill before the adjournment that shall if not entirely revise these salaries, at least do it to some extent, so as to correct the more manifest inequalities connected with it.

So far as the salaries of clerks of committees are concerned in this body, I think there are more than half of them that should be abolished. I think only the leading committees of the Senate should have salaried clerks, and I think when you compare these clerks of committees with those in the House it will be found that we pay much larger salaries here than they do there. I think that many of these clerkships ought to be abolished; or else if the chairman of every committee is to have a clerk, then upon the same principle every Senator here should have a clerk; and I am not sure but that there would be absolute economy in making some provision of that kind. But when you attempt, as is attempted here by the Senator from Michigan, to say that the clerk of the Committee on Commerce shall be a salaried officer, the same would be equally true and could be claimed with equal justice in reference to all other committee clerks in this body. I therefore am opposed to this amendment. I am opposed to making any change in these salaries as they stand now, and prefer and think it very much better that we leave it to some general bill on the subject that shall revise this whole matter.

While I have no objection, and I do not wish to be understood as introducing any objection, to the Senator from Michigan increasing the salary of the clerk to his committee, and while I appreciate all that he says, I think it were much better to leave this matter alone now and arrange it by some general bill.

Mr. CHANLDER. I hope this amendment will be adopted, and then when the general bill comes in I trust it will be a fair and proper bill. I ask the Senate to adopt this amendment, as it is eminently fit.

Mr. PRATT. I wish to make a single remark in reply to the Senator from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. While that committee may not feel at liberty to revise the system of salaried clerks in this body, it is surely within their province to fix the amount of the salaries, and if they are too high to grade them down. Now, for one year during an entire Congress this body is in session only three months or four months at most, and during the other year from seven to eight months. When we disperse and go home the clerks follow suit; and yet these clerks receive, for what reason I do not know, just precisely $2,220, while the fourth-class clerks in the Departments, skilled men who remain there during the entire year with the exception of a brief vacation during the dog-days of thirty days, receive only $1,800, men who are habitually at their posts, because the Departments are not in the habit of adjourning over the holidays or adjourning over Saturdays, and they remain at their posts day in and day out during the year, and the highest compensation for the highest order of clerks is $1,800. Now I beg to know from my friend from Maine, the chairman of this committee, upon what principle he justifies paying these extraordinary salaries for the entire year to the clerks of these committees?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Does the Senator inquire about the salaried clerks?

Mr. PRATT. Yes, sir; the amount I am talking about now, the $2,220 salary.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That would lead to considerable consideration of the public service, which the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations does not feel called upon either to argue or to justify. We appropriate for this service as we find it. It may be that it is too high; it may be that it is not enough. On a subject of this kind, especially where the provision spoken of has been continuing so long, it is a sufficient justification on the part of the Committee on Appropriations to say that this is exactly what the law requires. If the law is not as it ought to be, that is a subject standing by itself. In other words, the regulation of the service is one thing, and providing for it is quite another. In providing for it the business of the Committee on Appropriations is to see that every salaried officer gets precisely what he is entitled to have, nothing more, nothing less. That is the duty with which you charge us, and the regulation of what the service ought to be belongs somewhere else. It is a complicated subject any way; it involves careful consideration; and I congratulate myself and the Senate that my honorable friend from Iowa has the thing under consideration, and as he is acting in conjunction with a gentleman in another quarter who I know has given great consideration to the question, I hope we shall have some result which will at least relieve the Committee on Appropriations from considering the question of what the salaries ought to be, and especially those relating to our own body.

Mr. PRATT. Before my friend takes his seat, I should be glad to know whether Congress at the last session found any difficulty when passing an appropriation bill in taking up the subject of salaries, particularly where members of Congress were concerned, and change them?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have conferred with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and, after that conference, submit the following amendment: In line 460, on page 20, where the number is "seventeen," make it "eighteen;" in the same line, where it is "ten," make it "eleven," and in the next line strike out "eight" and insert "ten." This has reference to the Fourth Auditor's Office. In the Fourth Auditor's Office there are fifty-eight clerks and employés; the bill reduces them to fifty. On conferring with the Auditor, and in the papers which were presented to the Committee on Appropriations, we are informed that it is utterly useless to attempt to get along with the whole of that reduction. He therefore asks that it shall be made four, instead of eight, reducing the number four, and not eight; and the amendment which is proposed accomplishes that precise result which I understood my colleague to say was proper.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. When my colleague spoke to me on the subject I understood him to refer to the Fifth Auditor.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Fourth Auditor.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. On the subject of the Fifth Auditor, I have been a good deal interrogated and have had communications with him, and have been strongly urged to make some amendments.

Mr. HAMLIN. So certainly as to the Fourth Auditor. My colleague will recollect that I went to the committee-room with a statement prepared at that Auditor's office.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes. Now let the Clerk read the amendment proposed.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of Mr. HAMLIN.

Mr. HAMLIN. That reduces the force in the office four. The bill now reduces it eight, which is a percentage I think very much larger than the reduction in any other Bureau.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am not certain that the public service does not require the amendment. I am not going to raise a question of order on this if the Senate think proper to put it in.

Mr. HAMLIN. I know it ought to go in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I beg leave to move an amendment to the bill on the eleventh page, line 253, to strike out the word "shall" and insert "may," leaving it discretionary with the Librarian whether to make the particular expenditure there indicated or not.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. Now in line 257 I move to strike out "one" and insert "two." The Committee on the Library have agreed to recommend that the Librarian increase the number of periodicals and newspapers to two from each State and Territory, so as to keep on the files two of the leading papers of each of the States and Territories. This is to cover the expense of that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the Secretary of State presented to the Committee on Foreign Relations a number of amendments which were unanimously approved by that committee, and then were reported and submitted to the Committee on Appropriations and approved by them. Those are the amendments which I now propose to make. I will state the effect of them and then will send to the Clerk the series of amendments to effect the object proposed.

The amendments propose to create a Third Assistant Secretary of State; to increase the number of fourth-class clerks from ten to twelve; to reduce the third-class clerks from nine to six; to dispense with all second-class clerks; to increase the first-class clerks from eight to eleven, and to create thirteen clerks to act as copyists. The effect is to increase the force in the State Department, and also to increase the salaries $13,400 in the aggregate.

The amendments further propose that five dollars shall be charged for passports, which, it is estimated, will yield to the Treasury about $45,000. Another amendment is that the Secretary of State may have the liberty of arranging and marshaling his clerks as the interests of his Department requires; and another amendment is, that the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $250,000 voted by Congress to pay the expenses of our Government before the Geneva tribunal may be expended in paying the expenses of the fishery commission which is to meet at Halifax in July. I will now send to the Clerk the amendments which are necessary to effect this end.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments of the Senator from New Jersey will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed on page 15, after the word "each," in line 337, to insert—

And one additional Assistant Secretary of State, with like compensation, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to be known as the Third Assistant Secretary of State.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not know but that the Senator has stated the number of clerks. As I have examined his amendments, they increase the clerks of class four by two.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It decreases the clerks of class three three.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. But it increases those of class one by three, and then makes an addition of thirteen $900 clerks.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. And dispenses with three clerks of class two. It increases the aggregate expense of running the Department $13,400.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It adds a force of eighteen and reduces six, so that it makes practically an increase of twelve, including nine $900 clerks and one Assistant Secretary.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes, sir. The expense now is $46,200; the expense under this amendment will be $59,600.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I dislike to object to it, and I do not rise for that purpose; but I wish the Senate to understand exactly what it is. This arrangement I have no doubt will add to the efficiency of the Department of State, and it will not embarrass the Treasury. It will be self-supporting, and something more, so that in the sense of an appropriation, in which light I am to look at it, it will not embarrass this bill. The other sense in which it is important it does not fall within the province of the Committee on Appropriations to examine particularly; and in that respect I am disposed to defer to the organ of that Department, the Committee on Foreign Relations, from whom this amendment comes; and therefore I submit the matter to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment of the Senator from New Jersey will be read.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Perhaps we had better vote on the whole series at once.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed on page 15 to strike out all of line 339, after the word "dollars" down to the word "one," where it first occurs in line 340, and to insert in lieu thereof "twelve clerks of class four; six clerks of class three; eleven clerks of class one; and thirteen clerks, each of which thirteen shall receive a compensation at the rate of $900 a year."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN was on page 15, line 343, to strike out the word "and;" and after the word "accounts" in line 344 to insert "rolls and library, statistics;" so as to make the clause read:

For six chiefs of Bureaus, (consular, diplomatic, accounts, rolls and library, statistics, and indexes and archives,) at $2,400 each, $14,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN was on page 16, after the word "dollars," in line 370, to insert:

That from and after the 1st day of July next a fee of five dollars shall be collected for each citizen's passport issued from the Department. An account of these fees shall be kept, and the amount collected shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States at least quarterly.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN was on page 15, lines 341 and 342, to increase the total appropriation for the compensation of the Secretary of State, Assistant Secretaries, and clerks of that Department from $74,620 to $88,020.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN was on page 16, at the end of the appropriations for the State Department, to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary of State may make such distribution of the clerks in the Department, and from time to time alter the same, as he may think proper. He may also prescribe duties for the Assistant Secretaries, the Solicitor, and the clerks of Bureaus, as well as for all the other employés in the Department, and may make changes and transfers therein when, in his judgment, it becomes necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN was to add at the end of section 5, page 76, the following words:

Nor to any unexpended balance of the appropriation made by the act approved December 21, 1871, for expenses that may be incurred under articles 1 to 9 of the treaty with Great Britain, concluded May 8, 1871, which balance the act approved March 3, 1873, authorized to be expended to enable the President to fulfill the stipulations contained in the twentieth, twenty-second, twenty-third, twenty-fourth, and twenty-fifth articles of said treaty.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. In accordance with the notice I gave the Committee on Appropriations yesterday, and at the request of Dr. Linderman, the Director of the Mint, I move to amend the bill on page 34, line 818, by inserting after the words "class two" the words "one clerk of class one." I am informed by Dr. Linderman that this was left out by mistake and the omission was not discovered until yesterday morning. It is to provide for a very valuable clerk, one he very much needs, although he happens now to be sick with a fever. I do not think any one will object to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. Yesterday I submitted an amendment to the bill on page 62, line 1496, to strike out "$7,500" and insert "$9,700." This amendment provides for an increase of the clerical force of the surveyor-general's office in Kansas.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will the Senator allow the amendment to be reported?

Mr. INGALLS. I submitted the amendment in writing yesterday, and it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I understand that; but will the Senator allow it to be reported from the desk?

Mr. INGALLS. I have not got it in writing before me, but my amendment is to amend the bill in line 1496 by striking out "$7,500" and inserting "$9,700," being an increase of the appropriation for two clerks in the surveyor-general's office in Kansas, at the rate of $1,100 per annum. In this connection I will state that the estimate sent from the Commissioner's office was based upon an appropriation of about $60,000 for field-work in that State. Subsequently, an appropriation has been made for nearly $90,000 for completing the field-work in the State of Kansas, and that increase renders an additional clerical force necessary. The amendment has the approbation of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. I have a communication from him on the subject which, with the consent of the Senator from Maine, I will forward to the Secretary's desk and have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the amendment?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should like to have the communication read first, because this bill is according to the estimates.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., May 19, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of 18th instant, relative to increase of appropriation for clerical hire in the office of the surveyor-general of Kansas. In reply I have to state that in submitting our estimate we recommended $7,500 for clerical service, which was equal to the estimate submitted for the present fiscal year upon the basis of $60,000 appropriated for field-work. The fact that a larger clerical force would be required in order to close up the surveying service in that State during the next fiscal year (1875) was not taken into consideration by this office, and in view of the proposed increased appropriation for winding up the surveys in the field during the next fiscal year for which an estimate of $89,700 was submitted, I suggest that you offer an amendment, recommending that provision be made for the pay of two more clerks in that office at a salary of $1,100 each, making the total appropriation for clerk hire $9,700 instead of $7,500, as submitted.

Very respectfully,

W. W. CURTIS,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. J. M. HARVEY,
United States Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think I shall not object to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I renew the amendment that I offered yesterday, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, to insert in line 381, page 17, after the word "Blanks," the words "of Files and Records and of Mails;" and to substitute in line 377, on page 16, the word "eight" for the word "ten;" so that it will read: "ten chiefs of divisions," &c.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. In lieu of that, allow me to suggest to the Senator what had better be done. Instead of "ten chiefs of divisions," it should be "ten principal clerks;" and that was what the committee agreed upon. They agreed upon ten principal clerks, and not upon ten chiefs of divisions; and the bill needs to be amended under the head of "loans" or at some other point, so as to provide for ten principal clerks, increasing the number from eight to ten. That will cover the two divisions heretofore recognized which the Senator desires to provide for, but which were not provided for by chiefs of divisions, but by principal clerks, at $2,400 instead of $3,000.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The place where the Senator proposes to amend I suppose is on page 17, line 382, to strike out "eight" and insert "ten;" so as to read "ten principal clerks of divisions."

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir; that is it. There is no objection to that. That is in harmony exactly with what the committee desired.

Mr. BOUTWELL. But it is very inharmonious with reference to the business of the Department in this particular.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will say to my honorable friend in regard to that, that I placed myself in the closest relations with the Department on the subject and ascertained that this was believed to be satisfactory and would answer the purposes of the Department.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It changes the pecuniary compensation of these two heads of divisions to the extent of $200 apiece. If left precisely as the report of the committee stands, they will receive $1,800 salary. If they are ranked as principal clerks of divisions they will receive $2,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No, they will receive $2,400.

Mr. BOUTWELL. That will be an increase of $600. That would be better.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. And that was as far as the committee thought they ought to go.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I wish to submit the matter to the Senate. Of course, if the committee are resolved that these officers shall be entitled to only $2,400, it must be so, no doubt; but when it is considered that the office of the Secretary of the Treasury is organized in twelve divisions, at the head of each of which is a chief, whose duty it is to manage the business intrusted to him by the organization, and who is responsible to the Government for what he does, and that these twelve men occupy the same relation to the Department and to the head of the Department, it is very invidious to take ten of those men and give them salaries of $3,000 each and place the other two upon salaries of $2,400; and especially will it be invidious and humiliating to those two men when by the proposition now submitted by the chairman of the committee they are to stand in the same relation with reference to salary that the chief clerk of each of the other divisions stands.

As I stated yesterday, one of these men is the head of the mail division. He received last year mutilated notes, money returned, seven-thirty bonds, bonds sent for exchange, conscience money to the amount of $30,000, (for which there is positively no security except the integrity of the officer who opens the letters containing this money;) and when you consider that there passed through his hands $109,000,000 of money and securities, I do submit that it is an act of great injustice, and I might use a stronger phrase, to place that public servant upon a salary of only $2,400 a year. He attends to a business exceeding that of the largest commercial establishment in this country, and he is getting no more per month than is paid to the officer of the Senate who stands in the lobby and brings in a card to a member of the Senate showing that there is somebody outside who wants to see him.

I do not know but that public business can be safely done upon such rules and principles of economy, but they are principles that no private man or corporation in this country would act upon for a day; and it will be with some twinges of conscience, I think, that public servants who are thus scantily paid for the performance of great duties, in moments of trial and temptation, submit to temptation and commit offenses for which they are made punishable by the law, if the law-makers put them upon so scanty a stipend that they cannot live in comfort upon the pay they receive for their services.

If this proposition cannot prevail, I shall accept that of the committee. It is nothing to me more than to any member of the Senate or citizen of the country; but as an act of justice to these men, I think the amendment I have offered should be adopted. The difference is but $1,200 between the proposition which I have the honor to submit and that of the committee.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will suggest the amendment as the committee intended to have it stand. The bill in lines 382 and 383, page 17, now reads: "Eight principal clerks of divisions, at $2,000 each." We propose to make it read: "Ten principal clerks of divisions, at $2,400 each;" and that proposition the committee understood to be satisfactory. I do not mean to commit the Department about it, and I fully appreciate what the Senator has said in regard to the heads of these divisions and the important business that constantly comes before them, and we have provided for ten divisions, and this is to supplement them by clerks.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Having provided for ten of these divisions, and for some divisions the duties of which are not to be compared with one of these for which I ask an additional appropriation, I cannot understand how this distinction is to be justified. For instance, the division of stationery, printing, and blanks is less important than the mail division of the Treasury; and yet you give $3,000 to the head of that division, and but $2,400 to the head of the other. But, sir, I will not prolong the debate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Then I ask that the amendment I have suggested be made. It is on page 17, line 382, to strike out "eight" and insert "ten," and in line 383; after the word "thousand," to insert "four hundred;" so that the clause will read:

Ten principal clerks of divisions, at $2,400 each.

The Senator from Massachusetts understands that I offer this as a substitute for his proposition.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I understand that; there is no doubt about my capacity on that point; but what I wish to know is whether the amendment which I have moved does not take precedence in the order of business?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly; if the Senator chooses to insist upon it; but the Senator is not dealing with the same subject.

Mr. BOUTWELL. My amendment was first moved.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. But your amendment is in another place. It is to strike out the word "eight," in line 377, and insert "ten."

Mr. BOUTWELL. Is not that other place open to amendment as well as this which the Senator from Maine has selected?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. But you want to add two chiefs of division, do you not?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Well, you will find the place for that in line 377.

Mr. BOUTWELL. And the Chair will remember that I made that motion before the Senator from Maine took the floor. What I now ask is that the question shall be taken on that motion.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator from Massachusetts will do me the credit to say that I was trying to enlighten him as to why I proposed to make another amendment which ought to be satisfactory to him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a hopeless task. [Laughter.] Let us vote.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I yield to the Senator's amendment, which is in order, I take it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. SCOTT in the chair.) The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was on page 16, line 377, to strike out "eight" and insert "ten," and in line 381, after the word "Blanks," to insert "of Files and Records and of Mails;" so as to make the clause read:

Ten chiefs of divisions, namely, of Appointments, of Warrants and Appropriations, of Revenue Marine and Life-saving Stations, of Customs, of Navigation, of Internal Revenue, of Sub-Treasury, of Stationery, Printing, and Blanks, of Files and, Records, and of Mails.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Upon this subject I agree that my honorable friend knows vastly more about the duties of these men and the value of their services than I do; but at the same time, having given what attention I could to the subject, I reported the bill in the best way I could, and upon the whole came to the conclusion that to provide for ten heads of divisions was sufficient. This would make twelve. Still, it is a question before the Senate and for the Senate to consider.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to make an amendment corresponding to this.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to go away, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Very well.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My attention has been called to a paragraph of this bill in section 3 which prohibits any civil officer of the Government hereafter from receiving "any compensation or perquisites, directly or indirectly, from the Treasury or property of the United States beyond his salary or compensation allowed by law," &c. Then comes this proviso:

Provided, That this shall not be construed to deprive any officer of the United States of such fees as are or may be expressly provided by law in addition to the salary or compensation of such officer, &c.

It has been called to my attention, and I am very glad that it has, that the effect of that would be to prevent the Department of Justice from employing the district attorneys, who, except in the great cities, have a salary of $200 a year, as is now done lawfully, to do a great variety of business for the Government, such as examining the title of property to be condemned, proceedings for the condemnation of property, and a great number of other proceedings which I need not now refer to, for which the law makes no provision as to payment except as it provides money for the Department of Justice to employ counsel with.

The effect of this section would be to break up a practice which is very convenient to the Government in these cases where somebody must be employed by the Government to attend to these matters, which do not fall within the duties of the district attorney as defined by law, and for doing which no fees are provided by law. In almost all the districts, as I say, the district attorney's salary is $200, and then for certain specific things provided for by the fee-bill of 1852 certain other fees are allowed to him. Then here comes this additional species of business, such as a private person has with his private counsel, respecting the business operations of the Government of various kinds, for which some counsel must be employed. The custom is, and has been, very properly, inasmuch as the district attorney is known to the Department and is generally a person of established reputation and knowledge, to send this business to him. He makes out a reasonable bill, usually about 50 per cent. less than other counsel would charge, so far as I have had opportunity to observe, which is sent to the Department and paid.

Now, then, this section standing as it does, the Attorney-General would be obliged in every instance to employ some other counsel to attend to this outside business of the Government, and he cannot employ the district attorney, unless the district attorney chooses to do this business for nothing, as of course he will not and ought not to do. If the Attorney-General does employ outside counsel, aside from the difficulty of finding the proper man and all that, he will have to pay him a very large percentage more than he now has to pay the district attorney. Therefore I move to amend this section by adding these words:

Nor to prevent the employment and payment by the Department of Justice of district attorneys as now allowed by law for the performance of services not covered by their salaries or fees.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What is that?

Mr. EDMUNDS. "Nor to prevent the employment and payment by the Department of Justice of district attorneys as now allowed by law for the performance of services not covered"—that is, not provided for—"by their salaries or fees," so as to allow the Department of Justice, as I said, to continue to do as it does now, where any law business is to be attended to for the Government, to which the district attorney is under no more obligation to give his attention than anybody else, and for which no salary or compensation is made to him by existing laws; that is, the law on neither side touches it at all; that the Department of Justice may still employ a district attorney, just as they would employ any outside counsel to do business which the law does not require the district attorney to perform and for which it provides no pay. That is the effect of it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not see that there is any possible objection to that, but at the same time I do not quite see the necessity for it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will repeat my statement to the Senator, then. I am sorry I cannot make myself more easily understood.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am sorry it is not so easy for me to understand the Senator. That is where the point comes in. It is my fault.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will repeat what I said, only more briefly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I listened with both ears.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then perhaps it will not do any good for me to restate it, but I will try.

By the existing law, I repeat, a district attorney, for illustration, is not authorized, or empowered, or required to examine the title of a piece of property condemned or to be condemned for public use. The law does not require him to do that for his $200 salary; the law does not affix any fee or compensation to him or anybody else for doing it. Under existing laws, money being furnished the Department of Justice for the incidental expenses of that Department and so on, the Attorney-General, when Congress directs a particular piece of land to be obtained, usually—that is the course of practice and it is found beneficial and convenient—sends to the district attorney a request or instructions to examine that title. He does it. It may take a day, it may take a week, depending of course upon a variety of considerations that I need not name. Then the district attorney makes his report upon the title, good or bad, and his reasons for it, and sends his bill to the Attorney-General for it, which is paid out of the money provided for the contingent expenses of the Department. The Attorney-General would have just as good a right, if it were in Vermont for instance, to send it to me or to any other counsel there, if he chose. If the law stands as you propose in this third section, then the Attorney-General cannot employ the district attorney to do that business for the Government unless the district attorney will do it without pay, for the reason that a district attorney is a civil officer of the Government of the United States, and this section provides that hereafter he shall not "receive any compensation or perquisites, directly or indirectly, from the Treasury or property of the United States beyond his salary or compensation allowed by law." Now, then, the salary allowed by law, in general, is $200. The fees allowed by law are attached to specific acts, no one of which is the examination of a title.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senator will allow me, there was exactly the point of difficulty with me. I saw the salary of a district attorney was $200, but his compensation I did not understand, what the Senator now states, and what, if he will pardon me for saying, I think he did not state before; if he did it escaped me; and therefore my inquiry was whether if he was not allowed an increase of salary it would not fall under the compensation?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir; because the fee-bill does not touch any such object.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. But now I see that the fee-bill applies to specific things, and not to this particular thing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There are a great many other similar things. I only used the examination of a title as an illustration. The fee-bill applies almost exclusively to criminal proceedings and suits in court.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have one other amendment to offer. Yesterday we adopted an amendment on the third page providing a salary of $2,160 for the superintendent of the document-room, a salary of $2,160 for the first assistant in the document-room, and a salary of $1,440 for a second assistant in the document-room of the Senate. By the law as it now stands, the salary of the superintendent of the document-room is, I believe, $1,800.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; it is $2,160.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I supposed the House bill had it just as it was.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; it was not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well; then the first amendment of the committee in this clause was intended to put the salary of the superintendent as the law now is.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well. Then as the law now stands the salary of the two assistants in the document-room is each $1,440. Both of the persons there do the same amount of work, the same kind of work, and one is just as good and faithful as the other for aught I know. Now, inasmuch as the document-room has not increased in its necessities that I know of, in respect to the keeping of printed bills and the sending of them down to Senators, I wish to move to reconsider the vote by which yesterday—of course without any question or debate—we agreed to the amendment of the committee as to the salary of these assistants. There ought not to be any such distinction made, and I do not see any ground, taking what we have done this session as a test, upon which the salaries ought to be increased.

I do not say whether or not $1,440 is sufficient to pay for young men to do that work; I do not say whether $5,000 is sufficient pay for Senators here to do this work with the expenditures they have to make; I do not go into that at all; but we have already declared, with the great approval of the people as we supposed, at this very session, that the salary of these two gentlemen should be $1,440 each, and that the salary of Senators should be $5,000, because by the act that we made such haste to repeal, passed a year ago, or whatever the time was, we had increased the salaries of these people, at least one of them, and I think both, as well as our own. Now, by the act passed this very session we have repealed that increasing act and restored all salaries to the condition in which they stood before, which brings these two persons back to $1,440 as the law stands.

I think, therefore, that under existing circumstances, and I need not go into other considerations about it which the Senate may understand, we had better for the present leave the salaries of these two assistants precisely as they now stand by law. I therefore move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted in order that I may take the sense of the Senate on disagreeing to it and leaving the salaries precisely as the law leaves them now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope the Senate by general consent will consider that vote reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to considering this vote as reconsidered? The Chair hears none. The question then recurs on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations on page 3, line 44, in relation to the salary of two assistants in the document-room.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Now I suggest that those salaries be left at $1,440 each, as they stood in the House bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to non-concur in the amendment of the committee and leave these two salaries for the present precisely as the law fixes them—at $1,440 each. We have decided by law once this year that that should be it, and I think it is changing a little too fast to raise it now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to say a single word in explanation, and then I shall not object to the suggestion of the Senator. By looking at this bill it will be seen that the House have made amendments in regard to their employés, which suggested by the way of equality that this thing should be done; but I have no objection, and do not intend to make any objection to the proposition of the Senator, to put these salaries where the law put them before.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to say in reply to the Senator from Maine that I do not make this motion upon any absolute theory that $1,440 is exactly the right sum, neither too small nor too large. I only put it upon the ground, as I say, that we have made our appearance on the theater of human affairs this winter as reformers in repealing the salary act, as it was called; and in that act of repeal we provided by law that the salary of these two officers should be $1,440 each, as we provided that the salary of Senators should go back to the old rate. Now, the Senator from Maine says that the House of Representatives has departed from the law in this appropriation bill by making an increase of the salaries of some of their employés, and in order to secure equality this provision was put in by the committee. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Maine—I dare say it has never occurred to him—that there is another method of producing equality in that respect; and that is, by disagreeing to the increase the House has made.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My honorable friend has been long enough upon the Committee on Appropriations in former years to know that we do not apply that rule at all; but there is a sort of comity between the Houses that allows each House to fix the compensation of its own employés.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think we had better get over that rule.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I make no opposition to this proposition.

Mr. FLANAGAN. The standard invoked by my distinguished friend from Vermont does not suit me upon this occasion. He is willing candidly to admit that he did not do himself justice when he was voting upon the subject of salaries.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; I have not admitted anything of the kind.

Mr. FLANAGAN. Then I was willing to give you more credit than you require.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well; I only take that which belongs to me.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I was in hopes that you were correct on that branch of the subject. I thought you were. However, it is sufficient for me to say that I do not think the Senator did do himself justice on that occasion. I will modify my language. Now, because we did not, as I hold, do justice to ourselves, I do not think we ought to visit that sin upon the employés of the Senate; and, for one, I am not disposed to cut them down. I am always for liberal compensation, and then requiring good service; and I think we have that here. For my part, briefly, I am opposed to reducing this sum as proposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee in lines 44, 45, 46, 47, and 48, on the third page of the bill.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill on page 18. The purport of the amendment is to increase the salaries of the chief clerks of the First and Second Comptrollers of the Treasury. While I am not usually in favor of high salaries or an increase of salaries, yet I am ever willing to do what I believe to be justice to those who are in the service of this Government. I am satisfied from information that I have that these gentlemen are not properly compensated for the services which they render the Government, and therefore I offer this amendment, which proposes to increase their salaries from $2,000 to $2,500. Those officers are charged with duties that are very responsible, and I am satisfied from what I can learn of the services which they perform that they are not properly compensated for the service which they render the country. I therefore move to increase the salaries of the chief clerks of the First and Second Comptroller to $2,500. The force in the Comptroller's office has been reduced, and as a consequence the duties of the chief clerks will be increased, and they will hereafter be required to perform other services than those which they have performed in the past. I hope that as an act of justice to faithful public officers this amendment will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware moves to amend the bill on page 18, line 418, by inserting after the word "thousand" the words "five hundred," and also to make the same amendment in line 425; so as to read in each case "chief clerk, $2,500."

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I dislike to raise a question of order on my honorable friend; but the adoption of this amendment would be of evil example, and we should be obliged to follow it to such an extent, if we once enter upon that field, that I feel constrained to raise a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope the Senator will not raise any point of order on this amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I know it is very meritorious, and I know all about the amendment in the sense in which my honorable friend does; but these clerks are chief clerks of Bureaus, and they have the same salary as other chief clerks of Bureaus. They are meritorious gentlemen; they perform very excellent service in every way; and in my judgment they are entitled to more salary, and I am very glad to find that a bill has been reported elsewhere which contemplates this very thing; but this is not the place for us to begin to raise salaries. The question of order is that there has been no notice given to the Committee on Appropriations, such as the rules contemplate, of this increase of appropriation.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should be very glad if the honorable Senator from Maine would withdraw that point of order. He admits that this proposition has merit in itself; that these officers are not properly paid; and if that is the case, he ought not to want these gentlemen to perform the service for the Government which they are performing for their present pay. I appeal to the Senator to withdraw the point of order he makes.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If it were a matter of personal favor to my honorable friend I would do it; but as a matter of public duty I do not think I can.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine raises a point of order on this amendment, which under the thirtieth rule is sustained. The amendment is not in order.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. On page 73, to correspond to an amendment made on page 17, I move to amend by striking out in line 22, of section 4, the word "two" and inserting "four;" so as to make the number of clerks at $2,200 each in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury four instead of two.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. In line 172, on page 8, I move to strike out "$1,800" and insert "$2,088;" so as to read "first assistant postmaster, $2,088," this being an officer of the House of Representatives.

I offer the amendment for the reason that that is the salary now provided by law, and I presume there is no one who is conversant with the duties of this office but knows the necessity of at least paying something. It is an office in which there is a great deal of labor. The amount of mail matter from the House of Representatives, with the number of members there, makes it an office with very onerous duties. It does seem to me that at least it ought to stand on the compensation now provided by law. It has been changed from $2,088 to $1,800 in this bill, making quite a difference. I hope the committee will not object to having the legal salary reinstated in the bill.

Mr. WEST. The Senator states that the salary now provided by law is $2,088, while it stands in the bill at $1,800. I think the Senator is mistaken. The salary was increased to $2,038 by the act of March 3, 1873, but under what is called the "back-pay repeal" that salary fell back to what it now stands at in the bill, $1,800; and were we to adopt the Senator's amendment it would be making an exception in favor of this one officer over and above all the other employés of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. LOGAN. When I stated that the salary was $2,088 by law, I had reference to the law. It is immaterial at what time it passed, March 3, 1873, or any other time.

Mr. WEST. That law was repealed.

Mr. LOGAN. Fixing this salary? When?

Mr. WEST. By the salary-repeal bill.

Mr. LOGAN. This is the salary fixed by the last appropriation bill, and which of course continues up to the time that this appropriation bill takes effect.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am very sorry to apprise my honorable friend from Illinois that he is not within the rules under which we are proceeding on this bill, and I shall be obliged to raise a question of order on his amendment. This increases an appropriation, which does not come within the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine raise the point of order?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the thirtieth rule of the Senate the point of order is sustained.

Mr. LOGAN. A point of order is much more effective in defeating a proposition than a vote. Of course I cannot say any more if the point of order is raised and sustained. I did not suppose there would be any objection, however.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. On page 72, line 1 of section 3, I move to insert after the words "civil officer" the words "except the Commissioner of Agriculture."

It seems singular to me that this section should be leveled at so important an officer as the Commissioner of Agriculture. Evidently this is intended to prevent the Commissioner from occupying his present sumptuous apartments at the Department of Agriculture, consisting of five or six rooms, to prevent his having his fuel, his coal, and gas free of expense, and I do not exactly comprehend why he should be so singled out.

This department is one of some magnitude, and deservedly so. There are other things which I hardly understand. In proportion to the amount expended, the head of this department is the superior of the Secretary of State; and why should he be stuck in at the tail end of the bill here when an appropriation larger for clerks under his employ is made than is made for those under the Secretary of State? In 1870 I think our appropriations for this office only amounted to about $130,000. By the present bill it will be seen that they amount, if I have added correctly, to $236,480. Now, when we have an officer who will magnify his office in this way, I do not think that he ought to be pursued by such legislation as this.

Then, again, he is somewhat distinguished by the personnel of his office. I think that he has done great good in the selection of the men who compose the staff of his department. In looking over the list of appointments I find that there are about forty-five clerks and employés in this department, of whom fifteen, as it has been represented to me, come from Pennsylvania, and certainly I have no complaint for that. That is all right. I presume they are all worthy men. We have in the pay of the Government the Commissioner in the first place, coming from Pennsylvania; and then we have F. Watts as chief clerk, at the amount of $2,000, though I must say I really think from all I have heard that he is an excellent clerk. Then we have another of the Wattses, William Watts, at a cost of $1,800. Why, Mr. President, in looking over the names of these Wattses, one is almost disposed to exclaim with the ancient progenitor, perhaps, of the Wattses—

> Strange that a harp of a thousand strings
> Should keep in tune so long.

We have another Pennsylvanian by the name of Helmick, at a salary of $1,800; another one by the name of Grosh, at $1,800. Then, again, we have two more at $1,600, Mr. Bradley and Mr. Smith. Then we have three more at $1,200, Mr. Nagle, Mr. Sprigman, and Mr. Cobaugh. Then we have one more at the rate of $1,400, Mr. Wilson. Then we have an engineer, Mr. Stahl, at $1,400. Then we have an assistant chemist, at $1,600; and then we have three messengers, Mr. Burke and Mr. Thomas and Mr. Greenough, at $720. Then we have one by the name of Williams. I am not sure whether this is the one or not, but some one, I have been told, was brought from Pennsylvania and used as a sort of waiter or driver or something else. Then we have a Mrs. Coones, at $900; Miss Swank, at $900; and Mrs. Duke, at two dollars per day, all from Pennsylvania. Then we have Mr. Saunders, at $2,000, and a very competent man, too.

Mr. CAMERON. Is he from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Yes, sir. In the case of a gentleman who is so thrifty in the management of his department, I think it is unhandsome that we should level a section at him as appears to have been done in this bill. And, besides that, it has been proposed at the present session that we should build some seed-rooms at an expense of $10,000. Why should we give up these rooms that are occupied by this distinguished Commissioner and not build those rooms that are asked for?

And, again, have we not all of us distributed more or less of a peculiar kind of ne plus ultra wheat; and where could it come from except from the farm—I may be mistaken, but I understand that there has been some considerable amount of wheat and corn and rye sold to the department at very good prices. I will not assert that it comes from the farm of the Commissioner, although there is such a rumor.

I have no doubt if it did come from there it was the best kind that could be had in the country. The Commissioner is a good judge of it, and he would not presume to sell or distribute anything except of the best kind; and when he has got anything of the poorer sort I believe it is publicly known that whatever might be the cost he has not failed to dispose of it in some other way than by distribution to the public.

I understand that some rye has been procured at a cost of a dollar a bushel, and sold at auction at sixty cents in Alexandria. Whether it be true or not, I cannot say; but I have been so informed.

Now, Mr. President, it does seem to me that a Commissioner of Agriculture who will so magnify his office as this gentleman appears to have done ought not to be singled out for any special legislation of this kind; and I have moved, therefore, the amendment which I have offered, that he shall be excepted from the operation of the third section of this bill.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I am sorry that the Senator from Vermont, a gentleman usually so liberal, should allow himself to be influenced by a little—I was going to say spite; but that is not the word I want to use—"pique" probably would be better, because it is said some friend of his unfit for the place was removed from the position of chief clerk of this department——

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. O, no.

Mr. CAMERON. I do not assert that, and the Senator did not assert anything that he said positively. I do not assert this positively; but it is so said. It is also said that the Senator from Vermont made great efforts to have numerous persons from Vermont and other parts of the country around him in New England appointed to places in that department, and failed to get them all fixed as he wanted.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Will the Senator allow me——

Mr. CAMERON. I did not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Senator does not mean to state anything of that kind.

Mr. CAMERON. Nor did you.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I never made application to the Commissioner for a single appointment.

Mr. CAMERON. I am saying what I say in the same sort of kindness that the Senator from Vermont uttered what he did. It has turned out also that a man who was unfit to be chief clerk and was removed from that place was, on the special application of the Senator from Vermont, placed in a lower situation which he, qualified so well for a high place, was glad to take at a lower compensation. I dare say these are untruths; but I say they are stated with the same force with which the Senator has stated his case.

Now a word as to Judge Watts. He may have one or two of his relations in the Department of Agriculture. I should like to find a Department in this Government in the city of Washington that has not got in it somewhere a relation or a connection of the head of it. I think I could find a good many of them in many of the Departments.

But it is said that he lives in the house where the department is located. When that building was put up and taken possession of by the Commissioner of Agriculture, then from Illinois, he called upon me, as I was at the time chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, and said that he could save a messenger and various persons as a guard there if he were allowed to occupy with his family a portion of the house which was not wanted for the office. I said I had no authority to give him that permission, but he might take possession and as long as it was not needed nobody would disturb him. He was there and occupied the place for several years. Judge Watts succeeded him and occupied just the place and the rooms which had been occupied by the former Commissioner, as I believe. Besides that, Judge Watts was invited there, refused to accept the position, and was urged by the President to accept it because of his great fitness for it. Judge Watts is a man of high culture, a man of the highest character for integrity and intelligence and purity of character that there is in the State of Pennsylvania or in the State of Vermont. He is a gentleman in every sense of the word. He has spent his large income from his profession for long years in benefiting the science of agriculture. He did a great deal of benefit to the country before he came to this office, and since he has been there he has conducted it with great zeal, and I believe with great ability. There is no purer man anywhere than he. I know that he refused to accept it at first. When it was tendered to him through myself, I said, "Judge Watts, you will be harassed by all sorts of people in Congress if you take it, and I trust you are not going to accept it;" and he refused, and afterward was solicited by the President to accept it.

I do not know how many people he has in his department who come from Pennsylvania. It may be perhaps that some of them are unfit for the places they hold; but the Senator from Vermont has named a man by the name of Grosh. Let me tell the Senator that he happened to be born in the good State of Pennsylvania, but he emigrated to New York and lived there a long life. He is a chemist, I think. He is certainly a man of very high culture and of much scientific fitness for the place he holds.

Then the Senator named poor old Mrs. Duke, the daughter of the first man in the United States who devoted his time to horticulture and agriculture and fruit culture and who made a name for himself which extended all over the country. That poor old woman he says gets $200 a year. God bless her! I wish she got $1,000. I knew her father well, and I know her well, and I am sorry she is compelled in her declining years to depend on a pittance from the Government for services rendered by her.

I do not know how many of Judge Watts's family he has in the department, but I know that whoever of them are there are fitted for the places they fill; and I know Judge Watts is too proud a man to keep his position a day if he thought his occupying it was unacceptable to the country.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I merely desire to say that while I did at the solicitation of the chief clerk at the time of the change give him a letter of recommendation to Judge Watts, it never was any offense to me that he should select his own chief clerk. I considered that that was his duty, and I may say that I have not the slightest personal feeling toward Judge Watts. I think he is a man of intelligence, but I do not think that he is exactly the fit man for this place. I think that some other man might be selected who would discharge the duties with more acceptance to the country; and in this I agree with the convention of agriculturists that assembled here two years ago at his own request, by whom a committee was appointed at the time to wait upon the President and ask him to make a change in that department. That seemed to be the sentiment then, and I have no doubt it is the sentiment now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senator will yield to me long enough to make a single observation, I shall be glad.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Yes, sir; and I will withdraw the amendment, because I think the Senate is so full that I shall be voted down.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I was about to say that the tenor and spirit of the Senator's remarks would justify me in asking him to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. I was about to make the request that the Senator would not withdraw the amendment for a moment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will renew it for the Senator's accommodation.

Mr. SCOTT. It was evident from the exception which was sought to be made and from the manner in which the Senator from Vermont advocated it, that his amendment was offered for the purpose of being voted down, simply to hang his speech upon, for while he said that he supposed this section was aimed at the Commissioner of Agriculture he himself according to the tenor of his amendment would have had the Senate believe that the Commissioner of Agriculture was the only one among all the public officers of the United States who ought to be excepted from the operation of this section. According to recent history, it was not aimed at the Commissioner of Agriculture. If we are all to re-enforce our fancies with the facts that have occurred within the last few months, we could probably give a different origin to this amendment altogether than anything connected with the office of the Commissioner of Agriculture. I did not rise, however, for any purpose of that character; but as the Senator from Vermont has sought through the Commissioner of Agriculture, Judge Watts, to cast some aspertions upon the State of Pennsylvania as crowding into that Department for clerkships, I wish to say one word on that subject.

I concur in every word my colleague has said as to the high character of Judge Watts. I know personally that he went to that department at the urgent solicitation of others who wished his services there, and rather against his own inclinations. I know that as a lawyer, as a judge, as the head of at least one railroad company in the State of Pennsylvania, as the president of the Agricultural College, and as the associate of many of the most distinguished men in that State, he had acquired a character for integrity, intelligence, and business ability of which any man even at his years might be proud; and I am somewhat surprised if with that character for business ability his administration of the Agricultural Department should in any quarter be proved a failure. Certainly the amount of appropriation which is given in this bill by the popular branch of Congress in response to the demand of the people would not indicate that confidence in the department as dying out. When $126,000 last year was appropriated and it is swelled, according to the statement of the Senator from Vermont, this year to $236,000, it would seem that those members of the House of Representatives who have the agricultural interests of the country in charge have deemed that the department should be enlarged in its operations instead of restricted.

But it is said that there is a large number of clerks in that department from Pennsylvania. I should suppose that the Senator from Vermont would rather have kept that in the background. I believe that for the last year or so the civil-service rules have been in operation, and that it is only upon examination and upon proficiency that clerks are admitted into the Departments; and with the well-known modesty of New England upon that subject, I should have supposed that the Senator from Vermont would have been rather disposed to be silent in reference to the proportion Pennsylvania had obtained in any of the Departments over the competition from New England.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I merely want to say in relation to this very point that in order that the State of Pennsylvania might receive this great consideration the civil-service rules never have been enforced in that department.

Mr. SCOTT. That statement perhaps may be somewhat of the same character as the reports that my colleague has heard with reference to the Senator from Vermont. I do not know from whom he gets his information, but evidently he gets a great deal of it from that department.

I think that I may avail myself of this opportunity to say that it is somewhat singular that complaint should be made that a number of clerkships are given to Pennsylvania, even if it be not under the civil-service rules. Why, Mr. President, we have thought that we were a very uncomplaining people on the subject of the number of those who were in public employment. We have been called upon I believe generally to support the Administration which is in power. We find ourselves flanked on the north by New York with a Cabinet officer, on the south by another in Maryland, on the east by another in New Jersey, on the west by another in Ohio, and in every one of those States, if I were to go through the list of appointments, in all probability these Cabinet officers are again flanked by ministers abroad and by other high dignitaries under the Administration; and it is not singular that with this total neglect of the State in the higher offices of the Government, some few clerkships should be conceded to it by the Commissioner of Agriculture who happens to come from that State.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont has accomplished his purpose. He has been permitted to quote from Isaac Watts for the purpose of derogating from the present Frederick Watts. He has been permitted to say in his way why the present Commissioner of Agriculture is the only public officer who ought to be permitted to use the public property for his private purposes; and having risen simply for the purpose of making this semi-vindication of Pennsylvania against his semi-assault upon it through Judge Watts, I shall not further object to his withdrawing his amendment.

Mr. CAMERON. Before it is withdrawn I desire to say a word. No matter how many persons may be in the Department of Agriculture from Pennsylvania, nobody has been appointed at my request by Judge Watts. I think not a single clerk or a single appointee in that office got his place through my intercession, except poor old Mrs. Duke and one or two other old women; certainly not a male clerk or employé there has ever had my recommendation, and it has never been asked. Perhaps Judge Watts found these Pensylvanians there when he went to the department and merely continued them.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not want to discuss the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The amendment of the Senator from Vermont is withdrawn.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There is an amendment to that section bearing upon this subject which I propose to make. The amendment I propose to the third section is to add:

Nor to prevent the Commissioner of Agriculture from occupying the apartments in the buildings of that department.

I suppose that the effect of the third section would be to make it unlawful for the Commissioner to occupy those apartments. Now, it is well known that those apartments have been occupied for years by the predecessor of Judge Watts, and are occupied by him. The salary of the Commissioner is but $3,000 a year. I take it that it is advantageous to the department that he should there reside. At all events, in this indirect way I do not think it would be proper to oust him of his occupation there, and therefore I propose the amendment to come in at the end of the third section.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Whatever the practice may have been in regard to one of the officers occupying with his family a public building dedicated to a particular branch of the public service, I hope we shall not go to the length of legislating an officer with his family into a public building created for a public purpose.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I would ask my friend whether the section as it stands is not legislating on this subject?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not think it is legislating on that subject particularly. It may include and very likely does include that practice; but this amendment, for the first time I suppose, recognizes the existence of such a fact. I would not like to say, for I do not care to speak about the thing, that I believe this case ought to be an exception. I should regret to see such an exception made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the amendment by adding "nor to prevent any official of the Treasury Department from occupying suitable rooms in the Treasury building."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I merely wish to say as the Senate has refused to allow a very valuable and much respected officer of the Treasury Department to occupy his quarters in that building, that I do not see how you are going to make a distinction and allow this gentleman to occupy the Department of Agriculture any longer.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not know what the circumstances are in reference to the occupation at the Treasury Department. If the Senator from Vermont will state that some person is in charge there and that the security of the assets and papers and money of the Treasury is promoted by having that individual live there, I will vote for his amendment. But no such statement was made, and it was generally understood I presume in the Senate that that amendment was moved for the purpose of loading the amendment which I proposed.

I think that the amendment I have proposed—and I move it in good faith—is a proper one. There are in the building of the Department of Agriculture accommodations which have been used for years by the Commissioner of Agriculture. The Commissioner who came from Illinois, Mr. Capron, occupied them for several years. Judge Watts came from Pennsylvania with a salary of $3,000. He entered into those same apartments and is there with his family, and he has a general supervision over the attention that is paid to the different conservatories on the grounds, and to the work which is there carried on. I hope the Senate will adopt the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I proposed the amendment that I offered in harmony with the civil-rights bill and with the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States; and that is, that we are to have equal rights and privileges in this country. If the head of the Department of Agriculture is going to have a public dwelling place at the public expense for his accommodation as he has, then I say the Treasurer of the United States ought to continue to have the private rooms and quarters that he has in the Treasury; and I might go on if I chose and name two or three similar cases, and so on, and so on; and so as to have the thing equal all around we ought to add that Senators should be provided as we might be with apartments in this building to the great advantage of the public business, I have no doubt, because then we should never be without a quorum. We ought to have them if other officers are to be provided with residences in the public buildings. It would be a great advantage to the public business if we could be kept here a little more strictly than we are now.

The Senator says that this gentleman's presence is necessary in the department building to avoid a messenger and guards, that he is a fidus Achates there, who is to stand watch to secure the interests of the United States. What is he to do all night after office hours? Is he to prevent the wheat from sprouting? Is he to prevent thieves from breaking in and stealing seed-corn, or something of that kind?

You will find, Mr. President, if you look at the appropriations for this department, that as it has increased in dignity by having the head of it reside in it, it has also increased in the importance and number of the sub-officials who stand around him, to keep guard over him I should suppose. It is a delusion to tell us that any messengers or watchmen have been dispensed with on account of the fact that the head of the office occupies that building. I do not speak of Judge Watts any more than of his predecessor; I have not anything personal about this business so far as I know, but I have regarded as a public abuse that ought to be abated the occupation of this building by that gentleman or any other; and in other Departments, so far as any such practice has crept in, it is a public abuse which is a reproach in the eyes of the people, and is one of the things that lead the people to believe, as far as they do, that there are a great many things wrong in Washington which the Senators and Representatives might correct if they only chose to do it.

Now, the House of Representatives have sent us a bill wherein they have appeared to choose to declare that the public property of the United States shall be used only for public purposes, and not for private advantage and gain, whether it is in house rent, or in horse hire, or in whatever it may be. It is proposed that we shall make the eminent example suggested by the Senator from New Jersey of excepting the official who has charge of the Bureau of Agriculture from the operation of this section. I cannot see, in all seriousness, the fair and equal justice upon which such a distinction is to be made between this gentleman and other officers, and I cannot see the propriety of making any such exception at all. The fact is, and everybody knows it, the Senator I think as well as everybody else, that it is not the thing to be done to have any public officer under any circumstances occupying for his private comfort the public property, either for his house or his lodgings or for his private use in any way. When the United States get so poor that they cannot employ watchmen to take care of that building at night, if that is the point, then it will be time enough to provide by law that the Commissioner of Agriculture may be a watchman, and that he shall have his office as watchman there and stay in it; but as long as we are able to provide the ordinary people to take care of the public property we ought not to submit ourselves to the just criticism of the people of the United States in respect to the "soft places," as they are called, that are provided by crooked ways and without authority of law for favored officials at the capital.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I do not think that it amounts to much for Senators to stand up and tell how wonderfully able the United States Government is to pay its officials. That does not give them any support whatever. Now, what are the circumstances? My friend said that he thought I knew that there was an impropriety in this thing. My honest conviction is that it will be a dishonest thing not to pass the amendment. Under what circumstances did Judge Watts take that place? There were apartments occupied by his predecessor, and had been for years, and he was invited to come here under those circumstances, with a salary of $3,000. There is no abuse about it. It is to the advantage of the department that the Commissioner should live there. It has been done openly, done with the acquiescence of all branches of the Government, nobody objecting to it for the course of seven or eight years. Now I assert that it is hardly honest for us to say to him, after he has accepted this position under these circumstances with the acquiescence of the Government in the practice of his predecessor, "We will deprive you of that part of your emoluments which you had a right to presume upon when you accepted the place." It does not do any good to tell the employés of the Government how wonderfully able we are to pay them, and that when we get poor we will let them know it. This is not an abuse. The abuse will be in depriving this officer of that compensation which he had a fair right to anticipate.

But further, Mr. President, the State of Vermont seems to have some peculiar antipathy to Judge Watts. They have picked him out, and both the Senators have made speeches in reference to him, I think rather ridiculing the old gentleman, especially the Senator who first addressed the Senate. I do not know what his offense has been. I do think that it would be a great deal better for the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] instead of saying that he did not charge that he bought wheat from his own farm and sold it to the Government; instead of saying that he did not charge that this officer bought wheat at a dollar a bushel and sold it for sixty cents a bushel, to have said that it was so, and to have furnished the proof, or else not to have made that imputation against the character of this gentleman. As the head of the Agricultural Committee, I must say that I never have heard of any of these charges, or I should have felt it my duty to make them known and have them investigated.

I submit, Mr. President, that we ought to make this law plain. If we mean that this officer and his successors shall be deprived of the right of occupying these apartments, let us say so; and if we mean that he shall stay there, let us make that equally plain; and it is for that purpose that I have offered this amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from New Jersey says that I have attacked his protégé. I did not know it before——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. He is not my protégé. I assure the Senator I have not seen him this session of Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is what makes me think he is the Senator's protégé, for if he had seen him there might have been a change in this abuse of the occupation of public buildings.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not think there is anything in the appearance of Judge Watts but what will compare favorably with any of us.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Undoubtedly; and I have no doubt if the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture had seen the Commissioner of Agriculture, the Commissioner of Agriculture would have stated to the chairman that he hoped he would propose an amendment which would rectify the apparent inconsistency of a public official living at public expense in a public building. But the trouble is that the Senator at the head of that committee and the official have not had the pleasure of meeting and conferring about the public interest respecting agriculture. I do not say it is the fault of the Senator; I do not say it is the fault of the Commissioner; but we have the fact here that the line of communication between the Committee on Agriculture and the Commissioner of Agriculture seems to be broken up. They have not met. That being the case, I am not surprised that the Senator from New Jersey, against the wishes of this official I cannot help thinking, if he is the kind of gentleman who is named—I do not know that I ever saw him but once in my life, and certainly he is a very fine appearing and excellent old gentleman, and he was a very good judge of the supreme court of Pennsylvania when he was a judge, a man who pronounced very good opinions indeed, according to my humble estimation; and so thinking, I cannot help believing that the Senator from New Jersey is doing an injustice to the head of this department in insisting upon it that he should be singled out as an object of attack, for this amendment offered by the Senator does attack him, in my opinion, when by general legislation we are undertaking to correct what most people in the United States believe to be an abuse.

Then we have the old argument that this was always so. The Senator says his predecessor did this, and if the department had lasted long enough the predecessor of the last one did it, and so on backward until you are almost in the gloom of antiquity. What then? Are you never going to stop an abuse for that reason? Is there no better argument in favor of this than the fact that it has been done? There are embezzlements in the Treasury Department; there are uses of public money by public officials, as we have been told, under former administrations. Is that to be an argument for the use of public money by public officials under the present Administration? By no means. The Senator does not mean that. Why, then, does he urge the fact that some predecessor of this man had been doing what he knew the law did not give him the slightest right to do, and that therefore this is to be justified because his predecessor had violated the law and had violated public propriety? That is not a good argument, in my opinion. Undoubtedly it is the best one the Senator from New Jersey can bring forward, because we all know him too well not to know that he produces his best arguments first; and that is the argument! I submit to the Senator, Mr. President, and to you, that it is not an argument on which we can act. If it is right in itself, if the public interests require and the public judgment dictates that this official shall occupy the public buildings for himself and his family, then let us say so because it is right; let us say so in other cases because it is right wherever it exists, and provide for it where it does not; but do not let us suppose, and do not let the Senator imagine, I beg him to believe, so far as I am concerned, that the impropriety of this thing in my mind rests on the fact that the gentleman who occupies the place is the person whom he is. I know nothing for him or against him. I only know him by reputation as an official who does business there. That is all; and the Senator has no right to impute to me any more than he says I have a right to impute to this gentleman, as I have not done, any improper motive or consideration in resisting the amendment which the Senator has presented to the Senate on the subject. That is what I have to say.

Mr. PRATT. I should like to inquire of my friend from Vermont, as I know very little about the matters of this department and the needs of the public for the different rooms in it, whether the rooms which are occupied by the head of the department are necessary for the public use.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know whether they are or not, and that is not material to my purpose. I know that this Government pays in this city more than $100,000, perhaps more than $200,000 a year, for rent of rooms for mere storage and a variety of things, where papers are stuffed away; and if these apartments are not needed for the strict uses of the Agricultural Bureau, then let the head of that Department, the Secretary of the Interior, who is hiring rooms at thousands and tens of thousands of dollars a year every year for the incidental purposes of his Department, occupy them for something. The public needs the rooms; there is no question about that. Whether they are needed to pile seeds in or transact the special business of that department, I do not know.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I only desire to say that, so far as I am concerned, I have not moved in this matter from any other sense than a sense of public duty. I have no personal grievance to complain of whatever in the slightest respect. But here is an abuse which has been growing for several years. It originated in the first instance because the building while in progress of construction it was thought ought to have some one to be in charge of it; and General Capron therefore, having only his wife as his family, went in and occupied it, as he said, for the purpose of guarding and protecting the building when the workmen were away. But when this gentleman came there, there were additional rooms fitted up at an expense, as I have understood, of a considerable amount of money, $1,500, and from what source it came I know not, but they were specially fitted up for his accommodation, he having a large family.

Now the pretense that he is there as a watchman, as a guardian of this building, is quite unfounded; for if you will look back to previous appropriations you will find, in 1868 and 1869, there were but two watchmen, and yet this bill provides for three watchmen. If Judge Watts is there as a watchman, what necessity is there for increasing the number of watchmen? And then is it not, in all seriousness, something of a complaint that is well founded, when an officer, who has no more title to quarters than any other head of a Bureau in a Department, receiving a stated salary, shall also occupy rooms, and not only occupy rooms, but take his supply of coal for years and years at the public crib, and have his gas bills paid at the Treasury Department? It seems to me that here is an abuse, and I may say that I have not been informed of it by any one in the Department of Agriculture. The agricultural papers throughout the country are denouncing this department, and if the Senator from New Jersey would examine the agricultural papers he would scarcely find a week going over but that there are complaints made in relation to the efficiency of this department. I have said, Mr. President, all I desire to say.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont farthest from me [Mr. EDMUNDS] asked whether it was any argument in favor of continuing embezzlements that they had existed heretofore. I do not think it is, and I think that there is just the sophistry of the objection of the Senator from Vermont. He characterizes the occupation of this building by the Commissioner as an abuse, as a crooked way, when according to my apprehension he is entitled to the occupation of it, and was from the beginning. The Commissioner of Agriculture had with the concurrence of all parts of this Government lived there, not to watch the building while it was being put up; but Mr. Capron lived there for years, and Judge Watts was called at a salary of $3,000 and took the Commissioner's place. Now, I say that there is nothing crooked, there is no embezzlement, there is nothing of that character about the transaction. If you want to reduce his salary, reduce it. If you want to continue his compensation the same, turn him out of the building if you will, but make up for it in salary. But this idea of making a raid upon the Commissioner, who is not represented here, because the agricultural papers in the country are dissatisfied with him, I will not second.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Did not the Commissioner of Agriculture when the Government appointed him know that the law did not authorize the occupation of this public property by his predecessor?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I presume he did not know any such thing. I suppose that if the Commissioner of Agriculture found that there were rooms habitable which had been occupied for years by his predecessor, without examining the statutes or knowing anything about their provisions or being told to the contrary, he would suppose, as the Senator would suppose, that he was to take the place and was to be there on the spot to see that the conservatories and the greenhouses and all this work was properly looked to; and that is just the point where I think the injustice comes in of this indirect legislation.

Mr. CAMERON. This debate has gone much further than I supposed it could go; and I think it has got down to a very narrow point now. I am sorry to find that my respected friend from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] should have taken a part in it. The Senator from Vermont who began the war [Mr. MORRILL] did it as a piece of pleasantry. Now, I have so high an opinion of Judge Watts, that I do not believe he would stay in this building a day if he thought it was against the law or if he thought it was againt the wishes of any Senator or any member of Congress. I am sure he does not care about the place, and I am also sure that he would not be driven out of it because of any war upon him by newspapers or politicians or even by members of Congress. He is a man of as high tone as any gentleman here, and in his own neighborhood holds as high a position in society and as a lawyer and as a gentleman as anybody in any State of this Union. I was surprised when he accepted the place; I am surprised that he continues in it; but he is there probably as a matter of pride, because he has devoted long years to the subject of agriculture. He believes that he can be of great service to the country; and I have no doubt he will be.

The newspapers probably attack him because when that agricultural meeting was here pains were taken by persons who wanted his place to make a bad impression upon them, and he took no pains to remove it; nor did he ever try to make an impression upon Congress. Nobody has seen him loitering about those galleries; nobody has seen him button-holing Senators and Members of Congress as other Commissioners did before him. He has gone only to the chairmen of the Committees on Agriculture of the two Houses, and he has told them what he believed were the wants of his department. In no one case has he demeaned himself so as to beg or to let anybody suppose he did not think himself in the performance of his duty the equal of those he addressed.

The Smithsonian Institution is just alongside of him in the next square. That building to be sure was not constructed exactly by Congress, but I believe Congress is constantly making appropriations for it; and the chief of the institution lives there with all his family, and has from the beginning of the existence of the institution. So it has always been according to my belief—and I think I am right—and nobody has complained of that. That institution, I know, originated from the donation of an individual which gave it its name, and it is generally supposed that that fund sustains it entirely; but I believe the fact is otherwise. Judge Watts is just as respectable a man as Professor Henry, the head of the Smithsonian Institution, just as able a man as he—not in the same pursuits exactly, but Judge Watts in his own town has always lived as a gentleman of fortune should do. There is no house in Pennsylvania, certainly in the interior of Pennsylvania, where hospitality has been dispensed more liberally and more pleasantly than his house. I know that he did not want this place, and I feel sure that if he supposed he was to be insulted every year he would not remain there.

We have heard much about the persons appointed in his office. I learn from my colleague that there are but twelve clerks there altogether, Pennsylvanians and all. Judge Watts, as I have said, never appointed anybody at my request; and I think he found nearly all the people who are in the Department there before he came there; perhaps he made a few changes, but nearly all were there when he came there.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I have felt some delicacy about participating in the discussion on this question, because it was intimated that objections were made in this case because certain parties were not able to secure the appointment of their own friends to this position; and in family matters I never mean to obtrude myself. I have not risen now to discuss this matter, but to call attention to another fact; and that is whether under existing circumstances the appropriation of $230,000 for the Agricultural Department is not a matter which ought to be inquired into?

What special advantage is derived from the existence of the Agricultural Department? That is a question which addresses itself to us. Not a single report, monthly or annual, can be sent out unless by the Commissioner himself. In our extreme virtue we have denied ourselves the privilege of sending to our constituents garden seeds, public documents, and even our own speeches; so that to-day the Agricultural Department, so far as the farming interest of this country is concerned, is a mere myth. I inquire what good is it doing for the advancement of agriculture in this country? And yet we are appropriating in this bill a quarter of a million of dollars to sustain an agricultural Bureau. I suppose it is to hold out the false delusion and idea to the agricultural portion of this country that their interests are being considered by Congress. We are protecting the manufacturing interest by our tariff laws; we are protecting the commercial interest of this country in various ways; and yet the only tribute of respect even that has been paid to the agricultural interest of this country has been the establishment of an agricultural Bureau which to-day is not worth a farthing to the agricultural interest of this country.

We are publishing the monthly reports of the Commissioner and the annual reports of the Commissioner to the extent of twenty-five thousand copies, which he has the privilege, as the head of that department, to send to political and personal favorites if he deems it proper to do so. We have denied ourselves the poor privilege of sending a single copy even of a monthly report or of an annual report of that Commissioner to those whom we desire to communicate with, unless we do it at our own expense. I think instead of inquiring as to whether the Agricultural Commissioner should reside in that department, the inquiry ought to be directed to whether we should appropriate a quarter of a million dollars to keep up that Agricultural Department at all. So far as I am concerned, believing that it is no particular advantage to the agricultural interests of the country, I am ready now, if this thing is to be continued, if nobody is to have the privilege of sending out a single garden seed except the Commissioner, if no person is to have the legal privilege of sending an annual or monthly report of the Commissioner to the farmers of the country except the Commissioner himself, to record my vote against any appropriation for the continuance of that department.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to say anything upon the general question adverted to by the Senator from Delaware as to the propriety of continuing this department, except to say before I dismiss that part of the question that I am one of those who believe that very great and many advantages have resulted to this country from the establishment of this Bureau. In connection with this central work there have been established in many States of the Union agricultural colleges, agricultural fairs, and organizations which have helped not a little in developing this the great interest and industry of this country. Representing one of the great agricultural States of this Union in part upon this floor, I am prepared at all times to vote as liberally for the support of this Bureau, if not more so, than any other connected with this Government. I believe that in proportion as we encourage and sustain and support this Bureau, in the same proportion do we tend to support an industry in the country without which we can have but little if any prosperity in this great land.

But my purpose rather was to speak of the amendment now proposed by the Senator from New Jersey. Representing, as I have already said, in part an agricultural State upon this floor, I have ever given my support as far as possible to every proposition suggested for the strengthening or the encouragement of this Bureau. I understand the amendment now proposed is based upon two grounds. One is that it is necessary for the better service of the Bureau; and the other is because the evil, if it be an evil, has continued for some time, and therefore it should be continued still.

Now, Mr. President, as a friend of the best organization of this Bureau, as anxious as any one here for its efficiency, as anxious that it should occupy a ground that shall give it confidence in the public mind, I am free to say that I shall feel compelled to vote against this amendment. In the first place it occurs to me that the general proposition contained in the bill that the public property shall not be used by officials for private purposes, that the help or labor of those in the public service shall not be used by others in the public service for their own ends and means, is right in principle and should be asserted and stood by as a general principle without exception. And I say to my friend from New Jersey and those who favor this proposition that if they seek and do obtain an amendment here that shall make this Bureau an exceptian to the general rule, instead of inspiring additional confidence in the public mind in this Bureau, they will tend to bring it into reproach; for the agricultural mind throughout the country wants that this institution shall stand on as strong and fair a ground as all others, and no better, or other, or different.

If it is the wish that the Commissioner of Agriculture shall have this additional advantage because it is necessary for the service, then let it be so declared by a special act for that purpose and to that end, and not seek to incorporate it as an exception to a general rule that you are here giving to the country. If you incorporate this as an exception to the general rule, then throughout the country it will be said by those who are unfriendly to this institution that this person is to have special favors or privileges over and beyond the heads of other Departments of the Government, and that we do not want to do.

In the next place, the amendment is put upon the ground that the abuse, if it be such, has been continued for some time. It has been well suggested by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] that abuses have obtained in other Departments of the Government as well, and when we have found them it has been our purpose, as I trust it always will be, to cut them up by the roots; and so it should be in connection with this Bureau as in connection with all others. Now, we are asserting here that the public property shall not thus be used by officials in any Department of the Government. Why shall this Bureau be made an exception? If $3,000 is not sufficient for this person as a salary, say $4,000 or $5,000, or whatever is necessary; but I insist upon it that you shall not tend to bring reproach, as you certainly will, upon the agricultural interest of the country if you make this exception at this time.

I therefore have only to say in conclusion, that anxious as I am to encourage and give aid to this institution in every way that is possible or proper, as a friend of this Bureau, as a friend of the great agricultural interests of the country, I ask that those who insist upon this amendment shall withdraw it; for in my opinion, instead of advancing it in public confidence, and instead of advancing its efficiency, it will have directly the opposite effect.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I have not risen for the purpose of discussing the merits of this amendment or its demerits; but I have risen to correct an error into which my friend, the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] has fallen. He has undertaken to illustrate the pending case by that of the Smithsonian Institution. The two have no similitude whatever, not the remotest; and I think when I make the statement which I believe I am authorized to make, the Senator himself will see that his illustration entirely fails him. I feel that I am called upon to make this statement in justice to Professor Henry, for I am quite sure that Professor Henry would not occupy the Smithsonian Institution for one instant of time upon the same principles that our agricultural building is now occupied by the Commissioner of Agriculture.

In the first place, it has no connection with Government. It is founded on a fund contributed by an Englishman, and we have provided the mode and manner in which it shall be conducted by law, and in that law we have provided that certain regents shall be elected and appointed in a variety of ways. Two members of this body occupy that position. Those regents elect the secretary of that institution, and they make, as I understand it, a contract with him for his compensation and what they will furnish him with; and their contract with Professor Henry is that they will pay him such a sum as salary and furnish him quarters.

Mr. FLANAGAN. Mr. President, I shall support the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey. I have heard reasons given for and against it with great force. The argument of the Senator from Maine who has just taken his seat would mainly authorize me to support it, because this amendment settles the question and authorizes beyond a doubt the Commissioner of Agriculture to take possession of and occupy that building without any of these side thrusts being hurled at him. It adjusts the matter beyond a doubt.

So far as that Bureau is concerned, I think I should be doing the Commissioner an injustice, I think I should be doing the country an injustice, were I not to report some facts known to me. I know the blessings, as I conceive them to be, that have been distributed by it broadcast through the State of Texas. I have asked on two or three occasions some favors from the Commissioner, and I believe I interviewed him on one or two occasions. I sought, among other seeds, some fine cotton-seed, calling his attention to the anxiety I felt upon that subject, and he very courteously and promptly told me that he would endeavor to make a collection of some of the best and furnish me. He did so. I took those seed to Texas and planted them in a field entirely to themselves. I attended particularly, making it a matter of pleasure to cultivate those seed. I did so; and really I wish I had a sample of that cotton which I could present to the Senate of the United States upon this occasion. As it was being grown, and when it was maturing, I showed it to my neighbors of the surrounding country when they came to see me, and it was pronounced as being superior to anything that had ever been seen in Texas. Those seeds I have distributed among my friends of the country; they are there; and I think if I do not forget it, and should be blessed with life, when I return here next winter I will bring a sample and I will show you that beautiful fleece that I directly procured the seed of from the Bureau that is now spoken of.

I might go on and enumerate many other seeds. Some of the largest and finest rye that I ever saw on earth—I had no idea that such grew anywhere—I procured there, and I have been planting many seeds and I find great advantages. The whole country there is being blessed by it, and I will on all occasions while I have a seat here vote liberally for anything that will tend to the support of the Bureau.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think I shall be justified now in saying that I suppose we are as much enlightened on this subject as will enable us to vote intelligently, and I therefore move that this amendment lie upon the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will withdraw that. I think we can have a direct vote now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will not that be very direct?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall ask for the yeas and nays on that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am very willing to have the yeas and nays on it, but it struck me that would put an end to the debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine moves to lay the pending amendment on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Before the vote is taken, let the amendment be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment; which was to insert after the words "United States," in the seventh and eighth lines of section 3, the following:

Provided, That this shall not prevent the Commissioner of Agriculture from occupying the apartments in the building of that department.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Boreman, Buckingham, Chandler, Conkling, Cooper, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Hamlin, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Robertson, Sargent, Spencer, Wadleigh, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bogy, Cameron, Clayton, Dennis, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Hager, Harvey, Hitchcock, Johnston, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Scott, Stockton, and Tipton—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Boutwell, Brownlow, Carpenter, Conover, Cragin, Davis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Jones, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sherman, Sprague, Stevenson, Stewart, and Thurman—27.

So the Senate refused to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, on which the yeas and nays have been demanded.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have not said anything on this subject in a general way, for I did not suppose there was any probability of the Senate entertaining such a proposition; but I see that my honorable friend from New Jersey really enjoys the thing, and holds up his head on the subject, and I am rather inclined to say a word or two about it. It becomes a little serious in this aspect of the case. The idea of legislating by law, by putting into a section of an appropriation bill, it shall be proper and fit and suitable for a public officer and his family to occupy apartments which were made by the Government of the United States for public purposes, becomes a serious sort of proposition to my mind. Now, that it might be tolerated I can understand. In the beginning, when that department was very small, and the seeds were few, and the occupants were few and far between, one could understand that there might be nooks and corners where a man might crowd himself in if he was of a make-up to enjoy such quarters, and that the public would not warn him to go out absolutely. But, sir, when we know that this department has now grown so that these quarters are wanted for public purposes, I will not undertake to say what may be the style of the man who could afford to occupy them under such circumstances.

When we are told on the floor of the Senate that he occupies them by a contract, that we cannot get him out without a violation of the contract, and if he should undertake to enjoin us the Supreme Court of the United States would hold that he held it by a contract, possibly legislating in this way becomes a serious sort of business. Once get this man in, and who knows how to get him out? He is in by the strength of his contract, on the argument of my friend from New Jersey; he came there with the understanding that he and his family were to have quarters, a furnished house, an office with furnished rooms! That is altogether a new idea in the civil service of this country. We have heard a great deal said about civil service and civil-service reform; but here is an exceptional case altogether. Here is a man appointed to office under circumstances where it is said that his predecessor had the bad taste to furnish for himself rooms in a public building which he occupied, being tolerated there; and now, forsooth, you cannot get this man out without a violation of good faith; and you propose to put into a law that he shall stay there, and stay there by force of law, and by force of an exception in a section which is intended to control the entire public service and to lay a very heavy hand on every civil officer in every Department of the Government, to the end that he shall not appropriate to his private use anything that belongs to the Government of the United States. This man is said to be an exception, and his case is exceptional in that it is a contract, and we cannot remove him from this public building without violating a contract with him. That is a grand idea! We had better have the Committee on Agriculture or some other competent committee negotiate with that man immediately and see if we cannot induce him by hook or crook, by an increase of his salary or in some other way, to remove himself and his family out of that building before there comes to be that vested right which will come to this in the end, that we are the people who are to move out and he is to stay.

I confess, Mr. President, to a good deal of astonishment really that this amendment should be entertained by the Senate. And now having occupied four minutes and a half, which is all the time I intended to occupy, I give notice that if this debate is to go on, I shall enforce the five-minute rule upon gentlemen.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the amendment that I offered is so reasonable that I am not at all surprised that it commanded a majority of the Senate, and I am not at all surprised that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has felt himself called upon to make an extra effort and to use that stentorian voice of his and to invoke a little ridicule in behalf of his view of the proposition. Instead of the Senator being so surprised, I suggest to him that in the whole United States there probably is not a court-house, or an asylum, or an agricultural college, or any public building of this character, where the person in charge does not actually live in it without there being any positive law in reference to it. It is a matter of convenience, of propriety, of advantage; and so it has been for years a matter of propriety that in this department, where there are conservatories and green-houses and plants and a number of employés, the head of the department should be there.

My friend from Maine is altogether mistaken in thinking that he will have to bring an action of ejectment to get Judge Watts out, or that there is any difficulty in getting him out. That is not the point I make. The point I make is, that those apartments having been so occupied for a course of years, and he having by the general acquiescence of everybody remained there, and there being no reason why he should remove, it is unfair to call upon him to remove.

I think my friend makes some point about putting a provision in an appropriation bill that he should stay there.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; I do not say that. That would not be germane.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No; I should think not, because he introduces in this appropriation bill a general provision ostensibly not aimed at the Commissioner of Agriculture, but which does in an indirect way, if he lives strictly up to the law, as I have no doubt he will and has, call upon him to remove. Now, I introduce an exception, a provision that nothing in this affirmative legislation on this appropriation bill shall make it necessary for him to depart. It does not confirm his right to stay there. Whenever it is thought best to make another arrangement, let it be made; and if the Senate think it best now, it can be done by voting down this amendment. But I think even those who are not friendly to Judge Watts, and who take this way perhaps indirectly of making it unpleasant for him to stay there, ought to remember that the interests of that department require that his successor should occupy those rooms that have been prepared. I hope that the Senate will adhere to the indication that their vote has just given and adopt this amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Well, let us vote upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 21, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Cameron, Clayton, Dennis, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Hitchcock, Johnston, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Mitchell, Morton, Patterson, Pease, Ramsey, Ransom, Scott, and Tipton—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Boreman, Buckingham, Carpenter, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Edmunds, Hager, Hamlin, Howe, Ingalls, Morrill of Maine, Oglesby, Robertson, Sargent, Spencer, Wadleigh, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Boutwell, Brownlow, Chandler, Conover, Davis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Harvey, Jones, Logan, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Pratt, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sherman, Sprague, Stevenson, Stewart, Stockton, and Thurman—30.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWE. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to make an amendment in line 252, to change "8" to "9;" so that the clause will read:

For purchase of books for the Library, $9,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this amendment? If not, it will be considered as agreed to, and it is agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. On page 22, line 513, I move to strike out "13" and insert "14;" so as to read:

Fourteen clerks of class three.

The House bill reduces the clerks in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, one in class three, one in class two, and one in class one. I hold in my hand a letter from the Comptroller of the Currency, who says that—

The number of clerks in the higher grades of this office has always been too small. The work is continually increasing, and any present reduction of clerical force could not but prove detrimental.

I submit the question to the Senate and move an increase of the number where it stood before.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this amendment?

Mr. WINDOM. It is no increase of clerkships, but simply restores the old number.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. In the same line I move to strike out "eleven" and insert "twelve," so as to give the Comptroller of the Currency the same number of clerks of class two that he has now.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. In line 514 I move to strike out "eleven" and insert "twelve," so as to provide for twelve clerks of class one in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. On page 49, line 1187, I desire to transpose the sentence beginning "for labor, fuel, lights, and miscellaneous items for the said building, $8,000," and have it come in above.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has already been done.

Mr. WEST. It was done yesterday.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My attention had not been called to it.

Then on page 48, line 1171, which I think has been amended, after the word "ordnance" I move to insert the words "and Adjutant-General's Office."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to move an amendment in line 418, page 18, to strike out "nine" and insert "ten," and in the same line to strike out "ten" and insert "twelve," and in the following line to strike out "ten" and insert "twelve;" so as to provide for ten clerks of class four, twelve clerks of class three, and twelve clerks of class two, in the office of the Comptroller of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. On page 19, line 439, I am instructed by the committee to move to strike out "eight" and insert "ten;" in line 440 to strike out "eight" and insert "ten;" and in the same line to strike out "ten" and insert "thirteen;" so as to provide for ten clerks of class three, ten clerks of class two, and thirteen clerks of class one, in the office of the First Auditor of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I move to amend the third section of the bill by striking out all after the word "law" in the fourth line to the end of the section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words proposed to be stricken out will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Or shall make any private use of such property, or of the services or labor of any person in the employment or service of the United States which service or labor is paid for by the United States: Provided, That this shall not be construed to deprive any officer of the United States of such fees as are or may be expressly provided by law in addition to the salary or compensation of such officer, or of the use of such property as may be expressly by law appropriated to the use of such officer, nor to prevent the employment and payment by the Department of Justice of district attorneys as now allowed by law for the performance of services not covered by their salaries or fees.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not wish to strike out that last clause which has been inserted on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The section will be reported as it will stand if amended as proposed.

The Chief Clerk read, as follows:

SEC. 3. That no civil officer of the Government shall hereafter receive any compensation or perquisites, directly or indirectly, from the Treasury or property of the United States beyond his salary or compensation allowed by law: Provided, That this section shall not be construed to prevent the employment and payment by the Department of Justice of district attorneys as now allowed by law for the performance of services not covered by their salaries or fees.

Mr. SARGENT. I think the section as I propose to amend it covers everything that is valuable in it and avoids a very disagreeable question. To illustrate many things by a single example, I should like to ask Senators whether it would be possible under the section as it stands for any Senator to use a sheet of note-paper to write a private letter upon in his committee-room; whether it would be possible for him to have his coat brushed, or to have a bath in the Capitol? These mere instances of personal convenience illustrate a general rule. I refer to these simply because they are more obvious and more immediately under our observation. If we provide that "no civil officer of the Government shall hereafter receive any compensation or perquisites, directly or indirectly, from the Treasury or property of the United States beyond his salary or compensation allowed by law," that is sufficient; certainly it will cut off everything like an abuse; but when carried beyond that, the provision itself runs into an abuse, and we may find that strictly pursued it will obstruct every officer of the Government in the orderly performance of his duties.

I might use the illustration, so far as clerks of committees are concerned, used by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] yesterday. The argument was certainly very clear and very strong, that it would be illegal under this section for the clerk of a committee, when he had nothing else to do, at the request of the chairman of the committee, to write a note to his wife stating at what time the Senate would adjourn or at what time he would likely be at home. The illustrations might be multiplied indefinitely. It seems to me that by my amendment I retain all that is valuable in the section and strike out only that which is useless and which may be mischievous.

Mr. WRIGHT. I should like to inquire whether this amendment has the approval of the committee, or whether it comes from the Senator from California? I want to follow the committee on all these amendments as far as I can. I will inquire of the chairman of the committee whether the amendment comes from the committee, or whether the committee are prepared to indorse it?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The committee reported the section as it stands in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I move to amend the bill on page 4, line 84, by striking out the words "two dollars and fifty cents" and inserting "three dollars." This is an amendment for the relief of these little boys, who are the pages of a great Government. I understand that they have been receiving three dollars a day regularly. It is understood that this is a Congress and a particular session of reform, and I fear it will go out that we are absolutely sincere if we get the pages by the hair and are going to pull fifty cents a day out of their pockets! I think we should locate elsewhere and let these little fellows be encouraged. They are bright boys, and I for one feel like protecting them on this occasion as I do upon all others. I hope the amendment will be made and justice done.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to suggest to my friend from Texas an additional argument, that they do more to run bills through this body than any one else. [Laughter.]

Mr. FLANAGAN. That is true. I accept that statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on the amendment, and declared that the ayes appeared to prevail.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask for a division on the amendment, and I desire to say a word upon it. This ought not to be done.

Mr. CAMERON. I should like to hear the amendment read.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will say to the Senator that it is simply to change the compensation of the pages from $2.50 to $3 per day. I suppose I need not say how kindly I feel to these young gentlemen who serve us here; but this has been a sort of moot question between the two Houses. The House of Representatives have paid their pages at the rate of $2.50 per day all along; but by reason of the great dignity of this body the little fellows here got it into their heads that they were entitled in the Senate to half a dollar more. I once made that argument in the Senate in their behalf with the young lad before me who invented the argument, and the Senate was so taken with his eloquence and the ingenuity of his plea that he was entitled to fifty cents a day more on account of the superior dignity of this body that it adopted the amendment, and the same story carried it through the committee of conference. But I do not want to repeat that again. I do not think the Senate ought to put itself in that condition again. The House have adhered to $2.50 for their pages and ask us to do the same, and it seems to me it is but a fair thing on the whole that we should do it.

I do not wish to say anything about the amount of compensation or anything of that sort, but it is not worth while to keep this question open between the two Houses. I hope, therefore, the amendment will not be adopted. I raise a question of order upon it.

Mr. FLANAGAN. It is too late for that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am reluctant to do it, but I feel constrained to raise the question of order. The amendment increases the appropriation and there was no notice of it given to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state the point of order.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The point of order is that it increases the appropriation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I disagree with my distinguished friend. They are already receiving three dollars.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. O, no.

Mr. FLANAGAN. Yes, sir; I understand heretofore they have been regularly receiving three dollars a day.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Our little pages here were in the habit of receiving three dollars, but last year and for some years the House made the point on us, and we have since put them at $2.50. At one time they did receive three dollars; the Senator is right about that.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I thought they had been receiving three dollars regularly. That was my information; I may be in error. But the point of order is taken too late; we have been voting upon this amendment for half an hour.

Mr. CONKLING. Three dollars is the pay now, I understand.

Mr. FLANAGAN. They are now being paid three dollars, and therefore the amendment is upon the part of my distinguished friend; this is not an increase.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is out of order unless moved by the instruction of some committee.

Mr. SCOTT. I wish to move an amendment, and I am very much afraid that my friend from Maine will take the same point upon me. Information given to me satisfies me that there ought to be an amendment on page 74, line 44, by increasing the number of counters and copyists provided for in the Register's department to one hundred and ten. I will offer that amendment unless I am met by the point of order. If the Senator from Maine makes the point upon me, I will not press it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think I know what it is. The Senator will allow me to say that I do not think it is quite right to put me to the test of checking these amendments. I certainly examined that matter with the greatest solicitude to oblige the distinguished gentleman who presented it, and I came to the conclusion, and the committee agreed with me unanimously, that we could not with propriety make the amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. You mean to oblige the Register of the Treasury?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I mean to oblige the Register of the Treasury, a gentleman for whom I entertain very great respect and whom I would be exceedingly glad to oblige; but I came to the conclusion that upon the basis of this bill we could not with propriety allow it.

Mr. SCOTT. Therefore I understand the Senator to make the point of order?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir, I make the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. Then I will not offer it.

Mr. BOREMAN. When the Senate as in Committee of the Whole acted upon the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations yesterday I did not notice the fact that the last amendment in the bill was concurred in. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment on page 76, in section 5, was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I suggest to the Senator as we are still in committee to reserve it and take a vote on it in the Senate, which will answer his purpose just as well.

Mr. BOREMAN. That will answer. I want a separate vote upon it at the proper time. When the bill is reported to the Senate, I wish to reserve that amendment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have a number of amendments to offer. I have been waiting with all modesty until others were through. My attention has been called by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture of the House to a clerical error on page 66, line 1613, in the clause providing for the compensation of two assistant messengers for the Department of Agriculture. I move to strike out "$700" in that line and insert "$720." The pay of those employés is sixty dollars a month.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think $720 is the usual salary for a messenger. I do not object to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. And then there is a corresponding alteration which I believe the clerk is authorized to make in the aggregate in line 1616. It is to strike out "180" and insert "220," so as to make it $77,220.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The clerk will see to that.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. On page 68, line 1651, after the word "museum" I move to insert "$2,500." The provision now is:

For collecting and modeling specimens of fruits and vegetables, and collecting and preparing specimens for the museum and herbarium, $2,000.

This amendment increases the appropriation $2,500. The reason given for that is that there is an opportunity, which it is thought very desirable we should avail ourselves of, to purchase a herbarium which will cost about $1,000 and the other $1,500 is for the expenses incidental to that department. The Agricultural Department seems to be in such bad odor here, Mr. President, that I think it is very well that there is a party of grangers getting up in the country to see that Congress pay a little more respect to this branch of industry. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. On this particular proposition, if my honorable friend invokes that as an influence, I will ask him whether he has given notice of this amendment?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should like to hear the amendment read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is on page 68, line 1651, after the word "museum" to insert "$2,500;" so that the clause will read:

For collecting and modeling specimens of fruits and vegetables, and collecting and preparing specimens for the museum, $2,500, and herbarium, $2,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am not satisfied about the necessity for this amendment. There are no estimates submitted for this. It is apparently an after-thought, and coming in in this way, not presented to the committee of either House, and not having been in the annual estimates, it comes under circumstances to challenge some notice. Unless my honorable friend is very thoroughly persuaded that it belongs to the class of public necessities, I hope he will not urge it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not think it belongs to the class of public necessities; but I have no doubt it is very desirable that this purchase should be made.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What is the purchase?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is to purchase a herbarium which is now offered for sale, a full description of which has been put in my possession; and I would say to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that while it has been argued here that we do not publish any Agricultural Report, there are every day hundreds and hundreds of people from all parts of the country who go to this department and receive instruction and who are very much interested; and I think that the Government can afford to make an appropriation of a few thousand dollars for the purpose of maintaining this museum and this herbarium in a proper condition and in a manner which becomes a nation which has some seven millions of its people employed directly in the pursuits of agriculture. It has been argued here that we spend $236,000 a year on this department. Why, sir, we spend nearly as many millions to promote the interests of mechanics and of trade.

As to the "necessity," using that word, of this appropriation I cannot say that it is necessary, because you could dispense with the whole department. It is recommended by the department and it is recommended by the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This belongs to just that class of items that come in in this way and take us by surprise, with no opportunity to examine them, and it is a class of fancy items that belong to every one of these Bureaus, and every gentleman who represents a particular Bureau upon a committee feels himself charged to some extent with the duty of expressing the wishes of the Department, and if we were to listen to all the fine notions that these gentlemen have by way of embellishing their Departments and embellishing that particular business that is committed to them, you would have herbariums, and I do not know what you would not have in all these Departments; you would have all sorts of fancy things. This is not the year when those appropriations ought to be prosperous. This is not the year for such things when we are cutting down the service in every direction and absolutely crippling it. This bill absolutely in some sense cripples the public service. We have stricken out clerks here which the Bureaus come and insist and urge ought to stay in this bill, and I have put as many back as I dared put back. Yet my honorable friend comes in here and wants to buy a herbarium; he wants to appropriate $2,500 for herbs and flowers and the Lord only knows what. That is all very nice; but this is not the year to do it; we cannot afford to do it. This bill will be followed by a deficiency bill which will make you all stare, and every branch of the public service has been cut down and curtailed and whittled down to the very lowest point. I hope my honorable friend will not feel that it is his duty to press this herbarium.

Mr. CAMERON. I am very much disappointed in the Senator from Maine who has charge of this bill. When I was at his house last year, I thought he was a man of taste. He had his house, his yard, and his lot adorned by flowers and fruits of the rarest kinds. His house had every adornment about it which a man of the finest taste could have desired or thought of. I now begin to think it must have been his wife to whom all those things were due, and not himself. [Laughter.] Why, sir, who could object to a paltry appropriation of $2,500 to add to the beauty of that already beautiful place, the Agricultural Department? There is no part of the United States, hardly any place in the world, where there is such a beautiful and rare assortment of flowers and plants. They have a grapery there not equaled by any that I have seen in the United States. They have the choicest flowers produced not only in this, but in every other country. I am afraid the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has never gone over there to look at those things which ought to be under his protection.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No, I never saw any of those. They are strangers to me.

Mr. CAMERON. You have plants there which are adding daily to the value of our fruits and to the taste of everybody who goes there. There are hundreds of people constantly there viewing them. Before Mr. Watts went there, it was a waste piece of ground. It is now, as I have said, one of the most beautiful places in the country, certainly the most attractive spot in the city of Washington. No man who has gone there once, if he have a bit of taste in him or a bit of love for the beautiful, will fail to go there again, and I am sure the finest thing every one who does go there says when he goes home to his wife and daughters is, "You must go to Washington and look at the beautiful place which the Agricultural Department now has."

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CAMERON. Certainly.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to ask the Senator what office this herbarium will fill in that respect, in beautifying the grounds?

Mr. CAMERON. The Senator on my right [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] says it would not be complete without it, and he says truly.

Mr. SARGENT. That the grounds would not be complete without the herbarium?

Mr. CAMERON. The building will not be complete without it, because there will be in this collection the rarest herbs and flowers and plants which the country can afford. It has been the subject of collection for long years.

Mr. SARGENT. I was only going to say that my impression agrees with Webster that a herbarium is—

A collection of dried plants carefully arranged and preserved.
A book or other contrivance for thus preserving plants.

How that could add to the beauty of the grounds puzzles me.

Mr. CAMERON. It would add to the beauty of the house because it has those rare plants. To be sure they are preserved and dried, and it is the only way you could have them there.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am not an enemy to this department, and I am not an enemy to this collection of scientific objects of art. This proposition is one of greater magnitude than the appropriation proposed would seem to indicate, and it is in the direction of natural history or botany. I desire to say that this is the herbarium of Dr. Duby, author of a well-known botanical work, although I suppose it would not be recognized here by the German name. It contains a collection of one kind of eighty-five packages. In another besides this are eighty-eight large packages. Then again there are thirty-five or forty enormous packages, all classified; and then there are twenty-six more classified and labeled. Besides this there are from thirty-five to sixty packages more, and then in addition to all there are twenty-four cartons. My impression is that if it could be obtained by the Department of Agriculture it would be regarded as an acquisition by any collegiate institution or any other institution where it could be stowed as of very great importance.

The question being put, a division was called for; which resulted—ayes 20, noes 18.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 14, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Cragin, Dennis, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Harvey, Ingalls, Lewis, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson, Pease, and Robertson—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Boreman, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Cooper, Gilbert, Hager, Hitchcock, Kelly, McCreery, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Oglesby, Pratt, Sargent, Saulsbury, Stockton, Tipton, Wadleigh, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Boutwell, Brownlow, Conover, Davis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Howe, Johnston, Jones, Logan, Merrimon, Morton, Norwood, Ramsey, Ransom, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Stevenson, Stewart, and Thurman—33.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There is another amendment that I wish to offer in this connection. It is my duty to give the Senate an opportunity of making the necessary appropriations. At the end of line 1651, on page 68, I move to insert:

For chemicals and apparatus for the use of the chemical division, $1,500.
For materials for the use of the microscopist, $300.

If I can have the attention of the Senator from Maine, I will say that I am informed by the department that they have the apparatus and they have a chemist employed, but they have no appropriation to supply him with chemicals so as to use the apparatus and so as to keep the chemist employed. I cannot say that this is "necessary." The Government will run if you do not have either; but it is necessary in any proper use of that term, and the public are interested in these chemical experiments and in their results. The importance of the work of the microscopist is well known to the public, and that only asks for an appropriation of $300.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think the Senator will find that that is covered by the appropriation for miscellaneous and contingent expenses.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. This amendment comes from the department, and was also submitted to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If it is not covered already, I will not object to it going in. My understanding of it is that it is covered.

Mr. SARGENT. Part of it may be covered, but I should like to hear the amendment reported and let us see what is covered.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will read it:

For chemicals and apparatus for the use of the chemical division, $1,500.
For materials for the use of the microscopist, $300.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I thought you had the apparatus.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand that last year an appropriation was made but it was not quite sufficient, and some additional appropriation is necessary for that purpose.

Mr. SARGENT. Then it ought to be on the deficiency bill and not on this bill. That bill is ready to be reported, and the committee can investigate the matter if it is referred to them. I raise the point of order on the amendment that it has not been referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I raise the point because it is a deficiency. I should like to have time to examine it. I will do so in connection with the deficiency bill if the Senator will send the documents to the committee.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Notice has been given of the amendment and it was submitted to the committee.

Mr. SARGENT. That meets the point of order.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. But the Senator from California has the deficiency bill in his charge, and if this properly belongs to that bill, let it go to him for examination.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. What do I understand constitutes the qualifications of a deficiency appropriation bill? There is no expenditure here. This money has not been expended.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. They have expended something.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Nothing more than has been appropriated.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. You find something has been appropriated for a particular object, but not enough to complete it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. And the work is stopped.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That makes a deficiency.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have no doubt there is some good reason for which every appropriation that is asked by this department and by the Committee on Agriculture will be objected to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think my honorable friend is hardly justified from anything that has transpired here in making that remark. My suggestion in regard to this was that my attention was called to it in a hurried way this morning, and it occurred to me that it was covered by the appropriations of a miscellaneous character, and I suggested to the Senator that if it was not so I would not object to their going in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. SARGENT. I think the remark of the Senator, that everything this department offered here would be objected to is not justifiable. Here is a bill that appropriates thousands and thousands of dollars for the Agricultural Department favorably reported by the Committee on Appropriations. Now a proposition is made to add to this amount items not estimated for, not sent to the Committee on Appropriations by the department as to which we have no evidence at all, under the general statement that the amount heretofore appropriated is not sufficient. I think that is a very loose system of legislation, and we shall be doing the Government a wrong and the Treasury a wrong if we act on these suggestions. I admit, of course, that each Senator has a right to judge for himself, and if the Senator from New Jersey thinks this is a sufficient basis for his vote, he can conscientiously vote for such appropriations; but the system which we adopt is to require estimates from the departments, that those estimates shall be sent to the respective Committees on Appropriations, and that on those estimates the appropriation bills shall be reported. If this is for the ordinary, the usual service of this department and is necessary, it can bear that scrutiny. I understand these items have not been estimated for. They simply come with the statement that this sum is necessary and desirable; and the fact that we oppose legislation of that kind is not evidence that we are opposed to any appropriation for this department, certainly not when here are several pages of the bill appropriating two or three hundred thousand dollars to it.

Mr. WEST. I do not know how far I shall be amenable to the discipline that is being practiced by the Committee on Appropriations if I venture to differ with the chairman and my colleague from California on this question.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This question was not really before the committee, so that you are within bounds.

Mr. WEST. I am much obliged to the Senator. The ordinary proceeding under our rules has been applied as I understand by the Senator from New Jersey, who has given notice that he would move this amendment; and I contend that if this matter has been omitted from the estimates by the heads of the Departments, the Senate is just as well qualified to judge whether we ought to have the money, whether this money ought to be applied to the uses to which it is sought to be applied, as the head of any Department. Now, if the Senator from California will controvert the proposition that is made by the Senator from New Jersey that it is essential in the prosecution of the designs of the Department of Agriculture that a sufficient amount should be devoted to the purchase of chemicals, let him do so and let his argument have weight with the Senate.

Mr. SARGENT. That was only part of it. This is also for the purchase of apparatus. Can the Senator tell me what apparatus has been purchased, at what cost, what the former appropriation was, and many other items which if we referred the matter to him as a sub-committee of the Committee on Appropriations he would be required to give definite answers upon?

Mr. WEST. Most assuredly the Senator is correct; but here is a proposition coming to the Senate just as it comes to the head of a Department when made by the head of a Bureau within the Department, to the effect that that head of a Bureau considers it essential to the prosecution of the objects of his office. Now the Senator from New Jersey, as the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, rises here and says that it has been represented to him, and he is satisfied of the fact that in order to pursue these experiments the appropriation of this small amount is necessary. We have cut off the luxuries, the herbarium, &c. We have not, I will say, expelled, but have restricted this gentleman from occupying his premises in the Agricultural Bureau. When he comes here and asks us in the interest of agriculture to appropriate a few hundred dollars to make chemical experiments, I think the Senate is competent to judge whether we ought to do it or not, and I beg to disagree with my friends on the committee. I think we ought to do it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will only add that this appropriation is asked for these two things: for chemicals, in order that the chemist may be employed and the apparatus may be used to find out the different qualities of soil and the qualities of manures and their adaptation one to the other—one of the most important interests of this country. The particular apparatus, I am informed since the Senator from California made the inquiry, that is desired is this: last year an appropriation was made and a chemical furnace was purchased, and some additional expense is necessary in order to put up and set that furnace. This appropriation is asked for by the department. It has passed the Committee on Agriculture, and I submit it to the Senate.

Mr. McCREERY, (at four o'clock and twenty-six minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. O, no; let us finish this bill.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 12, noes 25.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Perhaps I ought to say a word about this amendment, and but a single word. This proposition which the Senator from New Jersey now makes came to the Committee on Appropriations this morning under such circumstances that it was impossible to give any detailed consideration to it. I had the impression on glancing at this bill that this might be taken from the miscellaneous items, and I read that appropriation in this way: "For paper twine and gum for folding-room, $500; for incidental and miscellaneous items." * * * Clearly it would fall within that, and reading no further that would be clear; but it goes on to enumerate, "namely: for advertising, telegraphing," &c., and I have come to the conclusion on a careful examination since the question has arisen that this would not fall within it. I take occasion to say that, because I said if it was not embraced in that clause I should not object to it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator from Pennsylvania will show that it has been estimated for.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not know exactly the form in which the Senator from New Jersey has offered his amendment, but as it is stated that no estimate of this character has been made, I beg leave to read from the Book of Estimates under the head "Department of Agriculture," page 50:

Laboratory, Department of Agriculture:
Chemicals, replacing apparatus, contingent expenses, and materials for use of microscopist, $1,300.

I do not understand that it has been appropriated.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This is a portion of that, probably, but I do not know. Where is the amendment to come in?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. On page 68, at the end of line 1657.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It might as well come in there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BOREMAN. I wish to reserve and have a separate vote on the amendments to the fifth section. The particular amendment is in the proviso, but I think perhaps it would be better to reserve all the amendments in that section.

Mr. RANSOM. I wish the amendment reserved on page 38, line 920, in relation to the assay office at Charlotte, North Carolina.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments except those which have been reserved for separate votes.

The amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the first reserved amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, struck out on page 38, commencing in line 920, the following words:

Assay office at Charlotte, North Carolina:
For assayer in charge, $1,800; melter, $1,500; clerk, $1,000; wages of workmen, $600; contingent expenses, $1,500; in all, $6,400.

Mr. RANSOM. I do not desire to detain the Senate at this late hour in the evening; but I shall be excused for saying that I trust the Senate will not concur in the amendment made by the committee.

This was formerly a mint at the town in North Carolina known as Charlotte. It was established in 1835 by act of Congress. The buildings were finished in 1838. The cost of the ground and buildings, and of the machinery, amounted to $85,800. From 1838 until the beginning of the war there was coined at this mint $5,048,641, and there was coined at the Mint in Philadelphia from North Carolina gold $4,466,126. In addition to this, there was assayed at the New York assay office from North Carolina gold $147,735; and the report of the Secretary of the Treasury states that there was used by jewelers, on account of the purity of the North Carolina metal, $1,137,566 worth of it, making in all, of North Carolina gold produced from 1838 to 1860, about $11,000,000, besides what went into home consumption.

It is true that since the war very little has been done at this mint. In the first place Congress reduced it from a mint to an assay office, and the effect of that legislation by Congress was to destroy a great deal of the business that had been done at this mint. I beg leave to say here what perhaps will surprise the Senate, that the gold area in North Carolina is now estimated by scientific men to be larger than the gold region of any State or any two States upon the continent.

Mr. SARGENT. Larger in yield?

Mr. RANSOM. Larger in size. Before the war the miners all around Charlotte carried their gold-dust to the mint, and there they were paid for it in coin, the law allowing the mints to buy the gold-dust and pay for it on the spot; but this mint having been changed into an assay office, that does not take place; and hence the gold-dust now, especially that washed and worked by the large mines of the State, is sent to Philadelphia or elsewhere. The consequence is that there is not much business done there now; but even that small business which is done is of great consequence to the people there.

All around Charlotte, in Rowan, in Cabarrus, in Stanley, in Burke, and in twenty other counties in North Carolina, reaching down to within one hundred miles of the sea-coast and running up to the counties of Franklin and Halifax, is a gold region, and after the crops are laid by in the summer the farmers turn in and wash gold, and produce no little amount of gold in that way. This morning I asked the Director of the Mint what he supposed the present gold production of North Carolina was. He said that he had no means of ascertaining precisely. I asked him if it would be extravagant to estimate it at a million dollars. He said he thought not.

When we remember, Mr. President, that only $100,000,000 of gold is produced over the whole world, and that here in the State of North Carolina we produce a hundredth part of that, it seems to me that this assay office at Charlotte ought to be taken care of. The present appropriation is only about $6,000 for taking care of a property that forty years ago cost the Government $85,000.

Charlotte is the center of the large gold-producing section in North Carolina, in a part of South Carolina, and in Georgia. Since the war long railroad lines have been projected—and some of them have been completed—through the mountainous regions of North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, and they will open up a large mineral region; and considering the convenience such an establishment is to the people around there, and the prospect of its usefulness to the country hereafter, and the knowledge that we all have that it is not only the interest but the duty of this Government to cherish its gold product, in view of the financial aspects of the future, it seems to me that Congress ought to take care of this little establishment at Charlotte, North Carolina. The property is increasing in value every day. I do not say too much when I say that the annual increase of that property to the Government each year since the war will more than make up the appropriation which Congress has voted for it.

I am sorry to have detained the Senate so long on this matter; but I trust I have said sufficient to show the importance of retaining this small appropriation.

Mr. SARGENT. I suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that by a modification of the clause it might be allowed to stand. The committee have had some consultation with the Director of the Mint on this matter. Three times separately the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives moved to strike out such a clause and it was concurred in by the House, and then on appeal of the North Carolina members was put back. In lines 922 and 923 the item "clerk, $1,000," is entirely unnecessary. The wages of workmen there are only $600, and then they have an assayer and melter. I think with that modification it will be the judgment of the committee that the rest might stand.

Mr. RANSOM. I will agree to that.

Mr. SARGENT. I move, then, to amend the clause by striking out in line 922 and 923, the words "clerk, $1,000," and reducing the aggregate in line 925 from $6,400 to $5,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole striking out the paragraph as amended.

Mr. SARGENT. I hope now the clause will be retained in the bill.

Mr. RANSOM. The only effect of the amendment of the Senate is to reduce the amount $1,000, that being the appropriation for a clerk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate concur in the amendment striking out the clause as it is now amended?

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask unanimous consent—I know it is out of order now—to allow me to propose an amendment which escaped me and to which my attention has been called by a communication from the Surgeon-General. It is on page 46, line 1107, to strike out "eight" and insert "nine." That will make nine clerks of class two instead of eight, in that office; and then supplementing that to strike out in line 1109 "one librarian, at $1,600." For the accommodation of the office they desire this change, and as it does not affect the Government, I see no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no objection be made, the Chair will receive the amendment at this time.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the next reserved amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 5 the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, struck out the following proviso:

Provided, That this provision shall not apply to river and harbor appropriations, or light-house appropriations, or public buildings, the appropriations for which shall only lapse according to the provisions of existing laws.

And inserted in lieu thereof these words:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall at the beginning of each session report to Congress any balances of appropriations for specific objects affected by this section that may need to be reappropriated.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I think the Senate ought not to agree to that amendment so far as public buildings and grounds are concerned. In all instances that I am aware of where appropriations have been made for public buildings, the amount of the appropriation has been absolutely limited before the commencement of the building. It would become necessary if this amendment should be agreed to, in case of the non-completion of any of those buildings before the end of two years, that every little fragment appropriated for public buildings should be reappropriated; and that would be a matter of great inconvenience to the Treasury Department that has charge of these matters. There is absolutely nothing to be gained by having these appropriations lapse and go into the Treasury and have again to be reappropriated; for if they are not all consumed, as a matter of course they will lapse and go into the Treasury.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think the amendment of the committee ought not to be agreed to. The House bill provides that from and after the passage of the act, and on the 1st day of July in each year, the Secretary of the Treasury should cause all the unexpended balances of appropriations to be covered into the Treasury, but excepted from them the appropriations for rivers and harbors and public buildings. The balances of the appropriation for public buildings situated in thirteen different States amount to only about a million and a quarter dollars. But especially should this rule not apply to appropriations for river and harbor improvements. Take for instance the breakwater at the mouth of the Delaware Bay. An appropriation has been made for some years for that work. The work can only be done in the summer months. There are materials on hand at that breakwater now and the work is going on; but on the 1st day of July next the portions of the appropriations which have been running through years will be covered into the Treasury, because they are under the operation of the amendment, and consequently the work must stop until the 1st of December, when we come back here and can make a reappropriation of this very money that has been covered into the Treasury. The consequence will be in regard to that particular work that all operations must cease after the 1st of July if the amendment shall prevail; and that is true, I presume, of other works—of light-houses, and of river and harbor improvements. I think, therefore, that the House bill as it came to us is the better bill in this respect, and I hope the amendment of the committee will not prevail.

Mr. ALCORN. In regard to the improvements upon rivers, I have a word to say. It has been the custom of the Government for a number of years—in truth I do not know that another custom ever has prevailed—that the snags in the Mississippi River were being cleared out when the river was at flood-tide. In the winter time you generally see snag-boats on the Mississippi River, and then is the time that the snag-boats are certain to find no snags at all in the river. They are all fifty or sixty or seventy feet beneath the surface of the flood. The time to remove the snags in the Mississippi River begins just about the time that under this provision the surplus remaining will be covered into the Treasury. The months of July, August, September, and October are the times when the boats on the Mississippi River can work effectually and well in clearing out snags; and I trust the Senate will not withdraw the appropriation at the very period when that appropriation becomes most valuable to the country.

Mr. WEST. If we were to be influenced by the remarks of the Senator who has just spoken and the Senator who preceded him, the Senate must conclude that the efficiency of this appropriation is to be much impaired and the public works of the United States are to be much obstructed by confirming the action of the Committee on Appropriations. Now, sir, I do not think that that is the case, nor do I think that the Senators have properly presented the situation to the Senate. Here is an appropriation made today, we will say, accepting the illustration made by the Senator who last spoke, for clearing out the snags in the Mississippi River. That appropriation commences on the 1st day of July next, and under the bill as it has been reported by the Committee on Appropriations that appropriation endures for two years. There is no stopping in the summer time; there is no interfering with that work; and proper vigilance on the part of the Representatives who have the care and custody of those particular interests in their charge would enable them to notify Congress and get the reappropriation that is asked for and required to be made through the statement of the Secretary of War.

What we want is that every two years there shall be a balancing of accounts. I am with the Senator and with every other Senator in the appropriation of public money for public improvements; but I want, and the Committee on Appropriations desire, that every two years we shall come up and settle; that we shall ask the question, "How much of the money of the United States have you spent in the last two years, and if you have not spent it all, we stand ready to give it to you?" There will be no interference, as I understand, with the work, because the appropriation stands for two years; and then, as I remarked before, if the appropriation has lapsed, all you have to do is to stand here in your places or come before the committee or come before the Department and state that fact, and you can have the money reappropriated. But if you make these illimitable appropriations running on for years and years and years, you never can have a settlement of your books, you never can understand how much money you are spending. This has been the principle that has now been adopted for four years. It was done by the act of July 12, 1870. It is found to work beneficially, and no detriment has ever been, as I understand, occasioned to any public work in consequence thereof. This is fair notice to all parties that the contracts shall continue two years; and at the end of that time you shall come in and ask for more if more is needed. We must have some determination of a period as to the settlement of our accounts. This enables us to do it every two years. Otherwise you make your appropriations broadcast; you do not know whether fifteen years hence you are not spending money appropriated to-day. It is well to have a settlement of accounts; it is well to know how much money we are spending annually or biennially so that we can know what money we have in the Treasury available and otherwise. Now I ask Senators to point out where the work will lapse. Certainly not when you give two years' notice. We adopted this principle in 1870, and I think it is well to continue it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope this amendment will not prevail. The Senator from Louisiana is mistaken in regard to the appropriations for rivers and harbors and light-houses being made for two years. They are annual appropriations which would lapse on the 30th day of June of the year following the year in which they are made. Take the work on the Mississippi River or the work on the Sault Sainte Marie Canal. There no work can be done except in the winter, after the close of navigation. On the Mississippi River no work can be done until after the spring floods. Then, again, in regard to light-houses, frequently there is a detention in the building of a light-house. The proper title may not have been furnished by the State for the ground, and frequent occurrences of that kind take place. I remember at the Saint Clair Flats Canal the appropriation once lapsed, and they were obliged for more than a year to go without sufficient light at that great national work, because the appropriation had lapsed into the Treasury. The engineer did not know that it was necessary to make a contract in advance, he did not know that the money was to lapse on the 30th of June, and for a period of a whole year they used an insufficient light at that great work where the whole commerce of the lakes was passing.

Mr. President, this should not apply to rivers and harbors, or to light-houses, or to public buildings and grounds, in my opinion, and I therefore hope that the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations will be concurred in by the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Before the Senator takes his seat I should like to correct him. The Senator is under a misapprehension as to the effect of this amendment. I understand him to say that appropriations made for rivers and harbors lapse at the end of a year.

Mr. CHANDLER. The appropriations made this year would lapse on the 30th of June next year.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; they are made for a specific purpose, and they would last, except for the operation of the statute of 1870, until they were expended; but by the act of 1870 all appropriations not expended or not drawn against for two years go to the surplus fund and thence into the Treasury. The Treasury Department construed that law to mean that as long as they drew against an appropriation they kept it alive; that is to say, it did not lapse. This section is an amendment of that, and makes it lapse absolutely at the end of two years, so that an appropriation made for public buildings or anything else by operation of the first clause of this section would revert to the Treasury at the end of two years. To avoid the difficulty which the Senator from Michigan supposes may be encountered let us see what is provided. We make an appropriation this year for rivers and harbors. Under the operation of this section it will run two full years from the 1st of July, 1874, within which that may be expended. Now, if it should turn out that any portion of the money so appropriated is in danger of lapsing, that it has not all been expended, then it becomes the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury under the amendment made by the committee to notify Congress in December of such unexpended balances remaining in the Treasury that need to be reappropriated.

Does the Senator think on that statement of facts that the public service would be likely to suffer, having had two years within which to expend an appropriation, with this precautionary measure also requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to report to Congress any balances which might not have been expended? It seems to me that we are in no danger. It seems to me that that does cover the needs of the public service.

Now, Mr. President, if there is one thing more important than another in regard to our appropriations, it is the principle in this section. Nothing has troubled us so much, and until we adopted the principle of the act of 1870 requiring the Treasury Department to cover into the Treasury all unexpended balances we never could know what our expenses were. We found in a single Department $80,000,000 of balances at the close of the war that might be expended in almost any direction. Those things led to the act of 1870, which requires the Treasury of the United States to make its balance-sheet to Congress once in two years, so that we may know precisely the whole items of expenditure, including balances and everything else.

This provision which the Committee on Appropriations have reported here is intended to put within the information of Congress any balance unexpended in season to reappropriate it the next year. I submit therefore to my honorable friend whether it is worth while for us to jeopardize so important a principle upon the remote contingency of an inconvenience which would arise from the difficulty which he suggests. Undoubtedly, it would be so if, as the Senator supposes, these appropriations lapsed within one year, the year being the fiscal year, instead of the calendar year, and beginning on the 1st of July. I agree entirely that that would be inappropriate; that would be difficult; but he has two years from that time.

Mr. CHANDLER. At what time is the two years' settlement to be made?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The 1st day of July.

Mr. CHANDLER. Is every appropriation made to run two years, or is it at the end of a given two years? Are all appropriations to be covered into the Treasury on that given day?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Under the operation of this section, all unexpended balances of appropriations at the end of two years must go in the Treasury.

Mr. CHANDLER. At the end of two years from the time the appropriation was made, unless recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury to be reappropriated?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes; if there should be a balance unexpended the Secretary of the Treasury is commanded by this section to report the fact to Congress in season to reappropriate it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I was not aware of the two-years feature. That is a new feature to me.

Mr. BOREMAN. I think the theory of this section as it came from the House is much the most practicable and should be retained. That is, I understand, that the surplus of general appropriations for the running of the Departments here and matters of that sort shall be covered into the Treasury every two years; but where there are specific appropriations with reference to harbors, for light-houses, and for public buildings, for these are the three exceptions, these specific appropriations shall not be covered into the Treasury at the end of the two years herein mentioned. These appropriations to which I have alluded are for specific purposes; the estimates have been made; Congress has passed upon them. Take a custom-house, for instance, at any particular point. There the estimate is made, and the most of the bills for such buildings provide that the sum therein appropriated shall cover the construction of the building and that no more money shall be expended. I think that the provision adopted by the House in the proviso as the bill came to us is the correct one, that in these instances where specific appropriations have been made they shall be allowed to remain unless they be covered into the Treasury as now provided by law.

We are told by the chairman that under the law as it now exists, where the construction of a building or the other work on a river or harbor or a light-house has not been entered upon, then at the end of two years under the existing law the appropriation is covered into the Treasury. That may be well enough probably; because if it is not commenced within the two years it is to be presumed that the officers having it in charge and those interested do not desire that the improvement shall go on; but where the work has been commenced, I cannot see the propriety at the end of two years, if the building should not happen to be completed or the other work to be finished, of covering the residue of the appropriation, whatever it may be, into the Treasury. No harm, it seems to me, can result from allowing the law to remain as the officers of the Treasury have construed it; and that is, as I understand the chairman, that where the work has been commenced the law does not apply to cover the residue of the appropriation which is unexpended into the Treasury, but it may be drawn against until the whole amount is expended. That is the construction as I understand, and I think it is a very proper construction.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That would be very nice if there were nothing but public buildings and grounds affected; but when you consider that we appropriate one hundred and fifty millions altogether, and that it covers a great variety of service, and that you will find balances under the operation of this very act in the Treasury of millions upon millions which are drawn against for just a trifle to keep the appropriations alive and make them perpetual, you begin to see the importance of a proposition which shall be absolute and require unless in two years all these sums to go into the Treasury and to come out again under the administration of Congress. Otherwise it is impossible for you to tell what the expenditures of the Government are.

Mr. BOREMAN. I think that the proviso as sent to us from the House of Representatives is such a one as we should adhere to, and that we should not adopt the amendment proposed by our committee. I think none of the results that have been affirmed in regard to it will follow. I trust that those who are interested in this matter, and we all are throughout the country either in one form or another, for rivers and harbors, or for light-houses, or for public buildings, will vote against the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. SARGENT. The proviso as it comes from the House is not broad enough to cover the cases mentioned by the gentleman. It will have to be amended to carry out that which they propose. For instance, fortifications are not mentioned, and they are just as important. I should like to call attention, however, to the fact that it is not particularly with public buildings that this difficulty arises. It arises in nearly every Bureau of the Government. Take the Internal Revenue for instance. There are accounts with collectors who went out of office two or three years ago. There are appropriations on the books of the Treasury sufficient to pay any balances that may be due to them or to adjust their accounts. In some cases there are suits pending which are not under the control of those parties to close them up. As these accounts come in, the department draws against these appropriations, and they are paid, and the parties go on their way.

Mr. BOREMAN. As I understand this proviso those cases are not excepted.

Mr. SARGENT. I know it; but I want to show that there is some necessity for it. Take the navy: A vessel goes off on a cruise for two, three, or four years. The sailors on board the vessel and the officers are paid so much a month, not the full amount of their salary; some portion of it is paid to their families at home on their order while they are gone. When they come back at the end of say four years, there is an account made out showing how much they have received, how much is their due, and the balance to which they are entitled. That balance meanwhile, two years before, has been covered into the Treasury. There is another difficulty. It is so with the Marine Corps, who go out with the Navy, and for the same reason; and so I might instance nearly every Department of the Government.

I think there is an amendment which can be made to this provision as it comes from the Committee of the Whole, which will answer the purpose of the gentlemen who object to it in its present form, and will go very far toward remedying the mischiefs which they speak of. It now reads that these balances shall be covered into the Treasury June 30, 1874, that is, about a month after the passage of this bill. Of course there is no time to settle anything up. There is no time to close up the suits to which I refer, or to close up these accounts of the Internal Revenue Bureau. Make that 1875 and it would have two advantages. In the first place, there is an opportunity to settle up a great many of these things so that they will never plague us or plague the Bureaus afterward; and another advantage is, that it would give time for the operation of the last clause inserted by the Committee of the Whole on the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations, for a report to Congress next December of the amounts that need to be reappropriated. As it stands now, there is an interregnum of six months and such further time as may be necessary to enable Congress to act on such recommendation, when all these works must stop, when the work on the breakwater of my friend from Delaware will have to stop, because the appropriation necessarily under this section, having been appropriated heretofore, ceases on the 30th day of June, 1874, about a month from now; and so in reference to the river and harbor improvements. But put off the time when this severe and stringent law will take effect until June 30, 1875, and then the Secretary of the Navy can come in and show you how much he needs to be reappropriated of old appropriations to square the balances with his jack tars when they come home, and so of the men and officers of the Marine Corps. If the work on the breakwater is not completed then, there is an opportunity for us to reappropriate the balance, and so as to any unexpended balance for river and harbor improvements or any specific object for which money may be needed. In other words, we do not strike; but we get a report from the different Bureaus and different Departments of what they need to be reappropriated of the amounts that are going into the Treasury in time to act and prevent their going in; and therefore I propose to amend the amendment as reported from the Committee of the Whole by striking out in line 2 the word "four" and inserting "five."

Mr. ALCORN. The purpose I had was to avoid a lapse at what I conceive to be an important period of the year, and I did not see the force of the remarks of the Senator from Louisiana even admitting that the premises which he assumed were true, in which it appears he was broadly mistaken.

As to this covering back into the Treasury, the point is made that it is absolutely necessary, to understand the affairs of this nation, that each and every Department of the Government shall on the 1st of July cover all the money that has been appropriated into the Treasury, and unless covered in that there is no possible means of ascertaining the condition of the affairs of the Government. It does occur to me that it would require no very large amount of book-keeping skill for the different Departments of the Government to make their balances and present those balances to Congress, without having those balances covered into the Treasury, and that it would require no very large amount of sagacity or investigation upon the part of the different committees to learn from those reports and those returns and those balances struck the amount that lay to the credit of any particular enterprise in the hands of the Government. But suppose that the Congress of the United States should not adjourn on the 1st of July and the appropriation bills of the Government should then be pending and not passed. The time has been, and I apprehend it will come again, when Congress has continued its session until October; and it is known to every one that the appropriation bills are among the last bills that are passed, as a general rule. Then it might be that here while we were engaged in the business of legislating on the 1st of July, an important period of the year, when it was necessary for the snag-boats of the Mississippi River to be at work, when it was necessary that all the different Departments of the Government should be kept alive and sustained by the appropriations of Congress, we should be called to halt for the reason that all the money appropriated had been covered into the Treasury. I cannot see the practical value of this covering into the Treasury. I cannot see but that a balance struck and made known to our committees would answer all the purposes of covering into the Treasury; and any balance is always at the will of Congress, subject to the direction of Congress, to be reappropriated or to be by special enactment covered in at any time that Congress may see proper to contract any appropriation that may have been made. I therefore stand, for the reasons I first mentioned, opposed to the amendment.

Mr. RAMSEY. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether he proposes to sit the bill out to-night?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes. This is all the question there is left on the bill.

Mr. RAMSEY. Are we likely to get a vote soon?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope so. I hope we shall have a vote at once.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California to the amendment proposed by the Committee of the Whole, to strike out "4" and insert "5," so as to read "1875."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That ought to obviate any possible objection to the section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs upon agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

Mr. CONOVER. I move the following amendment: On page 4, line 84, strike out the words "$2.50" and insert "$3."

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What does that relate to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The bill now reads:

For fourteen pages for the Senate chamber, two riding pages, one page for the Vice-President's room, and one page for the office of the Secretary of the Senate, making eighteen pages in all, at the rate of $2.50 per day while actually employed.

It is proposed to strike out "$2.50" and insert "$3."

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I raise the point of order on that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine will state his point of order.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I understand the Senator proposes to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. CONOVER. I will let it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is a good place for it.

Mr. BOREMAN. I am told that the vote was taken on concurring in the amendment to the fifth section. I was not aware of the fact. My attention was attracted elsewhere by an interrogatory of a gentleman. Is it the fact that the vote was taken?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole as amended.

Mr. BOREMAN. I wanted to have the yeas and nays upon the amendment. ["Too late!"]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands it is now too late, the vote having been announced.

Mr. BOREMAN. I was laboring under a misapprehension.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair regrets that very much.

Mr. BOREMAN. I did not suppose there would be objection to having the vote taken over again. I was here ready, but some gentleman made a remark to me which attracted my attention. I wished to call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The matter has been passed over. Does the Senator make any motion?

Mr. BOREMAN. I move to reconsider.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia moves to reconsider the vote by which the Senate concurred in the amendment to section 5 as reported from the Committee of the Whole as amended.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 11, noes 24; no quorum voting.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There is a quorum present. I ask to have the Senate divide again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will again put the question on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. BOREMAN. In order to test the question, I will call for the yeas and nays on this motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 17, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bogy, Boreman, Clayton, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Flanagan, Hitchcock, Johnston, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Ransom, Saulsbury, Stockton, and Thurman—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Conover, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hager, Harvey, Ingalls, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Sargent, Wadleigh, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Jones, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Patterson, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Stevenson, Stewart, and Tipton—31.

So the motion to reconsider was not agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. CONOVER. I wanted to offer an amendment to be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That does not interfere with the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Florida will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to say that I had contemplated renewing the motion in reference to the occupation of the agricultural building; but since the third section has been amended, I do not think that is necessary. I say this in consequence of an opinion I expressed before it was amended.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDIO RESERVATION.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask consent to present a resolution which the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] who was called away, asked me to present for him:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, directed to report to the Senate as soon as may be all facts in his possession in regard to the Presidio reservation, at San Francisco, California, giving its original size and boundaries; how much of it has already been taken or encroached upon; how much, if any of it, can be properly disposed of by the United States, and how much and what part of it is needed for fortifications and other military structures.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SARGENT, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3030) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1873 and 1874, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2999) for the relief of Henry A. Webster, V. B. McCollum, and A. Colby, of Washington Territory, pre-emptors on the Makah Indian reservation, have directed me to report it back without amendment. I wish this bill to take the place on the Calendar of Senate bill No. 742, of the same title, which I reported yesterday.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (H. R. No. 3154) amendatory of the act to incorporate the Columbia Railway Company of the District of Columbia, approved May 24, 1871;

A bill (H. R. No. 3411) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the trustees of the Female Orphan Asylum in Georgetown, and the Washington City Orphan Asylum in the District of Columbia," approved May 24, 1828; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3412) in relation to the bridge across the Potomac River used by the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill (H. R. No. 3415) to provide for the care and custody of persons convicted in the courts of the United States who have or may become insane while imprisoned; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3408) to remove the disabilities of L. L. Lomax, of Virginia.

A bill (H. R. No. 3406) to relieve Joseph Wheeler, of Lawrence County, in the State of Alabama, from all legal and political disabilities imposed by the fourteeenth amendment to the Constitution.

The following bills and joint resolutions were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. No. 3407) to change the name of the schooner Jacob Faithful to Eyvor—to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. No. 3413) to provide for the stamping of unstamped instruments, documents, or papers—to the Committee on Finance.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 103) authorizing the President to issue Army rations and clothing to the destitute people on the Tombigbee, Warrior, and Alabama Rivers—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. RANSOM submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 3168) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works for rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

CIVIL RIGHTS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 1, being the civil-rights bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 11, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Hager, Johnston, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Saulsbury, and Thurman—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Boreman, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Conover, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Oglesby, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Sargent, West, Windom, and Wright—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Bayard, Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Jones, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norwood, Patterson, Pease, Ransom, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Stevenson, Stewart, Stockton, Tipton, Wadleigh, and Washburn—40.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate refuses to adjourn; but there is not a quorum voting.

Mr. DAVIS. Is it in order to adjourn now? I believe it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and thirty-four minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 19, 1874.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 3073) to amend section 19 of an act approved August 18, 1856, entitled "An act to regulate the diplomatic and consular systems of the United States."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, and requested the concurrence of the House in, a bill of the following title:

A bill (S. No. 675) to relieve ships and vessels from compulsory pilot fees in certain cases.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I ask consent to report back from the Committee on Appropriations the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House No. 1013, making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes. The committee recommend concurrence in some and non-concurrence in others. I ask that the recommendations of the committee be agreed to, in order that the bill may go to a committee of conference.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the action of the committee in regard to the amendments of the Senate?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The committee disagree with all the amendments of the Senate increasing appropriations except in one case.

Mr. HOLMAN. As to those amendments increasing appropriations, of course there is no objection to a committee of conference. But where there are reductions of appropriations I think they should be agreed to.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Those are agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the amendments may be read.

The amendments of the Senate were read, and the recommendations of the Committee on Appropriations agreed to without division, except in the following cases:

The amendment of the Senate to increase the assistant observers in the Naval Observatory from two to three was read.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence in that amendment. On investigation, after the bill had passed the House, I became satisfied that the same force should be continued in the observatory that we now have, and therefore requested the committee of the Senate to make this increase.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the House will not concur in that amendment. It seems that we never can succeed in reducing an office or an appropriation or decreasing a salary, without its ultimately getting back into the bill by the action of the other House. It is useless to talk about the House being economical, when we invariably increase the appropriation afterward upon the action of the Senate.

The question was taken, and the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. HALE, of Maine, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

An amendment of the Senate was read to strike out the following:

For contingent expenses of the ordnance service of the Navy, $1,000.

The Committee on Appropriations recommended non-concurrence.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that amendment will be concurred in.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. It is a very small sum.

Mr. HOLMAN. I know it is a very small sum, but the Senate so very seldom acts in the interest of economy that I think we should concur with them when they do so.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. We can concur with them in matters of importance.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the House will concur in this amendment, unless there is some reason why this appropriation should be continued.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. It is a very small sum, smaller than is provided for the same purpose in any other Bureau.

The question was taken, and the amendment was not concurred in.

The amendment of the Senate was read to insert "expenses of recruiting" in the following paragraph:

For contingent expenses of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, namely, for freight and transportation of supplies, &c.

The Committee on Appropriations recommended non-concurrence.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the objection to putting those words in there?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. It is not a matter of any importance, but the committee thought it was not essential to put those words in there. It does not matter whether the amendment is concurred in or not.

Mr. GARFIELD. It makes the language more definite, and I think the amendment should be concurred in.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the House will concur in that amendment.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

An amendment of the Senate was read, to insert after line 22 the following:

Provided, That the office of commandant of the Marine Corps having the rank of a brigadier-general of the Army shall continue until a vacancy shall occur in the same and no longer; and when such vacancy shall occur in said office, immediately thereupon all laws and parts of laws creating said office shall become inoperative, and shall by virtue of this act from thenceforth be repealed: And provided further, That thereafter the commandant of the Marine Corps shall have the rank and pay of a colonel, and shall be appointed by selection by the President from the officers of said corps.

The Committee on Appropriations recommended non-concurrence.

Mr. HOLMAN. If I understand the effect of that amendment, it would seem that it should be concurred in. Perhaps the gentleman will explain the difference between the expenses of the present arrangement and that proposed by this amendment.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The amendment raises the question as to how the head of the Marine Corps shall be appointed. It was thought better, as there was a disagreement between the two Houses as to the manner of appointing the commandant, that the whole subject should go to a committee of conference, which committee could summon before them the head of the Bureau and officers of the department, in order that they might settle the controversy on this subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman inform the House what is the difference between the salary of the commandant as now provided and the pay and emoluments of a colonel as provided by the amendment of the Senate?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The present commandant ranks as a brigadier-general.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust there will not be a moment's hesitation in concurring in this amendment. I trust this unnecessary corps in our service will not be made the occasion of continuing such an unseemly and unnecessary expenditure as a brigadier-generalship at the head of the corps. The House will perceive that in the amendment the Senate contemplates the appointment of a colonel only at the head of this corps instead of a brigadier-general, and his promotion from the lower grades in conformity to the idea of the civil-service reform. This proposition is the more appropriate from the fact that this branch of the service approaches more nearly to the civil service than to our military organization. I trust, therefore, there will be no hesitation on the part of the House in concurring in this amendment. The subject is one upon which every gentleman in the House has general information, and with which certainly the Finance Committee of the Senate and the Committee on Appropriations of the House must be very familiar. I do not see any necessity that the question should be left open. I trust that this measure of reform, small as it is, will meet the approval of the House.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I agree with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that the head of this corps ought to be nothing more than a colonel; and if that were all that the question involved, I would assent to the amendment. But it raises another question. There are, it is said, old officers of the corps of great merit who when a vacancy happens, as it soon must, would claim the right to succeed by rank. This question of promotion is one upon which these officers are tender; and therefore the committee recommended that this amendment be non-concurred in, so that the committee of conference might consider all branches of the subject. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GOOCH] wishes to say a word. I yield to him.

Mr. GOOCH. I think this amendment raises the question whether or not the head of the Marine Corps should hold that position by selection or by promotion according to rank. It seems to me that the head of every corps should obtain his position by selection rather than by promotion. It often happens that a man who can discharge well enough his particular duties in a subordinate capacity, with some one above him to direct him, is not fit to be at the head of a corps.

This corps is composed of from two to three thousand men; and it is proper that the head of this corps, in order to be in keeping in respect to rank with other officers of the Army having similar responsibilities, should be a brigadier-general. And I must confess that I see no very great saving in the other proposition. You do not save the expense of a brigadier-general. The question is whether you shall have two colonels—one colonel commandant and another colonel of the Marine Corps, or one brigadier-general who will be the commandant of the corps, and one colonel.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly not. The amendment abolishes one brigadier-generalship and substitutes one of the colonels already in the service. The measure is a wise one. The idea that there is any necessity for a brigadier-general in this service is simply absurd.

Mr. GOOCH. I do not agree with the gentleman in his construction of the amendment. If it be concurred in, we shall then have one colonel commandant and another colonel of the Marine Corps; and the only difference is that the amendment changes the rank of the highest officer of the corps from brigadier-general to colonel.

The other question is, whether the head of this corps—the man responsible for everything pertaining to it—shall take that position merely by promotion, depriving the President of the power to select an officer for this purpose, and giving the place to a man merely because he has advanced along to that grade, or whether the President shall have the power of selection. It seems to me the President should have the right to choose the head of every corps. We know very well that in the Army promotions are made by rank up to and including the grade of colonel, but above that they are made by selection in order that the men who are at the head of any important military organization may be selected by the President, and not receive their places merely by promotion according to rank.

Mr. COBURN. Right here let me say, as a pertinent illustration connected with this subject, that the Paymaster-General is a colonel by selection. The law specially provides that the Paymaster-General shall obtain the position by selection, with the rank of colonel; and the present incumbent was selected, though inferior in rank to certain other officers of the Pay Department. This is what the Senate has provided with respect to the Marine Corps.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I am anxious that this bill shall be out of the way of the Committee on Ways and Means; and hence I do not push this matter of non-concurrence if the House think it best to concur. I find that many gentlemen who are intelligent on this subject have that view; and I do not make objection to concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. There is one amendment in relation to the Naval Academy at Annapolis which should have been concurred in. It is in relation to the contingent fund of the academy. The committee, after investigating the matter and hearing the superintendent of the school, are satisfied that the sum fixed by the Senate, which is not the amount that was asked for, but a medium sum, is fair and just.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "30,000" and insert "46,600;" so that it will read: "For contingent expenses, $46,600."

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That should be concurred in. The committee were unanimous in recommending concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HALE, of Maine, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move that a conference be asked on the disagreeing votes between the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House, Mr. HALE, of Maine, Mr. SCOFIELD, and Mr. MARSHALL.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. It seems that House bills, especially appropriation bills, which come back from the Senate with amendments ought to be printed with the Senate amendments at once. This bill should be printed so the report of the committee of conference when it comes in may come in printed.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. If the member will send to the document-room he will find all these amendments have been printed by the Senate and numbered.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not understand the Senate ordered the bill to be printed as it is now.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I desire when the committee of conference makes its report it shall come here in print.

JACOB DICE.

Mr. CASON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3416) for the relief of Jacob Dice, of Fountain County, Indiana; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

THOMAS CLAIBORNE.

Mr. WHITTHORNE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3417) to relieve Thomas Claiborne, of Tennessee, of political disabilities imposed upon him by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) passed.

COURT AT JACKSON, TENNESSEE.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I have been requested by my colleague, [Mr. ATKINS,] who is absent on important committee business, to move that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1995) to amend the act approved June 18, 1838, entitled "An act to require the judge of the district courts of East and West Tennessee to hold a court at Jackson, in said State," and that the same be put on its passage at this time. It is recommended by the Judiciary Committee.

The bill, which was read, provides in the first section that so much of section 1 of the act entitled "An act to require the judge of the district courts of East and West Tennessee to hold a court at Jackson, in said State," approved June 18, 1838, be so amended as to detach the county of Perry, as at present bounded, in the State of Tennessee, from the district of West Tennessee, and the same be attached to the middle district of Tennessee; and that all cases arising in said county of Perry which are now returnable to the United States district court at Memphis shall hereafter be returnable to the United States district court at Nashville, in said State of Tennessee.

The second section provides that all cases from said county of Perry now pending may, with the consent of parties, by order of the United States district court for said State, be transferred from Memphis to Nashville.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WHITTHORNE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DAWES. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the moiety bill from the Committee on Ways and Means. The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. TYNER,] who has charge of the post-office appropriation bill, suggests that at three o'clock, if the regular order be not disposed of before that time, the remaining portion of the day be given in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to the post-office appropriation bill, which he thinks can be finished in a few hours.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I trust we may be able to get through with the moiety bill to-day, and I think we will if we shall have the whole day given to it. I hope, therefore, the gentleman will withhold his motion until we can see how the debate runs.

The SPEAKER. If the moiety bill be not disposed of at three o'clock it would be a judicious distribution of business to allow it to go over until the morning in order to proceed with the consideration of the post-office appropriation bill this afternoon.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. If it shall appear that two days are requisite for the consideration of the regular order I will not offer any objection to the gentleman's motion, but I do trust no such understanding will be entered into now.

Mr. TYNER. I propose at three o'clock, if the moiety bill is not then disposed of, to move to go in committee on the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. DAWES. After holding the Committee on Ways and Means upon this important measure until this time over last week, I hope the Committee on Appropriations will not insist upon pressing their motion as suggested.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations on Saturday gave notice they would not upon this day antagonize the Ways and Means Committee upon this bill.

Mr. TYNER. If the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations made that statement I, as a member of the committee, am willing to stand by it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I made the statement, but at the same time I suggested that if found to be convenient a part of the day might be given to the Committee on Appropriations.

MOIETIES.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported the bill (H. R. No. 3171) to amend the customs-revenue laws, and to repeal moieties, with amendments.

The bill in its first section repeals section 7 of the act entitled "An act to punish frauds upon the revenue, to provide for the more certain and speedy collection of claims in favor of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863; the thirty-ninth section of the act entitled "An act further to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes, approved July 18, 1866; and the second section of the act entitled "An act to regulate the disposition of the proceeds of fines, penalties, and forfeitures incurred under the laws relating to the customs, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1867.

Section 2 repeals all provisions of law under which moieties of any fines, penalties, or forfeitures, or any share therein or commission thereon, are paid to informers or officers of customs, or other officers of the United States; and provides that from and after the date of the passage of the act the proceeds of all fines, penalties, and forfeitures shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Section 3 provides that in all suits and proceedings other than criminal, arising under any of the revenue laws of the United States, the attorney representing the Government, whenever, in his belief, any business-book, invoice, or paper, belonging to or under the control of the defendant or claimant, will tend to prove any allegation made by the United States, may make a written motion, particularly describing such book, invoice, or paper, and setting forth the allegation which he expects to prove; and thereupon the court in which suit or proceeding is pending shall issue a notice to the defendant or claimant to produce such book, invoice, or paper in court, at a day and hour to be specified in said notice, which, together with a copy of said motion, shall be served formally on the defendant or claimant by the United States marshal, by delivering to him a certified copy thereof or otherwise serving the same as original notices of subpœna in the same court are served; and if the defendant or claimant shall fail to produce such book, invoice, or paper in obedience to such notice, the allegations stated in the said motion shall be taken as confessed, unless his failure to produce the same shall be explained to the satisfaction of the court. And the said attorney shall be permitted to make examination of said book, invoice, or paper, if produced, and may offer the same in evidence on behalf of the United States. But the owner of said books and papers, his agent or attorney, shall have free access to them at all reasonable times pending their custody by the court.

Section 4 provides that it shall hereafter be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any money specifically appropriated by Congress, to make suitable compensation in certain cases under the customs-revenue laws, as hereinafter provided and not otherwise; and he shall annually report to Congress, in detail, all payments by him for such purpose. Whenever any officer of the customs or other person shall detect and seize goods, wares, or merchandise in the act of being smuggled or which have been smuggled, he shall be entitled to such compensation therefor as the Secretary of the Treasury shall award, not exceeding in amount one-half of the net proceeds, if any, resulting from such seizure, after deducting all costs and charges connected therewith; provided that for the purposes of this act smuggling shall be construed to mean the act, with intent to defraud, of bringing into the United States or, with like intent, attempting to bring into the United States, dutiable articles without passing the same, or the package containing the same, through the custom-house or submitting them to the officers of the revenue for examination. And whenever any person not an officer of the United States shall furnish to a district-attorney or to any chief officer of the customs original information concerning any fraud upon the customs revenue, perpetrated or contemplated, which shall lead to the recovery of any duties withheld or of any fine, penalty, or forfeiture incurred, whether by importers or their agents or by any officer or person employed in the customs service, such compensation may, on such recovery, be paid to such person so furnishing information as shall be just and reasonable, not exceeding in any case the sum of $5,000; which compensation shall be paid, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any money appropriated for that purpose.

Section 5 provides that no payment shall be made to any person furnishing information in any case wherein judicial proceedings shall have been instituted, unless his claim to compensation shall have been established to the satisfaction of the court or judge having cognizance of such proceedings, and the value of his services duly certified by said court or judge for the information of the Secretary of the Treasury; but no certificate of the value of such services shall be conclusive of the amount thereof. And when any fine, penalty, or forfeiture shall be collected without judicial proceedings, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, before directing payment to any person claiming such compensation, require satisfactory proof that such person is justly entitled thereto.

Section 6 provides that, except in cases of smuggling as aforesaid, it shall not be lawful for any officer of the United States, under any pretense whatever, directly or indirectly, to receive, accept, or contract for any portion of the money which may, under any of the provisions of this act, accrue to any such person furnishing information; and any such officer who shall so receive, accept, or contract for any portion of the money that may accrue as aforesaid shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and on conviction thereof shall be liable to a fine not exceeding $5,000 or imprisonment for not more than one year, or both, in the discretion of the court, and shall not be thereafter eligible to any office of honor, trust, or emolument.

Section 7 provides that no officer or other person entitled to or interested in a part or share of any fine, penalty, or forfeiture incurred under the customs-revenue laws of the United States shall be thereby disqualified from becoming a witness in any action, suit, or proceeding for the recovery, mitigation, or remission thereof, but shall be subject to examination and cross-examination in like manner with other witnesses, without being thereby deprived of any right, title, share, or interest in any fine, penalty, or forfeiture to which such examination may relate; provided that in every such case, whenever the officer or person entitled to any share in the fine, penalty, or forfeiture shall appear as a witness, the defendant or defendants may testify and be examined and cross-examined in like manner.

Section 8 provides that except in the case of personal effects accompanying the passenger, no importation exceeding $100 in dutiable value shall be admitted to entry without the production of a duly-certified invoice thereof as required by law, or of an affidavit made by the owner, importer, or consignee, before any officer authorized to administer oaths, showing why it is impracticable to produce such invoice.

Section 9 provides that no entry shall be made in the absence of a certified invoice, upon affidavit as aforesaid, unless such affidavit be accompanied by a statement, in the form of an invoice or otherwise, showing either the actual cost of the merchandise included in such importation, or, to the best of the knowledge, information, and belief of the deponent, the foreign market value thereof; which statement shall be verified by the owner, importer, consignee, or agent desiring to make entry of the merchandise, and which oath shall be administered by the collector or his deputy.

Section 10 provides that before such oath is taken it shall be lawful for the collector or deputy administering the same to question the deponent touching the sources of his knowledge, information, or belief in the premises, and to require him to make oath to the same, and to produce any letter or paper, in his possession or under his control, which may assist the officers of the customs in ascertaining the dutiable value of the importation, or any part thereof; and in default of such production, when so requested, such owner, importer, consignee, and agent shall be thereafter debarred from producing any such letter or paper for the purpose of avoiding any penalty or forfeiture incurred under this act, unless he shall show to the satisfaction of the court that it was not in his power to produce the same when so demanded.

Section 11 provides that any owner, importer, consignee, agent, or other person who shall, with intent to defraud the revenue, make, or attempt to make, any entry of imported merchandise, by means of any fraudulent or false invoice, affidavit, letter, or paper, or by means of any false statement, written or verbal, or who shall be guilty of any willful act or omission by means whereof the United States shall be deprived of the lawful duties, or any portion thereof, accruing upon the merchandise, or any portion thereof, embraced or referred to in such invoice, affidavit, letter, paper, or statement, or affected by such act or omission, shall severally forfeit and pay a fine of not more than $5,000 for each offense, to be recovered by a joint or several actions in any district or circuit court of the United States; and, in addition to such fine as aforesaid, such merchandise shall be liable to forfeiture, which forfeiture shall apply only to the particular item of merchandise to which such fraud or alleged fraud relates.

Section 12 provides that any merchandise entered by any person or persons violating any of the provisions of the preceding section, but not subject to forfeiture under the same section, may, while owned by him or them, or while in his or their possession, be taken by the collector and held as security for the payment of any fine or fines incurred as aforesaid, or may be levied upon and sold on execution to satisfy any judgment recovered for such fine or fines. But nothing herein contained shall prevent any owner or claimant from obtaining a release of such merchandise on giving a bond with sureties satisfactory to the collector, or, in case of judicial proceedings, satisfactory to the court, for the payment of any fine or fines so incurred; provided, however, that such merchandise shall in no case be released until all accrued duties thereon shall have been paid or secured.

Section 13 provides that wherever any statute requires that to the cost or market value of any goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States there shall be added to the invoice thereof, or, upon the entry of such goods, wares, and merchandise, charges for inland transportation, commissions, port duties, expenses of shipping, export duties, cost of packages, boxes, or other articles containing such goods, wares, and merchandise, or any other incidental expenses attending the packing, shipping, or exportation thereof from the country or place where purchased or manufactured, the omission, without intent thereby to defraud the revenue, to add and state the same on such invoice or entry, shall not be cause of a forfeiture of such goods, wares, and merchandise, or of the value thereof; but in all cases where the same, or any part thereof, are omitted it shall be the duty of the collector or appraiser to add the same, for the purposes of duty, to such invoice or entry, either in items or in gross, at such price or amount as he shall deem just and reasonable, (which price or amount shall be conclusive,) and to impose and add thereto the further sum of 100 per cent. of the price or amount so added, which addition shall constitute a part of the dutiable value of such goods, wares, and merchandise, and shall be collectable as provided by law in respect to duties on imports.

Section 14 provides that it shall be the duty of any officer or person employed in the customs-revenue service of the United States, upon detection of any violation of the customs laws, forthwith to make complaint thereof to the district attorney of the district in which such frauds shall be committed. Immediately upon the receipt of such complaint, if in his judgment it can be sustained, it shall be the duty of such district attorney to cause investigation into the facts to be made before a United States commissioner having jurisdiction thereof, and to initiate proper proceedings to recover the fines and penalties in the premises, and to prosecute the same with the utmost diligence to final judgment.

Section 15 provides that in all actions, suits, and proceedings in any court of the United States now pending or hereafter commenced or prosecuted to enforce or declare the forfeiture of any goods, wares, or merchandise, or to recover the value thereof, or any other sum alleged to be forfeited by reason of any violation of the provisions of the customs-revenue laws, or any of such provisions, in which action, suit, or proceeding an issue or issues of fact shall have been joined, it shall be the duty of the court, on the trial thereof, to submit to the jury, as a distinct and separate proposition, whether the alleged acts were done with an actual intention to defraud the Government of the United States or its revenues, and to require upon such proposition a special finding by such jury; or, if such issues be tried by the court without a jury, it shall be the duty of the court to pass upon and decide such proposition as a distinct and separate finding of fact.

Section 16 provides that whenever, for an alleged violation of the customs-revenue laws, any person who shall be charged with having incurred any fine, penalty, forfeiture, or disability other than imprisonment, or shall be interested in any vessel or merchandise seized or subject to seizure, when the appraised value of such vessel or merchandise is not less than $1,000, shall present his petition to the judge of the district in which the alleged violation occurred, or in which the property is situated, setting forth, truly and particularly, the facts and circumstances of the case, and praying for relief, such judge shall, if the case, in his judgment, requires, proceed to inquire, in a summary manner, into the circumstances of the case, at such reasonable time as may be fixed by him for that purpose, of which the district attorney and the collector shall be notified by the petitioner, in order that they may attend and show cause why the petition should be refused.

Section 17 provides that the summary investigation thereby provided for may be held before the judge to whom the petition is presented, or, if he shall so direct, before any United States commissioner for such district, and the facts appearing thereon shall be stated and annexed to the petition, and, together with a certified copy of the evidence, transmitted, without cost or expense to the petitioner, to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall thereupon have power to mitigate or remit such fine, penalty, or forfeiture, or remove such disability, or any part thereof, if in his opinion the same shall have been incurred without willful negligence or any intention of fraud in the person or persons incurring the same; and to direct the prosecution, if any shall have been instituted for the recovery thereof, to cease and be discontinued, upon such terms or conditions as he may deem reasonable and just.

Section 18 provides that it shall not be lawful for any officer of customs, special agent, or district attorney to compromise or settle any claim of the United States arising under the customs laws, or relieve from any fine, penalty, or forfeiture; and any officer or person who shall so compromise or settle any such claim, or attempt to make such compromise or settlement, or relieve or attempt to relieve from such fine, penalty, or forfeiture, shall be guilty of a felony, and, on conviction thereof, shall suffer imprisonment not exceeding ten years, and be fined not exceeding $10,000; provided, however, that the Secretary of the Treasury, in accordance with general regulations to be prescribed by him, not in conflict with existing laws nor with the provisions of the act, may remit any fines, penalties, or forfeitures, upon sufficient proof that there was no intention of fraud or willful neglect upon the part of such person or persons against whom such fines, penalties, or forfeitures shall have accrued, or on the part of his or their agent or agents.

Section 19 provides that whenever any application shall be made to the Secretary of the Treasury for the mitigation or remission of any fine, penalty, or forfeiture, or the refund of any duties, in case the amount involved is not less than $1,000, the applicant shall notify the district attorney and the collector of customs of the district in which the duties, fine, penalty, or forfeiture accrued; and it shall be the duty of such collector and district attorney to furnish to the Secretary of the Treasury all practicable information necessary to enable him to protect the interests of the United States.

Section 20 provides that whenever any goods, wares, and merchandise shall have been entered and passed free of duty, and whenever duties upon any imported goods, wares, and merchandise shall have been liquidated and paid, and such goods, wares, and merchandise shall have been delivered to the owner, importer, agent, or consignee, such entry and passage free of duty and such settlement of duties shall, in the absence of fraud and in the absence of protest by the owner, importer, agent, or consignee, be final and conclusive upon all parties.

Section 21 provides that no suit or action to recover any pecuniary penalty or forfeiture of property accruing under the customs-revenue laws of the United States shall be maintained unless such suit or action shall be commenced within two years after the time when such penalty or forfeiture shall have accrued; provided that the time of any legal disability of the person, or his absence from the United States, or of any concealment or absence of the property, shall not be reckoned within the period of limitation.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

On line 16, of section 3, strike out the word "subpœna," and insert the word "suit."

On line 5, of section 12, insert, after the word "possession," "to double the amount claimed."

On line 12, of section 15, strike out the words "Government of the;" also, in same line and succeeding line, strike out "or its revenues."

Add at the end of section 15 these words: "and in such cases, unless intent to defraud shall be so found, no fine, penalty, or forfeiture shall be imposed."

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. If there be no objection I ask that these amendments may be considered as adopted. They are the amendments of the committee, and do not change at all the character of the bill.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I yield to the chairman of the committee to offer two amendments, to be considered pending.

Mr. DAWES. I offer the following amendments:

Strike out the third section of the bill.

Add to the sixth section as follows:

And any such person so furnishing information as aforesaid, who shall pay to any such officer of the United States, or to any person for his use, directly or indirectly, any portion of said money, or any other available thing, on account of or because of such money, shall have a perpetual right of action against such officer or other person or his legal representatives to recover back the same or the value thereof.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I now enter a motion to recommit the bill.

Mr. BECK. Before that is done I wish to offer a section as a substitute for the third section, to be considered as pending. I send it to the desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. That no Senator, Representative, or Delegate to Congress shall after his election and during his continuance in office act as agent, attorney, proctor, advocate, solicitor, or counsel for any person against whom suits or proceedings have been or are about to be commenced for violation of the revenue laws, or who has any claim for drawbacks or reclamations for duties, taxes, or excises paid or demanded or for the United States or any agent, employé, informer, officer, or officers of the revenue or customs service of the United States in any suit or proceeding relative to the customs dues, excises, or taxes, nor shall he receive any compensation, gift, or reward from such persons or officers for any service, advice, counsel, or aid afforded such person or persons, officer or officers, agent, informer, or employé.

And any person offending against this provision shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000 and imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten years, at the discretion of the court trying the same, and shall be forever thereafter incapable of holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States; and any person who shall pay, or cause to be paid to any Senator, Representative, or Delegate, or to any person for his use or benefit, directly or indirectly, any sum of money or other thing of value because of such services or advice relative to any of the matters aforesaid, shall have a right at any time to bring suit for the recovery thereof, or its value, in any court of the United States, against such Senator, Representative, or Delegate, or the person or persons who received the same, or may unite all such persons in the same suit.

Mr. BECK. I ask that the amendment may be printed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. MERRIAM. I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I decline to yield further.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS] enters a motion to recommit, which will include the amendments offered by the chairman of the committee and the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, the measure which is now submitted for action commands attention by its importance. It deals with much of the machinery for the enforcement of our customs-revenue laws. It reduces penalties and forfeitures in cases designated. It submits the question of fraud to the court or jury as a separate issue. It reduces the period of limitation within which suits may be commenced. It abolishes the whole system of moieties, while substituting moderate rewards for the detection of crimes against the revenue. It sweeps away the arbitrary processes for the seizure of books and papers. The aim is to do brave work toward the adjustment of customs legislation to the standard of freedom and intelligence attained in our other statutes.

This bill is the outgrowth of a careful investigation before the Committee on Ways and Means, which began on the 17th of February and closed on the 28th of April, and which is recorded in a volume of nearly three hundred pages, (Miscellaneous Document No. 264.) Representatives of the merchants of the leading cities have been patiently heard, and the committee have sought information from the most competent experts in the service of the Government. They confidently present the bill as worthy to be enacted into law in the interest of the revenues, of public morality, and of commerce.

APPEALS FOR ACTION.

Rarely have stronger appeals come to Congress than those for the reforms here proposed. The sense of wrong had grown to be profound and general among merchants. It found expression in passionate indignation, in glowing appeals, and in the more eloquent language of personal incident and unquestioned fact. Your customs laws rankled like fetters. You collected your revenues without armies, but hate was settling into the hearts of those who saw their neighbors crushed about them. You wrung your forfeitures from the careless as well as the criminal, and the enormity of the penalty made the offense appear trivial. Ruin trod in the footsteps of your officers. The emoluments of prosecutors and their attorneys exceeded the salary of your President and of all the justices of the Supreme Court. The informer had but to "strike," and strong men grew pale, great houses tottered, while spoils were gathered in by a charmed circle.

OFFENSES HAVE BEEN COMMITTED.

Offenses have been committed against the revenue. But crime may be cultivated instead of being prevented. Cruel and extreme penalties cultivate it. If it be fraud to misconstrue a statute, crime is inevitable. At the best, attempts will be made to defraud the revenue. They will increase, and the chance of punishment will be diminished, whenever public sentiment pronounces the laws unduly severe and their application harsh and oppressive.

DUTY TO REMOVE JUST GROUND OF COMPLAINT.

The first duty of the Government is to remove every just ground of complaint against the laws and their administration. When that is done, enforce them without fear or favor. Our institutions depend on the good-will of the citizen. For the collection of the revenue, one of the primary essentials is the moral support of those who pay. This has been to an alarming degree lost. Sympathy has been aroused for those charged with offenses against the customs. Penalties enforced in accordance with the letter of the law have excited odium. The machinery of a past age, the rigors of the war period, the monstrous forfeitures of our system, have borne their natural fruit. Violation of the laws has ceased to affix opprobrium. Their enforcement carries a taint as in the case of the old fugitive-slave law.

DEMORALIZATION OF IMPORTERS.

We have heard general denunciations of demoralization among importers. Commerce is not a prohibited occupation. Men honorable in every other relation, an entire class, including those who bear the ark of religion and the sacred fires of art, and who sustain the very fabric of society, cannot be all knaves in their transactions with the Government. If they be offenders, provide penalties against them which can be enforced by the courts. Let them be certain, and not dependent upon the temper of customs officers, nor the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. Your fines and forfeitures are now so enormous that suits begin with compromise and often end in remission.

ODIUM WITHOUT PROFIT.

The Government bears the odium of cruel extortions without their profit. Our statutes array merchants in hostility without advantage. The honest importer is annoyed and terrified by the shadow of ruinous penalties never collected. It will cost nothing to change this situation. Very much can be gained. Those who pay our duties are citizens. They are interested in our institutions. Besides their money interest in an equal enforcement of the laws, they are an essential part of the constituency from which the Government proceeds and on which it depends. Their aid is better than police. Their support is better than armed men. Against their sense of wrong, against their aroused moral sentiment, laws and officers can do little. Just laws, reasonable penalties, humane enforcement, enlist the conscience, the interest, the active support of those who are affected. If we retain the processes, the spirit, the harsh severity of barbaric ages in laws and administration, we must expect the restiveness, the attempts at fraud, the moral resistance which extreme measures always invite. Every step of amelioration in general legislation, every removal of unreasonable penalties and punishment, has tended to diminish crime and to develop better citizenship. The like result may be anticipated from a mitigation of the harshness of proceedings, and of the extortionate forfeitures under our customs laws.

NOT A QUESTION OF FREE TRADE OR PROTECTION.

This is not a question of free trade or protection. Without duties, or with very low duties, the difficulty of collection would be lessened. But even the most sturdy protectionist cannot desire that cruel and unusual punishments should be inflicted, or that our revenue system should be rendered gratuitously obnoxious. It becomes especially the advocates of protection to show that their policy can be maintained without gross wrongs to individuals, and without conferring extraordinary emoluments upon any favorites. To one class of theorists every barrier in the path of commerce is an offense. The other school must prove by action that annoying litigation, onerous fines, and ruinous forfeitures are no part of a protective system. Can importation, under our laws, be safely prosecuted by honest citizens of average intelligence? This test is now applied. Only an affirmative answer can be possible. Otherwise our whole customs system must be remodeled.

SEIZURE OF BOOKS AND PAPERS.

The first proposition of the pending bill is the repeal of all laws authorizing the seizure of books and papers. The system as it now exists was begun by the act of March 3, 1863. In practice previously shrewd informers were able, under color of law, to take books and papers. But before that date no statute gave to the Government any power in this regard which did not belong to every citizen. The law of 1863 grew out of the exercise of war powers. Revenue was necessary. At some, at least, of our great ports it was alleged that disloyal men were by system defrauding the revenue. Extraordinary powers were employed in every direction for the national defense. It was natural that Congress should concede them to protect the revenues.

The act of July 18, 1866, and of March 2, 1867, are restrictions upon this power. In the last Congress a bill for more radical restraints upon it was reported by the Committee on Ways and Means, and passed the House but failed in the Senate. A very thorough examination now impels the committee to go a step farther in limiting the power of the Government and protecting the liberties of the citizen.

The committee do not approach the question of the constitutionality of the statutes which it is proposed to repeal. If the right of seizure of books and papers exists, it should be reserved for grave occasions; it should not be the daily resort of the Government. It is the powerful medicine for a dangerous disease, not the constant food for ordinary health.

What is this process? It is, upon the warrant of a judge, based upon an affidavit, to enter any premises and to seize any books and papers and to hold them indefinitely to discover or to prove guilt. It is to give the Government officers free range in all the privacy of home or business. It is on mere suspicion to strip naked all the confidences of commerce and of life. The special agent, D. G. Jayne, stated before the committee the method of procedure, (Miscellaneous Document No. 264, page 171:)

Mr. ROBERTS. Have you taken in any case any books or papers other than those bearing directly upon the charges made and of which notice had been given?

Mr. JAYNE. It has been the intention, sir, in every case to confine ourselves strictly to books of that kind. We have been very careful in every case to take none but the commercial books of the house. It is very difficult to tell whether a book relates to a particular importation. You have to trace the goods through in order to ascertain. Sometimes it will take a long time to select the books, and most generally the importer's counsel appears upon the scene immediately. We always wait until they arrive. They say, "Do not wait here to make your examination; if there is any doubt about it, take it along."

Mr. ROBERTS. So that in fact, then, you have taken other books than those bearing on the case?

Mr. JAYNE. We have found that some books that we have taken did not have the entries in pertaining to the importations. That is true. It has not been the intention, however.

Mr. ROBERTS. What use have you ever made of any books or papers, including entries, other than those bearing on the particular case?

Mr. JAYNE. Where I have found entries upon the same pages of the books and part of the same general transaction, we have frequently included them for recovery. We have used nothing except it came from the book which had the account of the importations in it to which the warrant referred.

Not merely for purposes of evidence in a particular case are books and papers taken, but they are seized and used for every purpose of a detective. They are held indefinitely, as in a recent case in New York, where after ten months Judge Blatchford has just issued an order for their return.

Frequently by mere mention of a warrant, to avoid publicity, officers compel access to the inmost recesses of safe and ledger. Such a power, in its essence, is arbitrary. Exercised by the best of men, it would be offensive and dangerous.

The only excuse for it would be necessity. Yet we do not concede to the Government such powers in defense of its own existence. In Britain, indeed, the official crime is historic, by which upon private papers seized in his closet Algernon Sidney was put to death. That brilliant name warns us of the danger of such a system. General warrants and writs of assistance long stained British jurisprudence. They have been abolished, and now the Crown has no power to compel evidence which the meanest subject does not possess.

In no other case whatever is the citizen subjected to like process. Not on charge of treason, not for any other crime, can personal rights be so assailed. Shall we concede the power for the maintenance of the revenue? Put it in the strongest light. Suppose it to be dollars and cents to the Treasury against the liberties of the people. The American Congress must always set liberty above revenue.

But they are not in antagonism. Harsh measures, the extreme resorts of despotism, always breed the crimes against which they are directed. In Turkey, in the days of the bow-string, cruelty was met by crime. Treason has in all lands disappeared as the precautions against it, the barbarism in its detection, and the violence in its punishment have been mitigated. That is the history of crime and of legislation.

In our great national trial it was not force, it was not severe laws which brought treasures into the coffers of the Government. In ordinary times such enthusiasm and sacrifice cannot be maintained. But you must guard against such cruel measures as will render frauds respectable and will raise false importations into a sort of chivalry.

The Government should have before the law against citizens only the same remedies which citizens have against each other. It will then have every advantage on its side. It endures, and never dies. It has limitless resources. Its eyes are everywhere. Its swarm of officers are witnesses always at hand. The common interest is with it against the accused. In no State in the Union is any extraordinary authority required to collect local taxes. The national Government cannot need the power.

The cases in which the power of seizure has been exercised have not exceeded two hundred in all for the past four years—not an average of fifty a year. That is the statement of the Department of Justice. The greater share of suits for violation of the customs laws occurs in the southern district of New York. In that district George Bliss, esq., the United States attorney, testifies, (page 197:)

I have a statement of all the warrants to seize books and papers that have been issued in the southern district of New York since the 1st of March, 1869. It happens to be five years, although the date was not selected on that account, but was selected for the reason that in the third volume of the report of the Senate committee which was appointed to investigate alleged frauds in the New York custom-house, and which was published in the year 1872, at page 727, a table is found, giving all of those cases from the 19th of March, 1869, to the 25th of November, 1871. The record which I have here takes that up and brings it down from that time to the present. It amounts to this, that in five years there have been 120 warrants to take books and papers issued in the southern district of New York. In the year 1869, from March to December, there were 19 cases; in the year 1870, the whole year, there were 20 cases; in the year 1871, 34 cases; in the year 1872, 10 cases; in the year 1873, 33 cases; and in the two and a half months of 1874, 4 cases. So that the committee will perceive that not only is this abuse, as it is called, much less in its extent than has been represented, but it is not an increasing abuse. The largest number of warrants issued was in the year 1871.

The table is as follows:

Number of warrants to take books and papers issued in southern district of New York for five years from March 1, 1869, to March 1, 1874.

Year.	From—	To—	Total cases.	Still pending.	No. closed.	Approximate amount of judgment or compromise.
1869	March ..	December...	19	9	10	$280,000
1870	March ..	December...	20	4	16	435,000
1871	March ..	December...	34	10	24	275,000
1872	March ..	December...	10	2	8	355,000
1873	March ..	December...	33	9	24	300,000
1874	March ..	December...	4	4	.....	.....
Total	...	.....	120	38	82	1,645,000

Now, of those cases in which books and papers have been taken during those five years, 38 cases are still pending, and 82 cases have been finally disposed of by judgment or settlement, or remission (which I call settlement) by the Secretary. In these 82 cases the parties have paid, or the judgments were recovered, for about $1,645,000, and the proportion of those cases each year runs very much the same. Of the 19 cases for 1869, 9 are still pending, and 10 have been closed, realizing $435,000. Of the 34 cases in 1871, 10 are pending and 24 have been closed, realizing $275,000. Of the 10 cases in 1872, 2 are pending and 8 are closed, realizing $355,000. Of the 33 cases in 1873, 9 are pending and 22 are closed, realizing about $300,000. From the 4 cases of 1874 there has been nothing received. The amount in the Phelps-Dodge case is included in the year 1872, the warrant for the books and papers having been issued in that year. In carrying out the amounts realized they are credited to the year in which the warrant for the seizure of the books and papers was issued, although the amount may have been subsequently received.

For this small sum of money an odium has been excited and an indignation aroused beyond estimate in coin. For these few cases our statute-book is stained by these provisions. So far as is shown, without them, every dollar might have been collected. But suppose not. To prosecute these few offenders the liberties of every citizen are put in jeopardy; nay more, they are by solemn enactment potentially invaded.

The majority of the committee still deem it of moment to have a uniform rule for all the States for the use of books and papers. It stands in the third section of the bill. The committee distinctly exclude all authority to resort to such process in criminal cases. They extend the common right which exists for the collection of dues to suits for forfeiture. They prescribe a formal motion and a notice upon which books and papers may be produced in court, on actual trial, for specific evidence; not held for months for indiscriminate examination. They are not to be seized at all. The defendant may if he choose refuse to produce them, and the alternative is the confession of the allegation based upon the books, unless good cause be shown for not producing them. A minority of the committee, in which I count myself, ask for a separate vote upon the third section, upon the motion of the distinguished chairman of Ways and Means.

MOIETIES.

The laws permitting moieties to informers, and allowing officers of customs to participate therein, have been on the statute-book without interruption since 1799. On the 11th of February, 1846, a law was passed which was construed as excluding the officers from all share in the moieties. But in 1849 Judge Ware, of Massachusetts, (Davies's Reports,) declared that the law did not have this effect, but authorized the practice which had then prevailed for half a century.

In 1867, March 2, the law was made more distinct, but was not changed in its essential provisions. Substantially, the statutes relative to moieties are now as they have been since the earliest days of the Republic.

From 1799 to 1867, with only the interval from 1846 to 1849, these distributions were made by the several collectors, and not by the Secretary of the Treasury. No restraint of publicity was upon them. Only the integrity of the officer limited his demands upon the importer or made certain any report of the case to the Treasury. Even now it is hard to tell how much was collected in those years. Under the order of this House the records have been examined since 1862. Previously to that date we only know that no supervision was exercised over the collectors; that they distributed to themselves and their associates the proceeds of fines and forfeitures, and that the dust of time thickens the darkness which gathers over them. Now, Congress acts upon the rule that no process of administration shall be hidden in secrecy. You ask to know, and will know, where public money comes from and where it goes to. This may disturb timid nerves. It is the security of free institutions.

The report which the Secretary of the Treasury has submitted to the House shows that the total amount distributed at New York and Boston, from July 1, 1862, to March 1, 1874, is $2,152,173.16. At other ports the amount was small. The proceeds have not increased in the recent years. At New York, where the largest share is paid, the collector received:

Name.	Period.	Date.		Amount.
		From—	To—
Hiram Barney....	3 years 5 months.....	April 8, 1861	Sept. 7, 1864	$64,607 29
Simeon Draper...	11 months 24 days....	Sept. 7, 1864	Aug. 3, 1865	55,014 55
Preston King....	8 months 15 days.....	Sept. 1, 1865	May 15, 1866	33,166 94

The rate of Mr. Draper's emoluments under Mr. Lincoln was more than double that of the present collector. It is also just to say that in the elaborate discussion before the Committee on Ways and Means the chief officers of customs in the leading cities have not been assailed, but have been generally commended for their fidelity; and Mr. Schultz, chairman of the delegation of New York merchants, expressly paid to the collector, naval officer, and surveyor of that port the very highest compliment, by these emphatic words, (page 113,) "There is not one of them whom I would not to-day make the executor of my will." The system works the mischief; and in behalf of the system no collector, no naval officer, no surveyor appears to say one word; on the contrary, those officers at Philadelphia come to ask for its unconditional repeal.

Under the stimulus of the moieties, collections under the customs laws, it is alleged, have been enforced by harsh and offensive measures. It is not pretended that they have not been made in accordance with the letter of the law. The charge is that the large interests of the officers has led to the employment of base means for the detection of fraud, to extreme constructions classifying as criminal acts without intent of wrong, to toleration of acts for years afterward denounced as criminal, and to the enforcement of penalties disproportionate to the offense and ruinous to men who had no crime in their hearts. The answer submitted to this allegation is, that the laws have been rigorously enforced without fear or favor; that the courts have been open for defense not only, but for the protection of personal rights, and the Secretary of the Treasury has always listened to every petition for mitigation and remission.

Numerous prosecutions and heavy and ruinous penalties cannot be of advantage to the Government. They may exasperate the citizen. They may render business hazardous, and repel from it prudent and responsible men. It is inevitable that the costs and risks will be charged over to the producer and the consumer, with adequate increase for profits. For every dollar extorted by the Government, burning a deep sense of injustice into the victim, honest trade suffers and the whole community is made to pay tenfold.

The assumption is doubtless in favor of the continuance of a statute which under all parties has remained unchanged during our whole history. But conclusive reasons appear for its repeal. It cannot be wise to have it the interest of officers to permit violations of law; to reward them for crimes committed; to enrich them by prosecutions; to pay them for creating antagonisms between the citizen and the Government. The interest of the officers should be on the side of the Government, but not against the importer. It should be for the collection of the revenue at the lowest rates, not for the increase of litigation and the reduction of the receipts of the Treasury. The chief customs officers construe laws, administer them, direct prosecutions, receive propositions for compromise and settlement. They appear as prosecutors; they are neither judge nor jury, but their opinions have as much force as either; yet the laws give them moieties of the proceeds of every case.

Not only does sound reason demand the repeal of the law, but those charged with administration recommend it. Especially has President Grant, and both his Secretaries of the Treasury, pressed it upon the attention of Congress. In his message of 1869, President Grant said:

> Your attention is respectfully invited to the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury for the creation of the office of Commissioner of Customs revenue; * * and most especially to his recommendation for the repeal of laws allowing shares of fines, penalties, forfeitures, &c., to officers of the Government or to informers.

In the same year, Secretary BOUTWELL said:

> Under existing laws, certain revenue officers and other persons appearing as informers are entitled to shares in fines, penalties, and forfeitures. During the fiscal year 1868-'69, the Treasury Department distributed the sum of $236,073.61 to such officers and to informers in the various cases arising under the customs revenue laws. A large additional sum was also paid through the Internal Revenue office. The reason on which the laws granting such allowances are based is that officers of the Government are stimulated to greater activity in the discovery of frauds and in bringing offenders to punishment. There can be no doubt that such is the effect of the policy; but the experience I have had in the Treasury Department has convinced me that the evils attending the system are greater than the benefits derived from it. It often occurs that revenue officers are led to assert claims in behalf of the Government which have no just foundation in law or in the facts of the respective cases; and where real claims exist it is often the object of the informers and officers who share in the penalties to misrepresent the case to the Department, so as to secure the greatest advantage to themselves. But a more serious evil is found in the practice, quite general, of allowing persons to pursue a fraudulent course until a result is reached which will inure to the benefit of the officers and informers, instead of checking criminal practices at the outset. It is impossible to set forth in exact language the character of the evils that grow out of the present system. I am, however, clearly of the opinion that the Government ought to rely upon public officers for the proper performance of their duties without stimulating them by any contingent advantages.

In 1871, again, President Grant said in his annual message:

> The present laws for collecting revenue pay collectors of customs small salaries, but provide for moieties (shares in all seizures) which, at principal ports of entry particularly, raise the compensation of those officials to a large sum. It has always seemed to me as if this system must at times work perniciously. It holds out an inducement to dishonest men, should such get possession of those offices, to be lax in their scrutiny of goods entered to enable them finally to make large seizures. Your attention is respectfully invited to this subject.

Secretary BOUTWELL repeated his previous recommendations in these words:

> It is my duty to call the attention of Congress to the importance of abolishing the system of shares in moieties as far as the benefits inure to revenue officers and other persons officially connected with the Government. This measure was recommended in my last annual report, and a statement was submitted to Congress showing the amount received by officers of customs, together with the bill increasing their salaries without any increase of appropriations from the Treasury; the sum now paid from moieties being quite sufficient to place the entire force upon a satisfactory footing in regard to pay.
> During the last fiscal year the office of collector and surveyor of the port of New York each received from moieties the sum of $49,215.69, and the naval office the sum of $48,195.59.
> In most of the cases the officers do not perform special services entitling them to the amounts granted, and importers and others whose acts are made the subject of investigation, complain, and, I think, with just reason, that the agents of the Government have a pecuniary interest in pursuing those charged with violations of the law. The Government ought to pay fair salaries, and rely upon the good faith of its officers for the performance of their duty. One of the difficulties which the Department has to meet, frequently is, that customs officers have an interest in proceedings for the discovery of fraud, the settlement of cases, or the prosecution of them, which is different from the real interest of the Government; and, as a necessary result, the conduct of such officers is open to suspicion, both on the part of those who are pursued by them, and the Government that they ostensibly represent.
> It may be deemed expedient to leave the law as it now stands in regard to informers who are not officers, making it a penal offense for any officer to enter into an arrangement with an informer for any share of the proceeds of the information, and giving to the informer perpetual right of action for the recovery of any money or other valuable thing paid or given to an officer engaged in the discovery or prosecution of a fraud or legal wrong against the Government.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue expresses a clear judgment against moieties, and his experience gives him a right to speak. His opinion, too, is decided in favor of rewards for information, from a fund specifically appropriated by Congress. In the Sanborn investigation he said, (page 96, Report 559:)

> Question. Congress repealed all the moiety system as far as internal revenue was concerned?

Answer. Yes.

Q. How long was that before the passage of the act which authorized the San born contract?

A. Not long; but I cannot give you the exact time.

Q. Had the moiety system, up to the time of this repeal, been of such character as to recommend its continuance to you? Were you in favor of its repeal when it was repealed?

A. I was in favor of its repeal with this other provision if I could have some means afterward of compensating persons who gave information, and for that a special appropriation of $100,000 was made. My objection was that, before that, officers and all had moiety alike, and that gave to the officers the appearance of hunters for prey rather than of officers doing their duty.

Q. What was the effect of the moiety system that was repealed by Congress on the service?

A. It hurt the service, I think, in this way: the officer getting his share the same as a private individual, when he went to the citizen, the citizen always claimed that the officer came to him to make money out of him rather than to discharge his official duty, and in that way it seemed to degrade his official acts. That was the objection.

The present Secretary of the Treasury, in an elaborate letter to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Commerce, argues the subject at length, and recommends "the abolition of the present system of moieties with one exception, to wit, where attempts at smuggling are detected or where the act of smuggling is accomplished."

This distinction is made in the bill as reported from the Committee on Ways and Means. It is in accordance with the repeated recommendations of the President and his Secretary of the Treasury. It is not presented as an Administration measure, but it has every element of authority, in the provisions relative to moieties, which such a measure could possess.

The bill will reduce in a large measure the emoluments of certain officers. This effect has more than a pecuniary significance. To save the money is something; but the controlling principle is higher. The public service should be no placer from which to extort huge fortunes for official or favorite. A British historian draws a picture of the effects of the passage of the reform bill:

No example more aptly illustrates the altered relations of rulers to the people than the revision of official emoluments. Ministers once grew rich upon the gains of office, and provided for their relatives by monstrous sinecures and appointments egregiously overpaid. To grasp a great estate out of the public service was too often their first thought. Families were founded, titles endowed, and broken fortunes repaired at the public expense. It was asked what an office was worth; not what services were to be rendered. This selfish and dishonest system perished under exposure; but it proved a tedious and unthankful labor to bring its abuses to the light of day. Inquiries were commenced early in the present century; but were followed by few practical results. At that time "all abuses were freeholds," which the government did not venture to invade. * * * Soon after the reform act, ministers of state accepted salaries scarcely equal to the charges of office; sinecures and reversions were abolished; offices discontinued or consolidated; and the scale of official emoluments revised, and apportioned to the duties performed, throughout the public service. The change attested a higher sense of duty in ministers and increased responsibility to public opinion.—May's Constitutional History of England, volume 2, page 548.

That is a British picture. In all governments the tendency is to excessive official emoluments. When a legislator may, even by indirection, have an interest in them, they become doubly dangerous. They are always the source of faction, strife, and corruption. They are no incitement to the most worthy; they may serve to organize and uphold the least deserving. To clip emoluments to the dimensions of fair compensation is one of the problems of statesmanship. It is in itself reform. It is an index of something deeper and better in legislation. Banish venality from the public service, and you confirm character and purify action. Substitute for money-getting higher ambitions and worthier motives. That is the aim in the blow we strike at moieties.

After abolishing the whole system of moieties the committee felt compelled to provide rewards for the detection of smuggling away from the custom-house, and for information for offenses against the revenue by importers or officials.

Every representative of the merchants who referred to the matter before the committee, every Secretary and official who has discussed the subject, insists upon this distinction. Our long sea-coasts and frontiers afford many facilities for smuggling. Officers stationed at isolated points, with all aid from other persons, with all diligence, will find it difficult to prevent it. The reward in such cases, the committee believe, will contribute to the interests of the revenue. The amount, it is to be observed, is to be certified by the court or judge before whom proceedings occur, and the Secretary will act upon that certificate.

In no case other than smuggling can any officer of the United States receive any reward or any share in it, but compensation for information may be paid to other persons for the detection of crime on the part of officials as well as of importers.

This policy of rewards to outside informers has been adopted for our own internal revenue. Britain, with its simple tariff on a few articles, finds it necessary to offer like rewards, (Lees' Laws of the Customs, 103.) In every government compensation for such information is found indispensable. To discover aggravated crimes local authorities everywhere incite effort and diligence in this way. The committee deem it dangerous to dispense with this provision. As a metropolitan journal which cannot be said to be under custom-house influence, the New York Tribune, has sharply said:

Honest importers do not wish to have the precautions against fraud relaxed. It is of more consequence to them than it is to the United States that every package of goods sent into the country should pay the full amount of duty required by law. They could afford, if necessary, to raise a liberal annual subscription for the compensation of informers and the detection of frauds.

In providing rewards the committee have guarded that they shall not be excessive, by limiting them, except in cases of smuggling, so as not to exceed $5,000 in any one case, and by requiring a certificate of their value from the court or judge. They have also provided severe penalties against any officer who becomes interested in the rewards. The requirement that an annual report shall be made to Congress, in detail, of all payments for this purpose, provides every safeguard against abuse. And only from specific appropriations are any rewards to be paid.

PENALTIES AND FORFEITURES.

The penalties and forfeitures prescribed by law as construed by the courts are seldom or never collected. They are so enormous as rarely to be named as the basis of a suit. They hang in terrorem over commerce and taint the atmosphere. They are neither collected nor do they serve to indicate the relation of offenses to each other. Take this statement of the nominal penalties and duties withheld, with the amount in suit or paid in settlement, including the most important customs cases for the past two years:

Duties withheld.	Nominal penalties.	Amount claimed in suit or settled for.
$1,576 44	$95,232 38	$9,000 00
2,119 21	60,191 04	25,000 00
3,018 05	51,917 90	11,347 00
5,053 70	146,877 12	80,000 00
3,055 50	30,626 34	30,626 34

1,664 68	1,750,000 00	271,017 23
4,500 00	5,000,000 00	50,000 00
4,153 70	100,000 00	Pending.
500 00	20,000 00	5,000 00
1,904 04	28,558 48	19,606 95
6,546 83	104,079 45	50,000 00
2,296 35	75,000 00	25,000 00
3,915 31	41,905 68	41,905 68
---------	70,000 00	1,000 00
---------	8,000 00	100 00
---------	200,000 00	15,551 15
---------	200,000 00	23,250 00
---------	1,500,000 00	400,000 00
---------	43,730 62	12,014 00

Commonly the settlement does not bring one-tenth of the penalties; sometimes a larger share is paid. But instances occur where the proceeds are one-seventieth part of the whole, or even only 1 per cent. of the threatened penalty. Yet it is the legal forfeiture and penalty in all their magnitude which are held up before those accused of even technical violations of the law.

What is the consequence? That the commencement of a suit for violation of the customs laws is financial ruin. The very rich houses may survive public notice of such an event; merchants with moderate capital are wiped out. Mr. Jackson S. Schultz, before the committee, said, (page 107:)

I talked with a very high official of the Government the other day, and he did not know what cartons were; and I did not know myself till recently. They are little paper boxes in which gloves, handkerchiefs, &c., come. These little paper boxes are packed inside of the general cases or boxes. Any honest, common-sense reading of the law would infer that it did not apply to these inside boxes at all. The Secretary of the Treasury, in 1864, did, under the law then in force, issue instructions to the effect that they were not to be included in the cost of the goods; but he afterward, upon a change of the law, modified his order and said that they were to be included. But that change or order did not reach the merchants, and they were allowed to go on for years omitting these cartons from their invoices, until the invoices containing these cartons amounted to two or three or four hundred thousand dollars in each case, and then the moiety officials swooped down upon them. They come around and sweep them into their net, and they have caught them. Three or four of these houses, I am told, are absolutely ruined. I was riding down Broadway the other day with a friend of mine, and he pointed out a house to me and said: "Six months ago I would have sold that man a hundred thousand dollars' worth of goods on six months' credit; to-day he cannot pay his bills." I asked him what the matter was. He said: "He has been struck by the custom-house to the amount of three, four, or five hundred thousand dollars, and I do not think he was ever worth more than one hundred and fifty or two hundred thousand dollars."

The Constitution was meant to guard against just such evils. The eighth amendment provides that "excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted." Unless these are excessive fines such cannot be devised. The threat of them is ruin; absolute confiscation could hardly be worse.

But the Treasury derives no advantage from such atrocious provisions. The enormous forfeitures are not collected. They have incited tiger-like lying in ambush over importations; they have prompted the commencement of suits; they have driven citizens out of business; they have enriched lawyers who watch and wait about the custom-house, ready to accept vast retainers from either side. Whenever anything is collected, one-half has gone to the informers. The odium has fallen upon the Government.

These enormous forfeitures are a growth, and not an enactment. They are massed, first, by a construction that in case of undervaluation of a single item the whole invoice is forfeited; second, that the omission of the price of the sacks, envelopes, or cartons forfeits the entire invoice; third, that the perpetration of any illegal act in importation is technically fraud, and carries with it the penalty, whatever the intent of the importer; and fourth, that for five years all these penalties hang over the owner and consignee and his importations.

Good lawyers question the rulings by which the whole invoice is forfeited by the taint of a single item; and in the Senate, on discussion of Senate bill No. 85 of this session, they were distinctly controverted. But so the courts held. Various constructions have prevailed on the effect of the omission of cartons, but now the sweeping doctrine of confiscation is enforced. The claim is often made that crime cannot exist without intent; but it was at Secretary Guthrie's instance that the rule was fixed that fraud should be presumed in revenue cases upon acts of omission or of commission in the absence of intent.

Obviously these provisions have wrought evil, and only evil. Penalties should be such as can be enforced, and offenders should know that they will be prompt and certain. That is the spirit in which the committee have sought to frame the pending bill.

Instead of forfeiting the whole invoice for undervaluation of a single item, the bill proposes to forfeit the particular item and to add a fine not exceeding $5,000 in the discretion of the court. When costs, charges, and packing are, without intent to defraud, omitted, the collector or appraiser is to add double the sum omitted to the dutiable value. The intention to defraud the revenue is to be submitted as a distinct proposition to the jury, or to be decided by the court when no jury is called. Then the period within which suits can be commenced is reduced from five years to two years—a period quite adequate for exposing any fraud.

These provisions are meant to render the penalties certain and determinate, to bring them within the cognizance of courts and juries, and to leave nothing to the favor or the vengeance of the officer.

In connection with the reduction of forfeitures, additional precautions are thrown about the method of procuring remission and mitigation.

MINOR PROVISIONS.

Section 7 allows the defendant to testify whenever the officer or other person interested shall appear as a witness on the part of the Government. This principle has been successfully adopted in the codes of many of the States.

Sections 8, 9, and 10 facilitate the entry of goods by accepting affidavits and statements in lieu of invoices, under careful restrictions.

APPROVAL AND OBJECTIONS.

Rarely has so important a bill been reported, which has commanded so much favor and called forth so little adverse criticism. From organized boards of trade and chambers of commerce unqualified approval is expressed. From gentlemen of experience in various official positions commendation is not stinted. From any authorized representative of the mercantile interests two sections only arouse any measure of hostility.

The third section, of which I have already spoken, meets with some question in a published letter of Mr. Jackson S. Schultz, chairman of a committee of the New York Chamber of Commerce. I must for the present leave further discussion of that subject to my colleagues on the Committee on Ways and Means.

To the twelfth section, also, Mr. Schultz makes objection. The section is in the following words:

SEC. 12. That any merchandise entered by any person or persons violating any of the provisions of the preceding section, but not subject to forfeiture under the same section, may, while owned by him or them or while in his or their possession, [to double the amount claimed,] be taken by the collector and held as security for the payment of any fine or fines incurred as aforesaid, or may be levied upon and sold on execution to satisfy any judgment recovered for such fine or fines. But nothing herein contained shall prevent any owner or claimant from obtaining a release of such merchandise on giving a bond with sureties satisfactory to the collector, or, in case of judicial proceedings, satisfactory to the court, for the payment of any fine or fines so incurred: Provided, however, That such merchandise shall in no case be released until all accrued duties thereon shall have been paid or secured.

Mr. Schultz says after considerable detail—

It would not be especially objectionable to allow the Government to make these seizures, even in advance of trial, for an amount equal to the alleged loss of actual duties, or to an amount equal to twice or three times such loss. Attachments of that kind, where when one party claims a debt of another, the latter, pending suit, secures the former, are not unprecedented. But who ever heard of security in advance of trial being demanded for fines and penalties of such vast sums?

Mr. Schultz complains that the collector—

Whenever fines are incurred, can aggregate them, on a basis of a penalty for each offense of $5,000, plus the value of the particular item tainted by the alleged fraud, and can then seize any merchandise belonging to or in the possession of the suspected importer or agent equal in value to the aggregate of all such penalties.

If the district attorney or collector had a direct personal interest in multiplying and magnifying suits, some grounds might exist for this sort of complaint. But all that has been removed by the bill. The customs officers have no moiety; the district attorney has not even a commission to impel him to exaggeration of this kind. By the bill penalties have been greatly reduced. For cases where the appraised value is less than $1,000 the Secretary of the Treasury may order remission or mitigation. For larger sums a summary process is provided for the same purpose. Can we do more than this for the relief of commerce? We must also protect the Government. The smuggler taints the vehicle in which he commits the crime. A false entry or fraud in procuring a license forfeits the ship. This section holds property in the hands of the offender for any fraud perpetrated by him in importation. It is a brand set upon the dishonest importer which will prevent consignees from taking advantage of his knavery. The purpose is to enlist the interests of every owner, importer, consignor, or agent in careful and scrupulous observance of the revenue laws. They cannot afford to wink at fraud in others when it may involve themselves. Character and integrity will be sought in consignees rather than adroit and bold scheming. Every merchant will be bound to throw his influence in favor of honest importation. The provision cannot harm those who are scrupulous themselves, and who demand the same qualities in others. We deem the section very important. We claim surety from commerce that the Government shall get its dues. The committee, upon the suggestions urged, however, by an amendment now embodied in the bill, limit the property seized to double the amount claimed by the Government.

A historian of the British constitution draws this strong contrast of two periods in British legislation and administration:

While the basis of power was narrow, rulers had little sympathy with the people. The spirit of their rule was hard and selfish, favoring the few at the expense of the many; protecting privileges and abuses by which the governing classes profited, but careless of the welfare of the governed. With freedom there grew a stronger sense of duty in rulers, more enlightenment and humanity among the people, wiser laws, and a milder policy. The asperities of power were tempered, and the state was governed in the spirit which society approved.—May, volume 2, page 547.

Our history furnishes no such dark colors for the like contrast. But we have a right to demand that more and more, freedom shall bear its fruit here in wiser laws and a milder policy, and that in all departments a spirit shall prevail which will command the confidence and the approval of the worthiest elements in society.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to protect the liberties of the citizen, to mitigate enormities in the statutes which have interferred with their due enforcement, and to provide sure and certain methods for collecting the customs revenue. The changes are in some respects radical, but they are demanded by the interests of the Government and of morality. Instead of demoralizing emoluments to officers, instead of arbitrary processes and absolute confiscation, the bill appeals to the good will of the citizen and to that certainty of enforcement of judicious penalties which are the only trust of a free government.

Sir, let this Congress abolish moieties; let it protect the secrets of business and friendship from arbitrary invasion; let it free commerce from cruel and unreasonable penalties; let it punish intentional fraud more than carelessness or honest misconstruction; let it thus enlist the conscience as well as the interest of the merchants in the collection of customs, and you will mark an epoch in legislation.

Brougham foreshadowed the boast of an ideal administration which "found the law the two-edged sword of craft and oppression, and left it the staff of honesty and the shield of innocence." Something of that boast you may make for this Congress if it shall enact this bill into a statute.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, no question has engaged the attention of the Committee on Ways and Means so earnestly since I have been a member of it as that now submitted to the House for its action. The volume of testimony taken shows the labor we have bestowed on it. It is not to be expected that we have succeeded in presenting a bill which will satisfy all. I am utterly opposed to the third section, while I know that some of the representatives of the commercial cities demand the absolute and unconditional abandonment of all rewards and inducements to parties, whether in or out of office, to aid the Government in the detection and punishment of frauds upon the revenue. Others think that we have destroyed too many of the safeguards against fraud by going to the extent proposed in the bill. I confess it is the most difficult and complicated system I was ever called upon to examine; it was all new to me. My residence in an inland city, where we have neither custom-houses nor Federal courts, deprived me of that familiarity with revenue matters which a residence in any of our great sea-port cities necessarily gives to a professional man.

My ignorance, however, gave me this advantage. I could listen, study, and learn what was best to do without partiality and without prejudice, looking only to the good of the country and the protection alike of the rights of the Government and the citizen, which might have been a more difficult task if I had either prejudged the question or had friends or constituents to be affected by the decision. Upon a careful examination of the subject we found a system of laws in force which are in many regards a disgrace to any civilized country, among the most odious of which are those which allow the seizure of the books and papers of merchants by the officers of the Government to be used as evidence against them in suits for penalties and forfeitures. We found that the Government divided the spoils often obtained by the most corrupt and dishonest means with the most disreputable men, making the whole people their partners in the most scandalous combinations against individual citizens. We found excessive fines and forfeitures inflicted and imposed, regardless often of whether guilty intent existed or not, and men deprived of the right of trial by jury upon that most vital question. In short, we found such a state of things as rendered some such bill as we have presented necessary in the opinion of the committee.

We may have gone too far, or we may not have gone far enough in our efforts to reform and remedy these evils; it is for the House to decide. My duty, especially as a member of the sub-committee which draughted it, is to inform the House why I agreed to the leading features of the bill as presented. I say leading features, because there are clauses in it which I would be glad to see stricken out or amended. The first section repeals absolutely, and I hope forever, all laws and parts of laws which authorize the Government or any officer of it, on any pretense whatever, to seize the private books and papers of citizens and force them to furnish evidence against themselves in proceedings for penalties and forfeitures. The law giving the Government that right was first enacted in 1863, in the midst of the civil war, when laws were silent, when constitutional rights and congressional limitations were too often disregarded, when the plea of necessity justified all usurpations, and the complaint of the citizen was generally disregarded both in and out of Congress by those in authority. Such a law could never be enacted in time of peace by the representatives of a free people.

The courts and statesmen of England have for nearly two centuries denounced all attempts at such seizures. The amendments to the Federal Constitution were plainly aimed against such legislation, and neither the Federal Government nor that of any State ever thought of it till, during the general overthrow of all civil rights, the statute of 1863 was enacted. It was amended and somewhat guarded by subsequent acts. Despairing of being able to obtain an absolute repeal of it even now, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. DAWES] and myself each, early in the session, introduced bills to annul as far as possible the oppressive features of it. Now, in view of the evidence we have taken and the attention we think the House has given to the proof of abuses under it, we hope to be able to obtain an absolute repeal of the original law and all amendments thereto.

Sir, it is impossible to read the testimony taken by the committee on this subject without feeling not only that a deep and burning wrong is done to the citizen by dragging his most sacred and confidential papers into court to convict him of crimes and misdemeanors which degrade, disgrace, and bankrupt him, but that the Government is degraded and disgraced in the eyes of the civilized world by the foul means it resorts to for the purpose of extorting evidence against and money from its citizens. Take the case of Phelps, Dodge & Co. as an illustration. I select that because, in the language of Detective Jayne, of its "having been made a sort of pivotal case," one (as Mr. Jayne assured Mr. Dodge in the presence of Judge Davis and repeated substantially before the committee) of the worst he ever saw, in which he charged that for a series of years deliberate attempts to defraud the revenue had been made by systematic perjury and false invoices and undervaluations.

That firm had carried on business in New York for many years; they had imported goods to the value of between three and four hundred million dollars; they had paid in duties to the Government over $50,000,000; their good name and integrity had never been assailed. But they had a thief in their employ, a trusted, confidential clerk, who had access to all their books and papers. Tempted perhaps by custom-house officials who would share the spoil and avoid the disgrace, he violated the trust reposed in him, betrayed his benefactors, mutilated the books he was bound by every principle of honor and of honesty to protect and preserve, stole the private papers of his employers and carried the evidence of his own shame and dishonor to the custom-house detectives and officials, who entered at once into partnership with him in the nefarious scheme of robbing respectable merchants for private gain, and brought the whole power of the Government to support them under pretense that they were protecting our revenues. Affidavits were made at once, warrants were ordered, the members of the firm were arraigned, denounced, and threatened with ruin, degradation, infamy, and imprisonment if they did not consent to place all their books and papers in the possession and at the disposal of the harpies who were determined to prey upon them. Conscious of innocence while fearful of exposure which could not fail to injure their credit, especially abroad, where people assume that government will not bring such charges against a citizen unless they are certainly true, they agreed at once that all books and papers desired might be taken, and they were carried to Jayne's office by the cart-load.

Once in possession of all the evidences of guilt or innocence, the next step was to proclaim to the world through the press the guilt of the firm, and to so magnify the case as to make settlement on any terms the only alternative to escape from absolute ruin. Claims, the nature of which were never explained, were asserted, amounting to $1,750,000, and a compromise was finally effected at $271,000.

I propose to let Mr. Dodge tell how and why it was so settled, (see page 226 of the evidence.) He there states:

> Mr. DODGE. Since the day that this matter was first brought to our notice, and we examined into the case, we have never refused to admit openly everywhere, before friends and foes, that we had committed irregularities, and had unintentionally made ourselves liable to the law; but we never have anywhere, under any circumstances or in any position, admitted to any living man that we did it intentionally. Again, this $1,750,000, as I said before, was the terror held over us—the pistol at our ears. I have so stated before, and I say it now, sir. And I will state the reason that we were so anxious to have it settled—why I came to see Mr. BOUTWELL two or three times. As I stated the other day, he treated us kindly, and perhaps if we had taken his advice we should have done differently, but we believed that if we left the matter open we did not know who would settle it, as Mr. BOUTWELL was on the eve of his election to the Senate, and we were anxious to have it settled, because we would rather pay $270,000 than to have the Government of the United States hold over us a judgment for $1,750,000, and to have that telegraphed the world over, and then run the risk of getting it brought down. It was a large sum to have hanging over us, and if we had had to pay that amount what would this special agent have received? He would have received between two and three hundred thousand dollars; my friend sitting here (Mr. Bliss) would have received over $17,000, and the collector over $100,000. We were not prepared to have such a judgment as that rendered against us, and to trust to any living man for a settlement, with such influences surrounding him. That was the reason we were anxious to have it settled, even by the paying of $270,000. I stated that it was a case of terrorism, and so it was, when there were not less than seven eminent lawyers engaged on the other side, and constantly contriving to see how they could catch us in the matter. I felt that under these circumstances, entrapped as we were by the law, we were fortunate in settling even by the payment of $270,000 for an alleged fraud, not known to us, of $1,600. Never, until this man stood here to-day, have we been able to find out anything about these nine invoices. It is the first time that we could find that out. We agreed that we would pay the amount of the aggregated items that they said were undervalued, but when the sum came to us it was monstrous, and we did not understand it. But when the report comes out it says, "besides two whole invoices that were confiscated because the charges had not been added." Now, I have the law and the decisions of the courts, that we sent to our friends in Penang, saying that in case these goods were sworn to at the port where they started from and went to another for convenience, the date of the voyage commenced at the time when they first sailed, and purposely we had put on the invoice (he says it was put across the invoices) that the charges were not added. Did that look like fraud? No, gentlemen; there is an effort making to charge us with fraud, but I stand before the people of the United States to-day innocent, and so does my firm, of any charges whatever, except such as are made by these men who want to sustain this moiety system and make out that our case was a very bad one, in order that they may go on with their moieties.
> Mr. FOSTER. I think you stated when you were here the other day, Mr. Dodge, that there were lawyers, members of Congress, who were acting as counsel for these parties.
> Mr. DODGE. I did say so.
> Mr. FOSTER. Well, I find that this committee and myself have been subjected to criticism because we brought out the name of only one such member, while there were others.
> Mr. DODGE. I only intended to speak of two. I have no hesitation in stating who they were, after all that has been said before this committee. I have purposely avoided naming them heretofore, but if the committee wish, I have no objection.
> The CHAIRMAN. You may answer the question.
> Mr. DODGE. I suppose there is no doubt in the committee's mind on the subject now, as it was admitted last night by the special agent that he did employ, in one case specially, General BUTLER as counsel. I will add that Senator CONKLING was in New York and in consultation with these gentlemen at the time when for two days the question hung whether this thing should be settled or not, and hung simply on the fact that Mr. Laflin said the crime was so enormous that, so far as he was concerned, he never would consent to settle it short of the payment of $500,000 by Phelps, Dodge & Co. I think Senator CONKLING advised him to do better. I only wish he had stuck to it one day longer.

It requires no argument to prove how utterly helpless these merchants were in the hands of such a power, stimulated by such incentives to fasten guilt upon them. Not one of these men could get a dollar if they did not get it out of their victims; all could reap a rich harvest if they could by any means force them to yield to their demands. The costs in court, though nothing was done, amounted to $8,145.09. The share of the district attorney in the $271,000 was over $5,400; that of the collector, naval officer, and surveyor was $21,906.01 each, or $65,718.03 in all. Jayne got $65,718.03, which he was to divide with the thief who stole the papers. General BUTLER was paid a large fee out of his and the thief's portion by Jayne. How much Senator CONKLING got as adviser of the custom-house officers does not appear. They failed to avail themselves of our invitation or notification that we would gladly hear them if they had anything to say, so that we were unable to prove what their private arrangements with counsel were.

With such an array of high officials against the merchants, what was an appeal to the Secretary worth? Every officer on whom he could rely for information was directly and largely interested in having the highest penalty imposed. The leading Administration Senator, and one of the ablest republican members of this House, were their advocates and attorneys. What private man stood any chance with the Secretary under such circumstances? What Secretary, under such an administration as this, would dare to oppose such a combination. Sir, it was apparent from the first that they had to pay whatever sum they were told would satisfy the rapacity of their persecutors, and they paid it. Any of us would have done as they did. Mr. Shultz stated the case vigorously and truly when he said:

> Every official with whom he comes in contact, except the judge and the Secretary of the Treasury have a direct pecuniary interest against the merchant. Let the law be so amended that these two functionaries can receive a portion of the moieties, and then so far as human motive can be controlled by sordid influences a perfect system of confiscation exists.

With their books and papers in the hands of their enemies, their credit gone, their business paralyzed, their good name blasted by the action of the Government; charges of fraud and robbery, the nature of which they did not understand, which were of course magnified and circulated to all parts of the world where they had business connections by their competitors in trade, as the officials knew and intended they should be—these things were, as Mr. Dodge truly said, "the terror held over us, the pistol at our ears. That," he added, "was the reason we were anxious to have it settled even by the paying of $270,000." With seven eminent lawyers engaged, and constantly contriving how to catch them; entrapped for an alleged fraud not known to them, and never explained, of $1,600 in five years, though in that time their overvaluations of which the Government got the benefit, (all of which were artfuly concealed by those who held the books,) amounted to hundreds of thousands of dollars, altogether constituted one of the most shameless cases of extortion I ever heard of. And this was the pivotal case.

Other cases brought before us were nearly as bad. Perhaps that of Mr. Caldwell, of Philadelphia, taken in all its relations, was worse. The extortion of $50,000 from Woodruff & Robinson was not much better. After patient hearing and careful study I became thoroughly satisfied that the safety of the citizen and the good of the Government alike required that all laws authorizing the seizures of books and papers on any pretext whatever should be at once repealed, and that all moieties to custom-house officials and informers should be abolished except in cases of smuggling, of which I will speak presently. I would go a step further, and prohibit by positive law, under the severest penalties, all Government officials and all members of Congress, whether Senators or Representatives, from being employed, either directly or indirectly, as counsel for spies, informers, custom-house or other officials, in any matter relating to the revenues of the Government. They are now prohibited by law from prosecuting claims against the Government, either in the Court of Claims, before the Departments, or the committees of Congress. They should not be allowed to use the power and influence which official position gives them to make money out of the citizen under the pretenses that they are serving the Government, in any court or before any tribunal.

Representative men, whether of States or people, ought, so long as that relation exists, to be prohibited from taking part in or making money out of controversies between the Government and its citizens on either side. I shall try to so amend this bill as to attain that end. Now members of Congress are sought for and employed by spies and officials, not as other men are, because of their ability as lawyers, but because of the influence, political or otherwise, they are supposed or known to exert over the Secretary of the Treasury and his subordinates. I repeat, and his subordinates; because the proof in the Sanborn contracts shows conclusively that nearly if not quite all of the decisions of the Secretary are in fact the decisions of mere subordinates, his name and apparent authority being only official routine. Let it be remembered that these subordinates are not put or kept in their positions by the Secretary; they may be and often are there against his will, placed and kept there by the influence and authority of the Senators and Representatives whose fees depend upon their decisions.

The spies and other interested officials soon learn what member of Congress can best control official action in the Treasury Department, and that member becomes their hired attorney. If the officer who has the case submitted to him was ever so honest, it is unreasonable to expect that he will dare to disobey, and he will not be inclined to disoblige, the man who put him where he is, and who can have him removed and a more pliant tool put in his place if he fails to decide as he is ordered or expected. As conducted now, such proceedings are a mockery and a farce. Does any man here believe, for example, that any subordinate, or even the present Secretary, would dare to disobey the known wishes of Senator CONKLING and General BUTLER, both of whom, as Mr. Dodge, Judge Davis, and Mr. Jayne show, were acting as counsel for the officials or informers in the Dodge case. Both of course were selected because of their well-known political power and influence in high places, and both were prominently exhibited to the merchants as a standing menace to enforce settlements on the terms demanded.

Mr. KASSON. I hope the gentleman will say that there was not a particle of evidence indicating that Senator CONKLING received anything.

Mr. BECK. There was evidence that he was the counsel and adviser of these men. The gentleman will find it in the evidence of Judge Davis, Mr. Dodge, and others; and the men who employed him, and whose counsel he was, refused to come before the committee on a polite invitation, and therefore we could not develop what the facts were.

Mr. KASSON. In the interest of justice I suppose the gentleman will allow it to be stated in this connection that the evidence was simply that the Senator was in the room on one occasion reading the United States statute as a citizen simply. I wish the gentleman to do justice in the matter.

Mr. BECK. Well, Mr. Dodge, in his sworn testimony, says that Senator CONKLING was in New York in consultation with these officers at a time when for two days the question was whether the amount paid should be $500,000 or $271,000. There is evidence that he was there acting practically as counsel, and his clients should have come before the committee and told them what they paid him if they paid him anything or if they did not pay him anything.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Will the gentleman permit me a moment in this connection? I think he is doing injustice to a gentleman, which I am sure he would not intend to do.

Mr. BECK. I have not time to yield for interruptions. I have done Senator CONKLING no injustice. I have made no charge against Senator CONKLING. I say that the testimony shows that he was there as counsel for these men.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The gentleman is certainly in error in that regard.

Mr. BECK. He was counsel and advised with them, and Mr. Dodge swore that he believed that he helped to bring down the amount from $500,000 to $271,000. What I call attention to is this point: What chance had the merchants in that state of the case; what chance was there that justice would be done to them when the surveyor, the collector, the naval officer, the district attorney, the special agent, the informer—all the officials to whom he could look were interested and had been paid bribes, if you please, to decide against the merchants, and a leading Senator of the Administration party was their adviser, and one of the ablest republican members of this House was counsel for the informer? Under circumstances like these was it not evident that this firm of merchants had to pay whatever was demanded? Would not you have done it? Would not any of us have done it?

I would, I repeat, by laws which could not be evaded, make such things impossible. Till it is done appeals to the Secretary are a delusion and a snare. I hope the House will hereafter prohibit Representatives from interfering in any way between the Government and the citizen. Congress should be the highest court in the land, and its members should all be free to listen without partiality or prejudice, certainly without personal or pecuniary interest, to all the appeals of the people. To accomplish that end I shall move to amend the bill by inserting the following section:

SEC. —. That no Senator, Representative or Delegate to Congress shall, after his election or during his continuance in office, act as agent, attorney, proctor, advocate, solicitor, or counsel for any person against whom suits or proceedings have been or are about to be commenced for violation of the revenue laws, or who has any claim for drawbacks or reclamations for duties, taxes, or excises paid or demanded or for the United States or any agent, employé, informer, officer, or officers of the revenue or customs service of the United States in any suit or proceeding relative to the customs dues, excises, or taxes; nor shall he receive any compensation, gift, or reward from such persons or officers for any service, advice, counsel, or aid afforded such person or persons, officer or officers, agent, informer, or employé.

And any person offending against this provision shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by fine, not exceeding $5,000, and imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten years, at the discretion of the court trying the same, and shall be forever thereafter incapable of holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States; and any person who shall pay or cause to be paid to any Senator, Representative, or Delegate, or to any person for his use or benefit, directly or indirectly, any sum of money or other thing of value because of such services or advice relative to any of the matters aforesaid, shall have a right at any time to bring suit for the recovery thereof, or its value, in any court of the United States, against such Senator, Representative, or Delegate, or the person or persons who received the same, or may unite all such persons in the same suit.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I would ask the gentleman from Kentucky if he has any reason to mention the name of the Senator here? He knows very well that Mr. Dodge expressly testified that the Senator he names he supposed was there not as counsel.

Mr. BECK. Who said so?

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. Mr. Dodge.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Dodge did not say so.

Mr. KASSON. If the gentleman will allow the language referred to to be read, it will satisfy him; if not, I will read it myself when I get the floor.

Mr. BECK. Senator CONKLING was there reading the law and expounding its bearings as the friend and adviser of the custom-house officials, a thing which he should not be allowed to do, that no Senator or Representative ought to be allowed to do, and if my amendment prevails they will never do it in the future.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I would ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether as a lawyer he thinks that it is a just thing to say that a man is guilty of receiving pay because no evidence was submitted that he did not receive pay?

Mr. BECK. This Senator had a right to be there under the law.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. Very well.

Mr. BECK. I am not complaining about that; but I deny that such a law should exist. I deny that a man who is a leading Administration Senator should have a right to go and advise the custom-house officers against a citizen and to give the weight of his influence, his name, and his authority against the citizen.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. The gentleman from Kentucky says that the Senator to whom he refers had a right to be there.

Mr. BECK. He did.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. Did not Mr. Dodge also expressly disclaim any belief that he was there other than as a citizen?

Mr. BECK. I will read for the third time the testimony of Mr. Dodge upon that point:

Mr. FOSTER. I think you stated when you were here the other day, Mr. Dodge, that there were lawyers, members of Congress, who were acting as counsel for these parties.

Was not that a plain question?

Mr. DODGE, I did say so.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I find that this committee and myself have been subjected to criticism because we brought out the name of only one such member, while there were others.

Mr. DODGE. I only intended to speak of two. I have no hesitation in stating who they were after all that has been said before this committee. I have purposely avoided naming them heretofore, but if the committee wish I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. You may answer the question.

Mr. DODGE. I suppose there is no doubt in the committee's mind on the subject now, as it was admitted last night by the special agent that he did employ, in one case especially, General BUTLER as counsel. I will add that Senator CONKLING was in New York and in consultation with these gentlemen at the time when for two days the question hung whether this thing should be settled or not, and hung simply on the fact that Mr. Laflin said the crime was so enormous that, so far as he was concerned, he never would consent to settle it short of the payment of $500,000 by Phelps, Dodge & Co. I think Senator CONKLING advised him to do better I only wish he had stuck to it one day longer.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that all you know about it?

Mr. DODGE. That is all I know about it.

Mr. KASSON. Now, will the gentleman let me settle the point in dispute by turning to page 233 of the testimony?

Mr. BECK. I will not be interrupted any more. I object to further interruption.

Mr. KASSON. Two lines on the page I referred to will settle the point.

Mr. BECK. The naval officer, Mr. Laflin, is well known to have been appointed by the Senator; and the custom-house ring, if you force me to go into politics, is supported by this Administration, of which that Senator is a leading friend, for the purpose of raising money in this way, and by the use of the money thus acquired, thus stolen from the merchants, to carry out the party machinery.

I might go a great deal further in that direction, but I will not, for my time is running fast. I might go on and show that when these parties see where they can make money out of the citizen, they do not wait to prove what he was. Mr. Dodge was loyal enough. I am told he gave $25,000 to help elect your present President. But these men were after the life-blood of this firm, and they came very near getting it.

Some of the committee think that there ought to be power given to the Government pending a suit to require the production in court for examination of the books and papers of merchants. I differ with those who so think. I assert that no man ought to be compelled to furnish evidence against himself in any form, in any case in which a penalty or forfeiture may be inflicted or incurred, and there is rarely a case for a violation of the revenue laws in which one or the other or both is not a part of the judgment if the finding is against the citizen. The Government, representing over forty million people, with all the power and authority its position necessarily confers, ought to have no other or higher rights than one citizen has in a controversy with another. It has now, even if the seizure laws are absolutely repealed under the judiciary act and subsequent enactments, all the power for the discovery of testimony and the production of books and papers that is necessary for the ends of justice, all that private suitors have. Prior to 1863 we had no seizures, no partnership with thieves to incite them to rob their employers of their most sacred property. Yet our revenues were better collected then they have ever been since, and they will be again when we have repealed that inquisitorial and tyrannical law.

Section 3 of the bill, which a majority of the committee inserted against the will of the sub-committee, is open to all the objections which I have to the present law authorizing seizures; it does not directly seize books and papers, but it requires the production of all such business books, invoices, and papers as the attorney representing the Government says he believes will tend to prove any allegation he may have seen fit to make, and if all such books and papers are not produced all the allegations of the attorney are to be taken for confessed. In other words, in all proceeding in rem in all suits for forfeitures and penalties, in all proceedings not strictly criminal, any allegation, however false or however degrading, which if admitted would subject the merchant to the severest penalties and forfeitures, though not made under oath and though denied in the most solemn form, shall be taken as true, and the punishment shall be imposed to the extent which would follow on an unqualified admission of guilt, unless all the books, invoices, and papers demanded are produced, and when produced they can be ransacked by all the spies, informers, and retainers of the court or the Government, and the discoveries made by such search may be made the basis for other suits and proceedings. Indeed the proceeding in which their production is required may, and often will, be a mere pretense for which nobody is responsible in damages or otherwise, and of which the United States must pay the costs in order to get books and papers produced for examination so as to lay the basis for other prosecutions. I hope Congress will refuse to countenance anything which tends to perpetuate the infamous system.

Strike out the section, and insert in its stead a provision disqualifying forever from holding any offices of honor, profit, or trust any member of either House of Congress who shall directly or indirectly take a fee, or act as counsel on either side, in any suit or proceeding between the Government and the citizen in revenue cases, and you will wipe out one of the blackest spots in our legislation. I see no difference in principle between the present law and the proposed section. There may be a difference in degree. Even that is not clear. Each compels a man to furnish evidence against himself which may degrade and disgrace him and subject him to severe penalties and heavy forfeitures of property, or assumes that he is guilty and imposes them because he fails or refuses to obey.

Mr. Eaton, of New York, in an argument of great ability, collated the authorities on this question so well that I prefer to read a portion of what he said on this subject to any argument of my own. He said:

> Turning to the common law, the books tell us that one of the fundamental principles, rooted in the jurisprudence alike of England and America, is that no man should be compelled to accuse himself. So well established is this rule that the words Nemo tenetur se ipsum accusare are among the oldest maxims. Whatever may be the usage under the statute law of the Continent, I think there is no dispute that in this country no man is bound to furnish evidence to condemn himself. In all the fluctuations in the rules of law in the past, no change has ever been made in this principle further than to permit the accused voluntarily to give evidence against himself, never compelling him to do so.
> Mr. Chief Justice Marshall held, in the case of Willie, (2 Burr's Trial, 243:) "It is a settled maxim of law that no man is bound to criminate himself. This maxim confirms one exception to the general rule, which declares that every person is compellable to bear testimony in a court of justice. * * * Many links frequently compose that chain of testimony which is necessary to convict any individual of a crime. It appears to the court to be the true sense of the rule that no witness is compellable to furnish any one of them against himself."
> As long ago as the year 1680 it was held in the high court of chancery in England that the defendant need not answer a bill for discovery where his plea would subject him to a forfeiture. (Bird vs. Hardwicke, 1 Vernon's Chancery Cases, 110.) Accompanying the report of that case is a multitude of references establishing the same principle. A few years later, in 1736, Lord Chancellor Hardwicke said: "There is no rule better established in equity than that a person shall not be obliged to discover what may subject him to a penalty, or anything in the nature of a penalty." (Smith vs. Read, 1 Atkyn's Reports, 527.)
> This same principle is incorporated into the municipal law of the State of New York, which provides that "any competent witness in a cause shall not be excused from answering a question relevant to the matter in issue on the ground merely that the answer to such question may establish, or tend to establish, that such witness owes a debt or is otherwise subject to a civil suit. But this provision shall not be construed to require a witness to give any answer which will have a tendency to accuse himself of any crime or misdemeanor or to expose him to any penalty or forfeiture, nor in any respect to vary or alter any other rule respecting the examination of witnesses." (Revised Statutes of New York, part 3, chapter 7, article 8, section 71.)
> Said Chancellor Kent: "There are numerous cases establishing the rule that no one is bound to answer so as to subject himself, either directly or eventually, to a forfeiture or penalty, or anything in the nature of a forfeiture or penalty." (Livingston vs. Tompkins, 4 Johnson's Chancery Reports, 431.)
> Said Chancellor Walworth: "The Constitution has wisely provided that a party shall not be compelled, in a criminal case, to be a witness against himself. And this principle, by the common law, was extended to proceedings in civil cases, where the witness was called upon to make a disclosure which might subject him to a forfeiture or penalty, or to any loss in the nature of a penalty." (Livingston vs. Harris, 3 Paige, 534.)
> In the standard treatises on evidence you will find the same rule laid down as follows: The witness is privileged from answering a question, the answering of which might subject him to a penalty or forfeiture of any kind. (Phillips on Evidence, volume 2, page 396.) Further: Where an answer will subject a witness to a forfeiture of any portion of his property, he is not bound to answer, any more than in a case of exposure to a criminal prosecution or penalty. This rules holds good alike in equity and in law. (Greenleaf on Evidence, section 451, and authorities there collated.) There is, indeed, no limit to the number and value of the authorities on this point.

Again, Mr. Eaton said—

> In the case of Rex vs. Dr. Purcell, (1 Wil., 239,) the court refuse a rule requiring the books of the corporation of Oxford to be open for the inspection of the attorney-general in an information against Dr. Purcell, the vice-chancellor, for a misdemeanor. They say: "If this court should grant this rule, it will, instead of doing justice, lay the foundation for something like an inquisition of state; for this court sits to hear evidence, not to furnish it."

I confess, Mr. Speaker, when I heard this eloquent gentleman from whose speech I have read the foregoing extracts quote the language of the Earl of Chatham—"Every man's house is called his castle. Why? Because it is surrounded by a moat or defended by a wall? No. It may be a straw-built hut; the wind may whistle around it, the rain may enter it, but the King cannot"—I felt a sense of humiliation which I cannot well describe in view of the legislation which disgraces our statute-books on the subject of searches and seizures under our revenue laws. It is no answer to say that honest men will not hesitate to exhibit their books. Phelps, Dodge & Co., and many others equally honest, have done that; that is not the question. All just laws assume the accused to be innocent till his accuser proves him guilty, and he cannot be required either to swear to any fact or to furnish evidence which will or may fasten guilt upon him, if a penalty or a forfeiture is part of the punishment. If the revenue cannot be collected without breaking down all the safeguards of liberty and personal rights, let the money go; its loss is as dust in the balance compared with the perpetuation of the great safeguards which the English people have striven for a thousand years to maintain.

The barons at Runnymede wrung from their reluctant king in Magna Charta a solemn pledge to maintain inviolate these great personal privileges. Charles had to confirm them in the Bill of Rights. After the atrocities of Jeffreys and Scroogs all the judges and statesmen of England denounced every attempt to infringe them. The States which formed the American Union were unwilling to trust the provisions even of the Federal Constitution until amendments were adopted providing that—

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.
> No person shall be * * * deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.

Each State in its bill of rights guarded its citizens against searches and seizures in language equally emphatic, and the Federal and State courts have sustained them with unanimity and vigor. No State Legislature, so far as I know, has ever sought to overthrow or weaken these great bulwarks of liberty. Congress never would in time of peace.

In 1863, when war cursed the land, when eleven States were unrepresented, and others were misrepresented; when the passions of men overthrew their judgment; when the air was full of rumors of frauds upon the revenue; in an evil hour, under such aggravations, the right of search and seizure of books and papers was given. It ought to have been expunged from the statute-books the moment peace was restored. If the maxim "Inter arma silent leges" could be pleaded in palliation of the original act, no such excuse exists now, and the representatives of a free and united people should hasten to wipe out the national disgrace. William Pitt said in his day concerning warrants of this sort that "there was not a man to be found of sufficient profligacy to defend them upon the principle of legality." I hope that may be so here and now.

I have no doubt as to the unconstitutionality of the existing law as to seizures of books and papers. It forces a man to furnish evidence against himself in cases where penalties and forfeitures are inflicted upon him on the evidences thus extorted. It would be equally legitimate to force him to swear to the facts, to put the thumb-screws upon him or subject him to any other personal torture in case of refusal. It would have been well if our American judges had (as the English court did in The King vs. Purcell) told the attorney and the informer, in all cases when they applied for rules and orders for seizures of books and papers:

If this court should grant this rule, it will, instead of doing justice, lay the foundation for something like an inquisition of state, for this court sits to hear evidence, not to furnish it.

All the provisions of the Constitution were made with reference to the common law, which was recognized as the basis of our institutions; the provisions of the Magna Charta were as thoroughly the heritage of American as of English citizens, and the great system of laws which by immemorial usage had been crystallized and perpetuated in the mother country became ours as much as theirs. In the language of one of the distinguished lawyers who appeared before us:

When our independence had been finally established, and the Constitution was to be framed, our fathers went over these great decisions, at the same time with Magna Charta and the Bill of Rights, and whatever was found there to favor individual liberty was carefully inserted in their own system—"improved by clearer expression, strengthened by heavier sanctions, and extended by more universal application."

Long before the adoption of the Federal Constitution the seizure of private books and papers had become an impossibility in England both by common law and statute. The framers of our Constitution had no idea of breaking down or weakening any of the barriers which protected the rights of the individual citizen from the aggressions of power. The action of the people of the States in demanding the amendments to the Constitution so promptly as to make them almost a part of the original instrument, all of them designed to secure the individual rights and liberties of the citizen, proves conclusively that the reverse was true. After they had conquered in the great struggle for independence they did not intend to submit to a deprivation of rights on any pretense, however plausible, if human wisdom and forethought could guard against it; therefore they looked carefully over the past history and struggles of the people from whom they sprung, whose system of laws they had adopted, and they made part of the fundamental law all that they found valuable in the experience of the mother country. They reaffirmed with emphasis the maxim that each citizen's home, however humble was his castle, that it was sacred and should be secure; that his papers and other property and effects should not be searched for nor seized without due process of law, with all possible safeguards thrown around its improper exercise. They were willing, and that was the extent of the grant of power, that stolen or contraband goods, counterfeit money, or property, or implements which the common good required should be seized or destroyed, might be searched for and taken; that criminals should not be protected even by the sanctity of home; but it never entered their minds that their private books and papers, which of right belonged to them, and were used only to perpetuate their own thoughts and protect their private interest, could be taken on any pretext whatever.

I would not overthrow or impinge upon these great safeguards of liberty and human rights to perpetuate or protect any revenue system upon earth. Better burn your custom-houses, annul your tariff laws, or, if you please, stop intercourse with all the world and support the Government by direct taxation, than violate the time-honored inalienable rights of the citizens of the Republic.

But, Mr. Speaker, I must hasten to notice other important changes in the law proposed by the bill now before us. Moieties and seizures are twin abominations. They ought to die together and be consigned to the same ignominious grave. Without the moiety system seizures would never have been resorted to. The enormous rewards offered and the temptations placed before bad or even weak men are too great to be resisted. Under them private virtue and honor, as well as official integrity, give way, and a system of corrupt espionage and robbery has grown up which, if not crushed out by vigorous laws, will destroy what little of honesty is left in the public service, together with all that makes the business relations of men either respectable or safe.

Worse, if possible, even than that, the money extorted by robbery and fraud is so distributed among the officials that those who act as judges and arrange the terms of settlement, the men on whose statement of fact the Secretary of the Treasury has to rely for the truth, are all paid to decide against the citizen. Take the Dodge case again as an illustration. The surveyor, naval officer, and collector were each bribed to the extent of $21,900 to decide against the merchant whose books and papers they held and used, though obtained from a known and acknowledged thief. Jayne and his accomplices got over $35,000, while the United States attorney, clerks, and marshals pocketed $8,145 as their share of the spoils, every dollar of these immense sums being dependent on their success in coercing a compromise or securing a conviction. Wherein does all this differ from the bribery of a judge or a jury?

The very fountains of justice are corrupted, and all that emanates from such polluted sources is of course impure. More degrading than all, more humiliating to us as Representatives, and to the proud and honest people we represent, is the fact that the Government is by legislation made the partner of thieves. Think of the American people under the folds of the Star Spangled Banner boasting of their advanced civilization and pretending to look with scorn and contempt on all other nations because of our superiority in protecting the rights of our citizens with Magna Charter, the Bill of Rights, habeas corpus, and all the bulwarks of liberty crystallized in our own great charter, sneaking into a den in the custom-house and paying over to their detective, Jayne, $65,718 out of $271,000, which they had extorted from citizens against whom they could only make up a claim for $1,600, even after they had searched their books and papers for five years, concealing overpayments twenty-fold in excess of the claim, and whispering in his ear to pay $40,000 as his share of the profits of the speculation to the thief who had stolen the papers of his employers, who by all laws, human and divine, should have been spurned as an outcast and doomed to a felon's cell, only requiring him to be sure and keep the facts concealed.

The system is a disgrace to our civilization, a reproach and a scandal in the eyes of all nations; one which has been condemned by our Secretaries and committees, and is only maintained by the influence which political organizations and party leaders exert to uphold it, because the custom-house officials out of their extortions can be made to furnish the money in New York, Boston, and elsewhere to control primary elections, pack conventions, stuff ballot-boxes, and do the other dirty work for their political patrons.

Mr. Hyde, of Boston, in his argument before the committee set forth the views of the three last Secretaries of the Treasury, and of the Retrenchment Committee of the Senate, as follows:

Mr. McCulloch, when Secretary of the Treasury, in his report for the year 1869, said:

"The reason on which the laws granting such allowances are based is that officers of the Government are stimulated to greater activity in the discovery of frauds, and in bringing offenders to punishment. There can be no doubt that such is the effect of the policy, but the experience I have had in the Treasury Department has convinced me that the evils attending the system are greater than the benefits derived from it. It often occurs that revenue officers are led to assert claims, in behalf of the Government, which have no just foundation in law, or in the facts of the respective cases; and, where real claims exist, it is often the object of the informers and officers, who share in the penalties, to misrepresent the case to the Department, so as to secure the greatest advantage to themselves. But a more serious evil is found in the practice, quite general, of allowing persons to pursue a fraudulent course until a result is reached which will inure to the benefit of the officers and informers, instead of checking criminal practices at the outset."

Upon this same subject Mr. BOUTWELL, when Secretary of the Treasury, remarked in his report for the year 1871:

"It is my duty to call the attention of Congress to the importance of abolishing the system of shares and moieties as far as the benefits inure to revenue officers and other persons officially connected with the Government. * * * In most of the cases the officers do not perform special services entitling them to the amounts granted, and importers and others, whose acts are made the subject of investigation, complain, and I think with just reason, that the agents of the Government have a pecuniary interest in pursuing those charged with violations of the law. * * * One of the difficulties which the Department has to meet frequently is that the customs officers have an interest in the proceedings for the discovery of fraud, the settlement of cases, or in the prosecution of them, which is different from the real interest of the Government, and, as a necessary result, the conduct of such officers is open to suspicion, both on the part of those who are pursued by them, and the Government they ostensibly represent."

The present Secretary, in a communication just published, says:

"While I am prepared to accede to the general principle of the present bill, by the abolition of all moieties, except in the case of smuggling, actual or attempted, I am of opinion that there should be some inducement for the exposure of offenses more complicated in their nature, and hence more difficult to trace. I would, therefore, recommend that provision be made for a special fund, to be exclusively used, under suitable restrictions, for the compensation of private persons who may enable the Government to detect and punish frauds that would otherwise, in all probability, remain undiscovered."

If it is believed by this committee, and by Congress, that the moiety system should be retained in cases of smuggling, we make no objection, because that does not affect the large interests of the country. I have here the two reports of the Senate Committee on Retrenchment, submitted July 4, 1872, upon the same matter. The majority report contains the following words:

"Moieties should not be allowed to officers of the customs, except in the case of smuggled goods seized. It is the duty of these officers to assess and collect the duties on imports. It is their business not to permit any frauds upon the revenue. Attempts will be made to introduce merchandise upon our markets without payment of duty at all. Whoever defeats an attempt at smuggling should be allowed at least one-half the net proceeds of the goods condemned. But when goods are entered at the custom-house, there should be no cheating in quantities or values. It is the duty of the officers of the customs to prevent that. Their salaries should be adequate to all the labor they perform and all the responsibility they assume. Still, in spite of diligence and fidelity, they will be sometimes circumvented. But the Government should not bribe them to be defrauded by holding up to them great fortunes for detecting the fraud. The husbandman who pays his harvester a meager salary for gathering grain, but offers him one-half for gleaning all that his own rake passes over, should not be surprised to learn that his servant rakes slovenly."

If these facts so presented do not convince the House that the system should be abolished, nothing that I can say will.

I propose to say a few words as to the men who are employed to do this dirty work, and the means they employ to accomplish it. Mr. Jayne is a type of the men who become informers under the moiety system. I select him because he is one of the best of his class—intelligent, vigilant, well-informed, and, so far as I know, conforming strictly to the law which conferred authority upon him. His underlings and retainers are in all the prominent mercantile houses of New York, ready to ruin the men whose devoted friends they profess to be, perhaps making false entries for years, so they can, when the penalty becomes an object, charge their own frauds upon their victims; noting and concealing every irregularity, so as to prevent its correction until the proper time arrives to lodge their information. His operation, will illustrate the system. He spoke at great length before the Committee on Ways and Means, and he was examined some years ago by a committee of the Senate. Perhaps it would be best to notice first specimens of his testimony before the Senate committee as to the means resorted to in order to procure evidence or confessions from his victims.

By Mr. BAYARD:

Question. Then the use of handcuffs, or the threat of handcuffs, is that considered by you a legitimate method of obtaining information upon which to base the seizure of merchants' books and papers?

Answer. It might be legitimate to make men tell the truth, to lay them down, to remind them that they might be used.

* * * * * * *

Q. Did you put them on to encourage him, if not to terrify him?

A. I think not for any such purpose. I think I have unlocked the handcuffs and put them on my wrist to see how they worked, but not to terrify him.

Q. If you did not put them on to terrify him or encourage him, what did you put them on him for?

A. I could not put them on.

Q. What did you put them on your own wrist for?

A. To see how the handcuffs worked; to see how they opened and locked.

Q. Had you these witnesses under examination while you were playing with the handcuffs in this way?

A. No, sir; not while I was putting them on my own wrist.

Q. You say you did not put a handcuff on anybody.

A. I think not.

Q. I wish to have your statement under oath about that fact.

A. All of my statements are under oath.

* * * * * * *

Q. You say you have threatened these men with punishment if they did not give you information?

A. I may have done so; I presume I have.

Q. Do you not know it, sir? The question of the presumption of the thing within your own knowledge is not exactly the way to state.

A. I have used every appliance I have deemed legitimate to extract the truth from men that I had a moral certainty in my own mind had been committing fraud on the Government.

Q. Now give us a little history of what you deem legitimate methods of extracting the truth.

A. By sitting down first and reasoning with the man, and telling him what his better course would be, telling him what a wicked fellow he had been, how he had violated every principle of manhood, morality, and official honor, had been defrauding the Government, a party to a fraud, and that his best and only way was to tell frankly just what he had done. Sometimes, when that failed, I held up to him the terrors of the law, read once in a while a section of the law to him, and of course it might be deemed a threat or otherwise.

Q. Have you exhausted your catalogue?

A. I do not care to go into that field.

Q. But I want to know something of that field.

A. Well, I think, unless my acts are under some imputation of wrong, it is not necessary for me to take each case in detail.

Q. I have not asked you for that; you spoke of your methods of obtaining information, and I wanted to know what they were, and if you now stated them all.

A. No, sir; I have not stated all; each case is different; it depends upon the man who sits before you. Sometimes he is a man who has no physical fear; again, he is a man who has no moral fear, that has no moral sense of wrong; it depends upon the subject you have to deal with.

This picture needs no filling up; it stands out on the canvas. The detective toying with the handcuffs, putting them on his own wrists to let the doomed man see how they worked; telling his victim what a wicked fellow he had been; holding up to him the terrors of the law; changing his tactics according to the subject he had to deal with; urging frank confession as the safest and best course, furnishes such a portrait of the prostitution of every principle of justice and law that it disgusts a man to think of the scene.

Mr. Dodge thus describes the ordeal he had to pass through when his books and papers were taken from him. He said:

The first knowledge or hint, in the forty-odd years of business that I have had with the Government, that I was accused of any dereliction of duty was when, sitting at the board of one of our large institutions, I received a note from my partner asking me to come to the custom-house. I went there, was taken into the little dark hole, lighted by gas, where this business is done, and there, for the first time I confronted this man Jayne. The then district attorney, Judge Davis, was also there. My junior partner, Mr. James, was with me. I had no more idea what we were called there for than the man in the moon. Not a thought had ever crossed my mind that there was anything wrong with the custom-house. Mr. Jayne opened upon me in his bland way, and said he was very sorry to be obliged to say that the Government was in possession of facts to show that the firm with which I was connected had been engaged for a series of years in deliberate attempts to defraud the revenue; and that it had been done first by a systematic perjury in connection with the custom-house oaths, and secondly by false and duplicate invoices; that he supposed I knew very well what were the penalties under such circumstances, and stating that every breach of the law in the cases of perjury, of which we had been guilty for a great many years, and many times a year, subjected us to a fine of $5,000, and to imprisonment for not less than two years; that the false invoices, and the undervaluation resulting from them, forfeited the entire amount of those invoices.

That was the first salutation. "And now," said he, "I have a warrant ready, from the district court, to take possession of your books and papers." Of course it was a thunder-bolt which I was not prepared for. I had not seen this man Jayne before. I knew Judge Davis; I knew him to be an honorable, upright man. I turned to the judge and said, "Judge Davis, this is a very strange proceeding. It is all new to me. I deny the whole of it; and I defy this man, or any other man, to produce a duplicate invoice ever received, or ever used, or ever known of, by the firm of Phelps, Dodge & Co." "Well," said Jayne, "you may deny it, but I have got them all here, and I have affidavits, too, to the same effect. What is more than that, I have evidence that you have tampered with the officers of the Government." I said to Judge Davis, "There is nothing in our business that we are unwilling to exhibit to you or to the Government. There is no necessity for a warrant to take possession of our books. If there are any books or papers that are in our possession that are needed by the Government to establish their case, they are entirely at your service; no objection whatever will be made to your having them." Judge Davis then said, "I have no knowledge of the matter other than the papers submitted to me." He thought it was a case justifying further investigation. Judge Davis then turned to Mr. Jayne and said, "Mr. Jayne, nothing can be more fair than the proposition made by Mr. Dodge. Now, whatever books you need Mr. Dodge says you can have; you do not want to issue that warrant." Mr. Jayne then said he would go with us to our store and get what books he needed.

Of course he got all he wanted, and so used them as to secure for himself and his partners $135,000, the Government getting the other half for protecting them from responsibility for the extortion. It seems to me that no argument is needed to prove that such a system should no longer be tolerated; the repetition of such wrongs ought to be rendered impossible. The effect of it is terribly demoralizing on our own officials. Lured from the performance of duty by hope of rich rewards, they see it may be day by day irregularities or technical violations of law which they know are unknown to the merchant; their plain duty is to inform him at once and prevent a repetition of them; their interest is to watch and wait so as to allow them to accumulate for months, it may be for years, and when the aggregate will secure penalties and forfeitures sufficient to gratify their avarice, make the seizure and demand the reward. These things, as the proof before us showed, are of constant occurrence, and will continue till we remove the motive for their continuance.

Another striking fact should not be overlooked. Although it is clearly shown that three-fourths at least of all the frauds on the revenue are committed in collusion with or by the connivance of Government officials, none of them are ever punished, many of them are not dismissed from the service; and even the thieves who betray their employers are taken up by the Administration and placed in positions of honor, profit, and trust. These things seem so incredible that I will refer to the proof.

Mr. Dodge, when before our committee, said:

I will relate an instance of this. My partner, older than myself, (and a more honorable man does not live on the face of the earth than Mr. James Stokes, of New York,) has been in the habit for twenty years, as January came around, of opening his desk and clearing it out, some rainy day, of the accumulation of papers which it contained, throwing them on the floor and having a boy put them in the fire and burn them. He did so on the 8th or 10th of January, and within half an hour we received a letter from our attorney to come directly to his office. We went up there, and he said: "What in the world is the matter? Jayne is tearing about in a most terrible way. He says that Phelps, Dodge & Co. are burning up their papers, and that he will have every soul of them in Ludlow-street jail before night." How did he know it? How did he know that these papers were burned up? Because he paid a man in our store to give information. He had our second book-keeper in his employment. What he paid him I do not know; but that he was in his employment I do know. We traced that fellow and turned him out of our store. And where did he go when he was turned out; where should he go? He went where he was employed. And where is he to-day? He is a clerk in the post-office, in the money department, a place obtained for him by the special agent of the United States.

Mr. BECK. What is his name?

Mr. DODGE. His name is Kennedy. But I will not detain the committee longer with this matter.

Mr. NIBLACK. It is very interesting to me.

Mr. DODGE. This is the operation of the whole thing from beginning to end.

When Mr. Jayne was on the stand I questioned him on this subject. I will read what was said.

Questions by Mr. BECK:

Question. I was struck very much, going over that book, with the fact that in nearly all the cases you cited it was done by collusion with the officers of the Government.

Answer. I have a list which will show you the exact proportion. I made out a list of them to-day, thinking a question of that kind would be asked, and deeming it a very proper matter for inquiry. Thirty of the cases out of the sixty-one were false weights obtained by collusion with United States weighers or employés in the weighers' department; six were false liquidations or false classifications, obtained by collusion with Government officers; nine were undervaluations. In one case, at least, of those it was by collusion with the Government officer. One was a false gauge, by collusion with the Government officer; nine were false classifications, obtained by collusions with the Government officers; two were false verifications as to quantity, obtained by tricks—by devices; three were false weights and false damage combined; and one was the warehouse case, with regard to which you have heard; making sixty-one in all.

Q. And some forty-six of them were by collusion with officers?

A. There were about fifty-two or fifty-three of them.

Q. In one form or another, collusion?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have any of these Government officers been punished?

A. They have been sent out of the service—dismissed.

Q. And kept out of the service?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. All of them?

A. I think there are a number of officers in the service. It is not my fault, sir.

Q. I am not speaking of fault, sir.

A. I wish to say in that connection that I have never made a recommendation for dismissal of any officer from the Government service. I have assumed that it was no part of the functions of a special agent of the Treasury Department to do the thinking of other people. It was merely his business to present the facts.

Q. A number have been dismissed, and a good many are still there, you think?

A. I think there are some officers there who should not be there, and a good many have been dismissed.

Q. And against whom you have reported facts of collusion to the Secretary?

A. A number of them; the receipt of money——

Q. That is, receiving bribes; not doing their duty, I suppose you mean?

A. I find that men have got their goods through without paying the proper duty.

Q. And paying something to the officer?

A. Yes, sir. And if the officers had done their duty they would not have got them through.

Q. These facts you have reported to the Secretary of the Treasury?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And these men the Secretary of the Treasury still keeps in office?

A. Some few of them are in office.

Q. Is it possible, under any law, to carry on the office of the custom-house with safety to the Government while men who receive bribes are kept in office?

A. No, sir; not in my judgment. And I look upon the taking of books and papers of commercial houses, and compelling them to pay penalty while the thieves inside the custom-house that have aided them are left unmolested, as no better than highway robbery.

He added, what the committee all will recollect, but the record does not state it, as we gave the witnesses the right to revise and correct their testimony, "and that is the reason I left the service." Even Jayne was disgusted that a Secretary should keep such men in office after he had reported them to him as thieves.

Again he said, and I agree with him:

If these investigations are made simply to punish merchants, and if the information that is obtained from the merchant's books is not used to clean the service of the men who have crowded into it and who have colluded with the merchants and made these frauds possible, then the acts of your special agents are no better than highway robbery; they are no better than organized brigandage.

I think our committee made a mistake in not demanding from the Secretary the reports made by Jayne, but we could not do everything.

In 1872 we abolished the moiety system so far as the internal revnue was concerned. I was a member of the Committee on Ways and Means when that great reform was effected. I labored with all the energy and all the intellect I possessed to accomplish it, and I have felt that my efforts in that regard, feeble as they were compared to those of my distinguished chairman and others, were of more service to the people I represent than any I have been able to render. Before that system was repealed spies and informers were infesting every neighborhood, distrust prevailed in every business relation, perjured scoundrels lured by hope of rich rewards were dragging our citizens before the courts or blackmailing them by threats of prosecution, until no man felt safe in the management of his legitimate business. Now confidence is restored, the spy and the informer has no inducement held out to him to commit perjury. The revenues of the Government are better secured and more cheerfully paid. Instead of increased distrust, confidence and good-will between the distiller, tobacco manufacturer, and others who pay revenue and the Government is the rule and not the exception. It will be so with the customs revenue when this bill becomes a law.

I will be compelled to confine myself to a very hasty notice of the other provisions of the bill, as I see my time has almost expired. We have endeavored to define smuggling so as to exclude from the definition all goods which pass through the custom-house or which custom-house officers might see if they desired. We believed that it was right if men were evading our custom-houses altogether, whether along our extended Canadian or Mexican frontier or on the Atlantic or Pacific coast, by the fraudulent importation of dutiable goods, to offer such inducements to officers or others to detect and punish them as would protect the Government and the honest importer who would suffer by the competition of the smuggler, while we tried to make it impossible for any official to acquire any interest in or any reward for the detection of frauds in regard to goods which either passed through the custom-house or were submitted to the inspection of the revenue officers.

We recommend that Congress shall appropriate specifically a sum sufficient to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay men who furnish such information as will protect the Government and the honest importer from frauds committed either by dishonest revenue officials or importers, severally or by collusion between them, an account to be rendered to Congress of his action and payments in this regard by the Secretary. Apprehension as to the practical operation of these provisions has been expressed by very careful and well-informed members. It is claimed that it will perpetuate the moiety system in another form. My answer is that Congress regulates the appropriation and examines the account annually. The representatives of the people, therefore, have direct control over it, and can at once stop abuses if they spring up. With seizures and moieties abolished, with all rewards to officials withdrawn, I do not believe it would be safe to withhold from the Secretary of the Treasury, who is of course the responsible head of the revenue service, but can give it no personal supervision outside of his office, all means of employing or paying for assistance in the prevention of frauds. It must be remembered that the custom-house officials are not his appointees. They hold their places by presidential nomination and senatorial confirmation; they are generally appointed because of their political usefulness or subserviency on recommendation often of members of this House; fitness for the place, business capacity, and even integrity, receiving frequently very little consideration either in the recommendation, nomination, or confirmation of the officials.

Only a few weeks ago the staid old Commonwealth of Massachusetts was shaken from center to circumference over the appointment of a collector at the port of Boston. I fear my honored chairman's senatorial aspirations were ignored and all his past services forgotten because he did not go into hysterics and make a fool of himself in the unseemly strife. If something more than the simple discharge of official duty is not expected or required from collectors and others, such exhibitions as that case developed would not be had. I mention it merely to illustrate the fact that the Secretary having to collect his revenues by and through such agents as the politicians see fit to impose upon him, (political tact or trickery being often a higher recommendation than fitness for the service,) ought to have the means to see that the revenues do not suffer at the hands of men so appointed. He can only get the information by paying for it; if we want him to have it we must furnish the money. Every honest importer will aid him; their interest will make them active in seeing that proper men, for proper pay, will watch and report against dishonest importers and corrupt officials.

These reasons controlled me in supporting the provisions of the bill on that subject. Another extremely important provision of the bill is the change made in the forfeitures from the whole invoice to the tainted item, and in the requirement that fraudulent intent shall be proved and passed upon as a question of fact before severe penalties shall be inflicted or forfeitures imposed. The law as it stands now on these subjects is simply barbarous, the fines are excessive, and the punishments cruel and inhuman in comparison with the offenses; sufficiently so to bring many of them within the constitutional prohibition.

What makes these thing so fearfully unjust is the admitted fact that the revenue laws and regulations are so complicated that merchants do not pretend to understand them. Professional experts have to be employed to engineer goods through the custom-house, and they are often unable to understand or keep up with the shifting regulations and conflicting decisions. Courts in different districts frequently render decisions diametrically opposed to each other. The Secretary takes one view to-day and the opposite to-morrow. Millions of dollars of drawbacks are paid, or additional burdens are imposed, as agents and politicians can influence his decisions. Yet penalties and forfeitures out of all proportion to the offense are imposed upon the merchant for mistakes or oversights, or for what the officials for the time being may choose to construe to be such, while official blunders, to use the mildest phrase, are all innocent, though they have taken in the last two years more money out of the Treasury and put it into the pockets of a few favorite lawyers and politicians than all the frauds that it is even pretended all the merchants have committed or attempted to commit.

The following list of high authorities laid before the committee makes the statement as to the complicated nature of the laws perfectly clear. Mr. Eaton said:

It becomes, therefore, necessary to know whether the revenue laws are free from ambiguities, and are readily understood by those who must use them, since such authorities as both Marshall and Story hold that "a doubt as to the true construction of the law is as reasonable a cause for seizure as a doubt respecting the fact." (United States vs. Riddle, 5 Cranch, 311; The Schooner Friendship, 1 Gallison, 112.)

The opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury is pertinent upon this point. In his report at the opening of the present Congress, he said, referring to the complexity of the revenue laws: "There is often a direct conflict between different statutes, and, occasionally, between two or more provisions of the same statute, while single provisions are frequently held to embrace different meanings. These differences can be settled only by arbitrary interpretations, or by adjudications in courts." The number of appeals to the Secretary for "arbitrary interpretations," the last year, on account of these "different meanings," was nearly five thousand.

Said Secretary McCulloch, in his report to Congress in 1867: "The laws relating to the foreign and coasting trade, and the collection of the revenue from customs, are now dispersed through many volumes of statutes, and have been so frequently modified by amendments of their original provisions, that on many points it is difficult for merchants, as well as for the officers whose duty it is to construe and execute them, to determine what is the law in force. * * * The Department has endeavored to obviate these embarrassments as far as practicable by regulations and instruction, but these measures are only a partial remedy, and fall far short of supplying the want of a uniform and consistent code."

Associate Justice Grier of the United States Supreme Court held: "It is a great grievance that the revenue laws passed by Congress have become so numerous and complicated that it is often difficult to ascertain what is the existing law on any particular subject. In the construction of other laws, when one statute supplies or changes the provisions of another, the latest is construed as a repeal of the former. But in the construction of this mass of contradictory revenue laws, it would seem that the statute which gives the highest duty, the largest fees, or the severest penalties, is never repealed by a later act which mitigates the penalty or diminishes the fees. Acts giving certain fees or forfeitures to certain officers become almost like the laws of the Medes and Persians, incapable of being repealed."

As further illustrating the doubt and ambiguity connected with the revenue laws, permit me to cite in concise language three decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States upon three different phrases of these laws, all of which phrases are necessarily acted upon by merchants in their daily business transactions.

I will first cite the "Cliquot case," (3 Wallace, 114.) The act of March 3, 1863, (12 Statutes at Large, 737,) provides that when foreign goods, obtained otherwise than by purchase, are imported, they shall be invoiced at the "actual market value thereof at the time and place when and where the same were procured and manufactured."

The court held "that the term 'place' does not mean any locality more limited than the country where the goods are bought or manufactured. The standard to be applied is their value in the principal markets of that country. The commerce into which they enter is international, and the language of the statute must be construed in a large and liberal spirit." Accordingly wines entered at the market value, at the time of exportation, at Rheims, which was the place of production and the place of export, were subjected to penalty, on the ground that the word "place" in the statute means the whole country, and that therefore the wines should have been entered at the market value at Paris, the largest market of France.

The next case is that of Stairs vs. Peaslee, (18 Howard, 521; Treasury Regulations of 1874, article 432.) The act of March 3, 1851, (9 Statutes at Large, 629,) and the act of July 28, 1866, 328, provide that the dutiable value of merchandise depends on the market value in the "principal markets of the country" from whence the same shall have been imported into the United States. In this case cutch, imported from Halifax to Boston, was entered at the invoice value, which was the market value of the cutch at Halifax at the time of exportation It was proved on trial that Calcutta was the great market of the East Indies for this class of goods, and that London and Liverpool were the principal markets of Great Britain, exclusive of India. The court held that the cutch must be appraised, not according to its value at Halifax, from which place it was imported, nor according to its value at the great market for that article at Calcutta, but at the market price at London and Liverpool at the time of exportation from Halifax. "The word 'country' embraces all the possessions of a foreign state, however widely separated, which are subject to the same supreme executive and legislative control." Consequently the court inflicted the penalty of the eighth section of the act of July 30, 1846.

Judge Davis explained the hardships of the existing laws and their unjust operation better than any one else. Several of the provisions of our bill were inserted at his suggestion; his experiences, of course, enabled him to aid us very much. I hope members will examine his testimony. I will read only one or two extracts illustrating the hardships to which I have referred. He said:

Now, a good deal has been said upon the point that if these gentlemen were not guilty of actual fraud they were not liable to a penalty. It does not follow at all that there must be actual intentional fraud proved under our revenue laws in order to make out a case of forfeiture. It is only required that a man shall knowingly do the forbidden act. If he knows when he does the forbidden act that he is doing that act, the law attaches the penalty. This may be illustrated by the law relating to usury. A man, for instance, comes into our State from Illinois, lends $1,000, and draws a note by which the borrower agrees to pay him 10 per cent., (as he may properly do in Illinois.) He has no intention whatever to violate the statute of New York, yet he does violate it, and the penalty attaches, because he knew when he drew the note, reserving 10 per cent., that he did that act.

Mr. WOOD. Although he did not know the penalties for usury in New York?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes. The law assumes that every man knows the law and the penalties it imposes for any act which he knowingly does, whether the man does know it or not.

Mr. NIBLACK. That is the best illustration of the case that we have had.

* * * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. Would not the insertion after the word "knowingly," in the statute, of the words "with intent to defraud the revenues," cover the case?

Mr. DAVIS. Perhaps it would, but yet it would be open to question. If, however, you provide that on the trial of such cases the judge shall submit the question of actual fraud to the jury, even in cases where he is bound to direct a verdict for the Government, you will save the whole thing. Then if the jury find that there was fraud, the Secretary should have no power over the case, because then he would be reviewing the verdict of a jury.

Mr. BECK. In the case to which you have just referred, in which the judge directed the jury to find a verdict for the United States, did he also direct the jury to pass on the question of actual fraud?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; not at all. I said that if the judge had done so in that case, the verdict would have been different. The courts are bound, in enforcing statutes, to order verdicts in cases where the parties knowingly do the acts which are a violation of the statute. We have just had a case in our own State of that kind. A poor man who was entirely out of employment had a friend who had been appointed inspector of elections. Our statute provides that if any person, not being an inspector of elections, shall put into a ballot-box any vote or votes he shall be guilty of felony. Now the man who was actually appointed inspector thought that he could help his friend by having him do the duty and receive the compensation. He went to a lawyer who drew a power of attorney providing that, in the name of this first party, the second party should go and act as inspector and perform all the duties of that office.

The man went and attended to the duty, acting fairly enough, and nobody found any fault with him until about the middle of the afternoon. He had acted so well, it seems, that the chairman of the judges of election, when he went to dinner, appointed him temporary chairman. Then somebody who came to the polls said he was not the man who was appointed inspector. The police officer immediately arrested him. The man said, "I know that that is not my real name, but I am acting under a power of attorney." This man was indicted for felony, and the judge submitted to the jury simply the question whether he did the act of putting in ballots and whether he knew he was doing the act. Of course the jury found that the man was guilty. The case went to the general term, and the general term was obliged to affirm the decision below. But we all united in asking the governor to pardon him, which the governor immediately did. That illustrates the position in which the courts are sometimes put in regard to the enforcement of statutes. For that reason I have made the suggestion, to ameliorate the hardships of the case, that where a judge is bound to direct a verdict because the act forbidden has been knowingly done by the party without his knowing or considering the law and its consequences and is yet a plain violation of a revenue statute, the court shall also submit the question of guilty intent to defraud.

We have endeavored to provide for adequate punishment in all cases of guilty intent to defraud, and to furnish relief in cases of accident or mistakes. We have sought to provide for penalties proportionate to the offense proved, which the present laws utterly ignore. To forfeit, as may be and is now done, an invoice of $50,000, because packing-boxes worth five dollars are omitted from the invoice, either by accident or design, and without inquiry as to which it was, not only violates all modern ideas of justice, but as long ago as the days of King John the barons of England required him to insert as covenants in the great charter that—

A freeman shall not be amerced for a small offense, but only according to the degree of the offense. * * * A merchant shall be amerced in the same manner, saving his merchandises. * * * None of the aforesaid amercements shall be assessed but by the oath of honest men of the vicinage.

They required him to covenant further that—

No bailiff, for the future, shall put any man to his law upon his own simple affirmation, without credible witnesses produced for that purpose.

No freeman shall be seized or imprisoned, or disseized or outlawed, or in any way destroyed; nor will we go upon him nor will we send upon him, except by the legal judgment of his peers or the law of the land.

To none will we sell, to none will we deny, to none will we delay, right or justice.

My object is to bring the revenue laws, and especially their execution, back to those old landmarks of liberty from which, under this administration, they have drifted so far.

Mr. Speaker, please hold your gavel one moment. I have sought to avoid politics in this discussion, and think I have done so wonderfully well considering the temptation; we avoid them in the Committee on Ways and Means, as the bill we have reported shows. But in closing I will say that the testimony laid by us before the House, which ought to be in the hands of every citizen, proves, and proves conclusively, that the custom-houses as now managed are sinks of iniquity, political dens supported by fraud, corruption, and extortion upon the commerce of the country.

Think of it, sir; $271,000 taken from one firm when the debt was only $1,600. The report of the Secretary (Executive Document No. 124) shows that during this administration there has been paid at the port of New York—

To informers	$491,342 26
To the collector	174,127 57
To the naval officer	162,286 62
To the surveyor	159,376 04

And at the port of Boston during the same period:

To informers	$152,798 18
To the collector	50,816 40
To the naval officer	50,817 74
To the surveyor	50,817 60

While the collectors were receiving as salaries $6,000 a year, the naval officers $5,000, and the surveyors $4,500 each besides.

Sir, these things ought not to be. No country can prosper while they are possible; no administration can be successful when the country is satisfied that it sustains, indorses, and approves them. It is a system which converts our custom house officials into mere political tools and tricksters, whose usefulness is measured not by their faithfulness in the collection of the revenues but in the power they can bring to bear to control primary elections, pack conventions, stuff ballot-boxes, and subvert the fundamental principles of republican government in the interest of the political tricksters to whom they look for support and on whose influence they can rely to sustain them against all efforts at exposure.

[Here the hammer fell.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. BABCOCK, his Private Secretary, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills of the House of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 3255) to establish an assay office at Helena, in the Territory of Montana;

An act (H. R. No. 3161) to enable the Secretary of War to carry out the act of April 23, 1874, entitled "An act to provide for the relief of the persons suffering from the overflow of the Mississippi River," and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 363) for the relief of Lucius A. Rountree;

An act (H. R. No. 368) for the relief of James Long;

An act (H. R. No. 826) for the relief of Elias C. Boudinot;

An act (H. R. No. 2086) for the relief of R. W. Clarke, postmaster at Brattleborough, Vermont;

An act (H. R. No. 555) for the relief of McClintock Young, of the State of Maryland;

An act (H. R. No. 1945) granting a pension to Juliet E. Hall, daughter of William Hall, late colonel of the Eleventh Regiment of Iowa Infantry;

An act (H. R. No. 3028) giving the assent of Congress for the improvement of the Wolf River, across the Menomonee Indian reservation, in the State of Wisconsin;

An act (H. R. No. 83) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to remove the powder-magazine from Fort Norfolk, Norfolk, Virginia;

An act (H. R. No. 1201) authorizing the payment of prize-money to the officers and crew of the United States steamer Bienville;

An act (H. R. No. 420) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to discharge certain obligations of the United States to the creditors of the upper and lower bands of Sioux Indians; and

An act (H. R. No. 725) for the relief of James C. Livingston, late a private in Company E, Third Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry.

ELECTION CONTEST—SHERIDAN vs. PINCHBACK.

Mr. SMITH, of New York, from the Committee on Elections, submitted a report in the contested-election case from the State of Louisiana of George A. Sheridan against P. B. S. Pinchback, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That the evidence in this case is not sufficient to establish the right either of P. B. S. Pinchback or George A. Sheridan to a seat in this House as a Representative at large from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, That Mr. Sheridan have leave to amend his notice of contest, if he shall so elect, serving upon Mr. Pinchback his amended notice within twenty days hereafter; that Mr. Pinchback have leave to answer such amended notice within forty days hereafter; and that upon the service of such answer the evidence of the respective parties be taken under existing laws of Congress in such cases made and provided; and that in case of default of an answer to such amended notice Mr. Sheridan be at liberty to take testimony ex parte, or, in case of default to serve the amended notice of contest, Mr. Pinchback may serve a notice of contest as provided by law within forty days hereafter and take testimony in like manner.

Mr. LAMAR. On behalf of the minority of the committee I ask leave to submit our views, together with the following resolutions:

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback was not elected as a member of the Forty-third Congress from the State of Louisiana at large.

Resolved, That George A. Sheridan was duly elected as a member of the Forty-third Congress from the State of Louisiana at large and is entitled to a seat in this House as such member.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I move that the report be printed, and I give notice that I will call it up in a short time.

Mr. LAMAR. I ask that the views of the minority be printed with the report of the majority.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

MOIETIES.

Mr. WOOD obtained the floor.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] to yield to me to have read a short extract from the testimony taken before the Committee on Ways and Means on the controverted point on which I raised an issue with my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.] I ask to have this read, and shall make no remark upon it myself at the present time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WILLIAM E. DODGE again appeared before the committee, and was examined as follows:

Mr. WOOD. You mentioned, Mr. Dodge, in reply to Mr. Foster, the name of another member of Congress besides General BUTLER, who was in New York at the time of your settlement—Senator CONKLING. Will you please state whether, in your opinion, he was there as counsel or in any capacity from which he derived any pecuniary compensation or benefit, or in what way you suppose he was there?

Mr. DODGE. I never had the most distant idea that he was there professionally; but I believe he happened to be in New York at the time that this thing was in process of settlement, and was in council with some of the other gentlemen there, particularly, I believe, with reference to the position then occupied by Mr. Laflin. I have never mentioned his name before in the matter. My own impressions were that he had no pecuniary interest in it in any way. I have always looked upon it as a mere accidental visit on his part to the city. Still the fact that he was there in connection with the other gentlemen showed what an array there was against us.

Mr. WOOD. As these things are read in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky who is now absent from his seat, I shall object to any further reading until he is present.

Mr. DAWES. If my colleague upon the committee [Mr. WOOD] will permit a paragraph to be read from Judge Davis's testimony it will show exactly what Mr. CONKLING did. It is due to Mr. CONKLING this his exact connection with this case should be shown; and therefore in justice to him I ask the Clerk to read from page 248 an interrogatory put to Judge Davis and his answer thereto. This will show exactly what was done; and in justice to all parties it should be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DAWES. Who participated in that discussion?

Mr. DAVIS. The statute was there, and it was read. Senator CONKLING read the statute. He had it in his hand; whether it was brought in after I came or not I do not know. He took the statute and read it over, and said it did not seem to him that there could be any doubt (I only give the substance of his remarks of course) that the true construction of the statute was that the whole of the invoice was forfeited, and that under such a state of facts he thought it the duty of the collector to bring a suit for the entire amount of the invoices, instead of for the articles affected with the fraud. I said to him that I thought that under the rules of construction adopted in the Federal courts in all the revenue cases that was the construction which would be put upon that statute. But I said that, if the question were one purely at common law, under common-law rules, statutes imposing penalties and forfeitures were to be construed in the milder sense (ameliore sensu.) I thought the highest court would give the construction that would apply the forfeiture to the articles actually affected, but I understood that the tendency of the Supreme Court was, as shown in the wine cases, the Cliquot case and some other cases, had been to give to those statutes a rigid construction on grounds of public policy, and that I thought the Supreme Court would give the construction which he gave to the statute.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, in the remarks which I shall submit on this bill I do not expect to be very interesting or entertaining to the House. It is an important subject, and should be discussed from a standpoint somewhat different from what we ordinarily adopt here in our debates. I shall not repeat what has been said by my colleague [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS] with reference to the details of the bill. He has gone over that ground, and it will be entirely unnecessary for me to make remarks which would be but a mere recapitulation of what he has said as to them.

Nor shall I attempt to deal with the personnel of this matter so far as the practice under the existing revenue laws is concerned. While I concede that the very gravest errors, and indeed the utmost oppressions have been committed upon the part of the Government officers in the practical application of the laws, and have been justified under color of the laws themselves, yet my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has so ably and so truthfully presented that aspect of the question that I will not attempt to follow him in that direction.

It shall be my aim, therefore, before approaching the bill itself as it affects the existing laws, to deal with certain general propositions, to declare certain principles, to enunciate certain fundamental doctrines which should underlie and form the basis for all measures of Congress having for their object the raising of revenue. Because, sir, in exercising that which I deem to be the highest power of the state, that of taxation, we should be guided by certain general principles. Our legislation, while protecting the interests of the Government on the one side, should be so adjusted as to be fair and equal in its application to the humblest individual upon whom it may operate on the other side.

It has been said that the power to issue money and to regulate its value is the highest of all sovereign powers. I take exception to this declaration. In my judgment there is even yet a higher prerogative, and that is the power of taxation. When a government issues what is called money and declares its value, it establishes simply a medium of trade, a circulation of credits, by which the exchanges of commodities may be conducted and a universality as a standard of value made applicable to all within the sphere of its operation. So long as the creation of this circulating medium is limited to its origin and control and it becomes generally recognized and accepted, there is no infringement upon the individual rights of property. But the power of taxation is of a different character. It is an exaction upon the property and industry of the people. It is a demand upon both capital and production, and deprives every individual of a proportion of his means of subsistence if he is poor, and of his wealth if he is rich. Its operation is arbitrary and positive; its effect is unrelenting and certain. Men yield to it from necessity, having no recourse but compliance. In all countries, whatever may be the form of government, whether liberal or despotic, this fact is recognized because it cannot be avoided. Governments to exist must be maintained, and to be maintained they must be supported, and to be supported each citizen must contribute his quota. This principle is of universal application, alike operative in either republics or monarchies; hence I say that the power to tax is the greatest of all powers, the highest sovereign power, the power of the state which is universally adopted and universally recognized.

But while this fact is established everywhere, nations have differed materially as to the manner of taxation. Various methods have been adopted by the most enlightened nations to procure revenue. The highest order of statesmanship has been exhibited in devising schemes by which the burdens thus imposed should be equitably adjusted. Within this last century more liberal principles have been made applicable to the system, and the rights of the people more justly considered; and it is interesting to note the gradual amelioration which has taken place in the imposition of moneyed exactions for governmental purposes. As free principles and the common rights of man have become more generally recognized, greater attention has been paid to this subject; so that what was once demanded as a right and obtained by force is now settled by popular approval and assented to upon principles of policy and equality.

It is not necessary for me to consider the various methods suggested and adopted of raising revenue even in these more liberal days, or to discuss the questions involved in the several propositions as to direct or indirect taxes, or as to whether we should levy them upon wealth or production or population. It is not pertinent to my purpose to take exception to the present system adopted in this country which is in effect that all taxes are levied upon the consumer. This fact is generally accepted and equally applicable to every mode heretofore adopted in the United States.

Whatever agencies may pay the money into the Treasury, the final contributor is he who consumes the article taxed, and it makes no difference whether the tax is imposed through what is called our internal-revenue system upon internal production, or whether through the customs system upon the foreign production. But while this is true, it is equally true that the class which exchanges and which may be called the intermediary class, standing between the producer and the consumer, and between both and the Government, is interested in and affected by not only the peculiar character of the laws which levy the contribution, but also in their mode of execution.

If by these laws or their administration this class is subjected to impositions and exactions by the Government, it will naturally endeavor to protect itself by throwing upon the consumer the additional burden thus incurred, so that he is compelled to bear not only his own proportion of the public requirements, but, in addition, a compensation to the intermediaries for the trouble and expense which they have submitted to and which does not reach the public Treasury at all.

While the great burden of the public expenditure is borne by the people at large, there are but few who pay it into the Treasury. These I call the intermediaries—a class composed of the merchant and the trader. It being conceded that the consumer is the final contributor of the tax, and yet does not pay it directly to the Treasury, those who do pay it are, as it were, agents of the Government for that purpose. They are, so to speak, an outside, semi-official, unpaid force, which the Government uses for the purpose of procuring its revenues. It is a distinctive, independent agency, standing aloof from both the Government and the consumer, and yet with inseparable connections with both, and which is not appreciated by either.

Now, while it is true that the consumer pays the revenue, it is equally true that there must exist an intermediary agency between the consumer and the Government itself. And here is a position which I desire to impress upon the minds of members of this House in connection with the question immediately before us. There is an intermediate agency, an outside, semi-official, unpaid collecting force, in no way connected with either your customs or your internal-revenue system, which collects money from the consumer and deposits it in the public Treasury. This is the trading and mercantile class—a class that exists by the profits made in the exchanges of the products of the producers; but it matters not whether these productions come into our ports from abroad or whether they are the productions of our own country. This force is one as yet entirely unrecognized by the Government, too little respected by our laws, embracing a large, influential, respectable, and honorable class of our citizens, who, so far as the customs-regulations and laws are concerned, have been the objects of oppression, and who are certainly entitled, from their position and character and patriotism, to be treated justly and equitably.

So far my remarks apply to all who contribute the revenues, whether from internal or external sources, under both the direct and customs systems. We have two principal sources of collection; these are duties upon foreign importations, and that by tax upon certain articles of American production. The relative importance to the Government of these may be gathered from the following table. It will be seen upon which we rely mostly; but so far as public policy and fair dealing are concerned, that portion of the intermediary class which pays the direct tax is entitled to the same consideration as the much larger proportion which contributes the duties upon importations. (See tabular statement at top of next page.)

It will be seen by this table, kindly furnished to me by the Bureau of Statistics, that of the $1,987,042,367 revenue collected throughout the United States for the last five years $1,160,600,747 have been drawn from duties on imported goods. At the present a much larger proportion is derived from the same source, the revenue from internal taxes having been decreased by recent changes in the laws.

The persons who pay these duties into the Treasury as a general thing are men of the highest character, distinguished in every walk of life as citizens of prominence, intelligence, and affluence. In their several communities, as a class they stand foremost in patriotism, benevolence, enterprise, and liberality. If no other influence than self-interest operated upon them to compel probity and obedience to the laws, this of itself would be sufficient. They could not afford to be dishonest if they would. Their stake in the good order of society and the security of property is too great for them to follow the perilous course of the cheat or to hazard the consequences of attempting to defraud the Government.

The history of our country presents in unmistakable language the high patriotic character of the mercantile interest as a class. Every school-boy knows the American Revolution would have been a failure but for the moneyed contributions to the cause by the merchants of that day. Morris of Philadelphia, and Hancock of Boston, were foremost not only in the contribution of talents, patriotism, and services, but especially the former in a lavish expenditure of his own private means to accomplish American liberty. The second war with England, in 1812, in which the merchants mostly suffered, because it was a war upon the ocean, would have resulted disastrously but for the aid the merchants furnished.

And it is within my own personal knowledge that the first loan required by the Government to sustain the Union cause in 1861 was promptly met by the merchants of the city of New York, who, acting through a few banks, raised the $40,000,000 asked for by the Secretary of the Treasury, and throughout that war, during its darkest period, when we had little public credit, the contest was sustained solely by the united pecuniary efforts of the merchants of that city. But for its wealth and liberality the credit of our Government would have been depreciated to a greater extent than was continental money in the days of the Revolution. It is true that the great wealth of New York enabled it to do this; but it is also true that that wealth has been mainly derived from its foreign commerce, and that that foreign commerce has been conducted by the class whom the revenue laws and their mode of execution have branded as knaves and swindlers.

But let me not be misunderstood. I claim no consideration for the merchants and importers of that city in consequence of these things. If I understand the feeling of the importing merchants of the United States, not only in the city of New York but elsewhere, they require no discrimination in their favor in the enactment of legislation to collect your revenues honestly and faithfully. They want no undue advantage; but, sir, they do not want to be discriminated against; they do not want laws passed which single them out as a dishonest class who are lying in wait for the purpose of defrauding the Government of its honest revenues. They want to be dealt with fairly and equitably. They care not how severe you make the penalties for an invasion of the law; they care not how much you may punish any man who attempts to defraud the customs revenue in the importation of merchandise; they care not what penalties you may impose; but they do want fair dealing and justice. They do not presume upon their support of the Government in its darkest periods from its origin down. They will give their hearty support to the enactment of any legislation necessary to sustain the interest of the Government and collect its revenues.

But, sir, men whose social and personal position through life has been without a blemish do not want to be put upon the same footing with another class of persons who I must admit exist in all mercantile communities and who seek to prey not only upon the Government but upon their neighbors.

Nor do we ask that there shall be any relaxation in the vigilance of the Government in the collection of its just dues. It is our interest to prevent fraud by smuggling or undervaluations as much as it is the interest of the Government. The prosperity of trade is much dependent upon the integrity of those who conduct it; and the supremacy New York has attained in her commercial character is as much owing to the honor and intelligence of those who represent it as to any physical advantages she possesses.

Can it be considered sound public policy to frame and execute laws based upon the theory that such a people are naturally dishonest? Is it wise in obtaining revenue to throw every possible obstruction in the way of its collection? Those who want money in the ordinary transactions of life are not apt to resort to expedients which must ultimately defeat their object. Is it not rather our duty as a Government to nourish, protect, and encourage the source upon which we mainly depend for revenue? Should we not so devise our legislation and the mode of its execution as to enlarge the area of our foreign commerce by promoting its prosperity and dealing fairly with its agencies? Such a course is deemed wisdom in all the pursuits of trade, and certainly cannot be wrong when applied to the public interest.

Now, sir, what do the merchants complain of? What is the effect of the bill reported by the Committee on Ways and Means? What is the object of the delegations of merchants thronging the doors of the Committee on Ways and Means and keeping that committee in constant labor for the last three months? What do they want? Sir, I will tell you briefly what they complain of before I tell you what they want.

Merchants for several years have endured vexations and annoyances which at times have amounted to oppression, of which the public know little. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, in this connection it is almost impossible for gentlemen here, brought from distant portions of the United States to the sea-board, whose pursuits and avocations at home have not been directed to the peculiar character of the laws for the collection of the revenues upon the sea-board—it is impossible they could have become acquainted with the difficulties surrounding the importers of merchandise under existing laws and their execution.

The delicacy of a merchant's standing and credit is of such a nature he naturally shrinks from giving publicity to his grievances when he comes in contact with the Government. In Europe, as well as in New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, the mere fact a merchant is in difficulty with the Treasury Department or difficulty with the Government is of itself, in the absence of any other statement of the case, prima facie evidence that something is wrong on the part of the merchant. When that merchant has a competitor next door, probably a rival in the same trade, he does not even let that neighbor know he is in any such difficulty. Hence it is these cases have not had publicity. Hence it is that the merchant too often yields to the extortion and demands made upon him by the Government agents than bring before the public in any form the difficulties and controversies likely to arise.

We have recently had instances of the fatal effect upon the credit of importing merchants by publicity of the fact that they have been brought into contact with the Government. I know of the failure of three houses in New York growing out of the fact that their credit was destroyed, which to them was equal to their capital, because it was supposed the Government had laid its strong arm upon them and would take from them all the assets in their possession. Hence it is, I repeat, we need not be surprised that the oppressions and difficulties and hardships which the mercantile interests have borne in New York for so many years have not been brought to the attention of Congress previously and to the general attention of the people.

OF WHAT DO THE MERCHANTS COMPLAIN?

With these general reflections I will now make some specific applications. The importers have endured for several years vexations and annoyances which, at times, have amounted to oppressions and extortions of which the general public know little. Those have arisen not only from the character of the revenue and tariff laws, but recently from a violation of the spirit of these laws by those appointed to execute them. Under the present administration the execution of these laws (sufficiently odious and oppressive within themselves) has been directed not so much to the protection of the revenue as to further increase the individual perquisites of those appointed to enforce it. While the latter purpose appears to have influenced the law-makers at various times, nothing has been done to ameliorate the condition of those who are subjected to these laws, or to lessen their liability to unnecessary interference and unjust exactions.

It is not my purpose to enumerate and to discuss at length the history of these laws, and the many grievances of which the merchants complain as to their effect and operation. I will enumerate and classify some of the evils of which they have been productive.

First. They authorize the seizure, removal, and detention, without notice, of the private books and papers of a merchant, to be used as evidence against himself, in contravention of the common law and of the fourth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that "the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and, effects * * * shall not be violated."

What alterations may be made in these books and papers by the detective who is interested in defeating the merchant under the moiety principle is not known. The books themselves are seized, it may be at the dead hour of the night, while the merchant is on his pillow in slumber, taken into custody and put into a den in the New York custom-house and held there by some agent of the Treasury Department, to do with what he pleases, until he produces them next week, or the week after, or a month after, as evidence against the merchant to make him convict himself. Sir, if this were not in direct contravention of the provision of the Constitution of the United States which declares the right of the people to be secure in their houses and papers, it would be a violation of our common feeling of humanity. It would be a violation of the sense of every man in the community of personal right, of his secrets, of his home, of the dearest and nearest privilege which belongs to himself, and cannot be taken away.

Mr. TREMAIN. Let me ask my colleague a question.

Mr. WOOD. Certainly.

Mr. TREMAIN. Before passing from this subject I would like to learn how, consistently with the argument you have now so forcibly presented, you can vindicate and sustain the third section of the bill which says in all cases of penalties and forfeitures, unless the merchant brings his books into court, the allegations of the district attorney shall be taken as confessed against him as to the particular point specified.

Mr. WOOD. I remind my colleague that the chairman of our committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] has moved to strike out that section.

Mr. TREMAIN. I was not present when that amendment was offered, and was not aware of it.

Mr. WOOD. And I will also say in that connection that my other colleague on the committee [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS] stated, I think without thought, that a minority of the committee had inserted this third section. It was done by a majority of the committee after a great deal of deliberation and debate.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. But my colleague will do me the justice to say that I rectified the statement on the instant the word escaped from my lips. Of course it was done by a majority.

Mr. WOOD. While on this point permit me to say that I was one of the members of the committee who had some apprehension as to the effect of an entire repeal of the existing law with reference to the seizure of books and papers without some such provision as most of the States have.

Mr. TREMAIN. Is there any State which has a provision that in a proceeding for a penalty or foreiture a defendant can be required to produce any evidence, or give any evidence, and that in his default to do so anything shall be taken as confessed against him?

Mr. WOOD. My colleague is a very able and a very correct lawyer, and is no doubt more familiar with the laws of the several States than myself. But the idea which the majority of the committee had, and which they endeavored to ingraft in the third section of the bill, was that there would be no general system operating which would be operative equally everywhere in the United States courts without the adoption of some such provision as this, because, as we understand it, it is the practice of the United States courts to adopt very much the practice of the State courts.

Mr. TREMAIN. That is all very correct. But the point about it is that you compel him to produce his books in a suit for a penalty, or else the allegations against him are to be taken as admitted. Now, I am not aware of any rule in the State or Federal courts that is analogous to the one in your bill.

Mr. WOOD. My colleague may be strictly accurate, critically accurate, if you please, but I think that in our own State there is a law providing that in a suit between individuals any writings, books, or papers of a merchant may be taken into custody.

Mr. TREMAIN. That is in a civil case where there is no question of penalty involved. But the provisions in this bill are in reference to cases where a penalty or forfeiture is involved. I wish to know whether my colleague sustains the section as reported in this bill?

Mr. WOOD. I understand that the suggestions of my colleague are prompted by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. TREMAIN. They are none the worse for that.

Mr. WOOD. I will be able to deal with the third section when it comes up for action. We are now engaged in the general debate on the bill. I suppose we will discuss the bill by sections. My remarks at present are of a general character.

Mr. DAWES rose.

Mr. WOOD. I hope my friend, the chairman of the committee, who is so learned in the law, will allow me to proceed with the discussion of the bill in its general aspects.

Mr. TREMAIN. I was anxious to know whether, as my colleague was laying down correct principles, he was sustaining his bill in connection with those principles.

Mr. WOOD. I had intended to refer to that before concluding my remarks.

Second. In making custom-house officials judges to determine the validity of seizures and penalties, and giving these officials a large interest in the pecuniary results derived therefrom.

Third. In creating a secret detective force of spies and informers, clothed with the official authority of the Government, and with power to destroy the commercial reputation and private character of any importer, and with no compensation but that which is derived from the fears or the guilt of the party accused.

Under the present law the judges who are to determine the criminality of the merchant are themselves pecuniarily interested in their determination of that question, and therefore in the bill reported by the committee we have repealed everything which gives to the custom-house or Government officials any part of the penalties or forfeitures incurred by an importer in his attempt to evade the law. Under the present law, however innocent a man may be of any attempt to defraud, if by an error of a clerk, if by a mistake in the addition of a column of figures, if by the omission upon an invoice of a trifling expenditure incurred, such as cartage, and that invoice does not cover every cent of the cost of transportation, the merchant is treated as a criminal; he is made to forfeit the whole invoice or the whole cargo, if he is the importer of a whole cargo and it is on one invoice; he forfeits the whole although the error may have amounted to but five dollars. You would scarcely believe, Mr. Speaker, the House would scarcely believe, that the forfeiture in the case of Phelps, Dodge & Co. amounted to $1,750,000 for an alleged attempt to keep $1,600 out of the Treasury upon duties on imported goods. That is the best illustration of the working of the whole system that could possibly be presented. The penalty is so much in excess of the extent of the wrong that it is in violation not only of the common law but of common justice. It is scarcely possible to conceive that in this nineteenth century, in this great, free, and intelligent country, in this land of boasted civilization and liberty, not only the honor but the property of men may be subjected to such great penalties for a trifling, accidental mistake. Sir, it is almost impossible to conceive that such a state of things can exist in our day and in our land; and yet, sir, they do exist, and our bill seeks to repeal the law which permits these abuses.

Fourth. In giving all of the above agencies of extortion and oppression the assistance of the United States district attorney, the sole prosecuting criminal power, who is himself encouraged by a commission of 2 per cent. upon the amounts of money thus collected.

Fifth. It forfeits to the Government and to the officials above enumerated an entire invoice of merchandise, however large, though but one article of comparatively trifling relative importance may have been undervalued; thus violating a principle of law and justice which measures punishment according to the extent of the crime.

Sixth. In making no distinction between the penalties imposed for erroneous omissions of charges in the aggregate value of an invoice of foreign goods and an attempt to evade the law by criminal undervaluation, punishing both alike, and imposing a like penalty for each offense.

Seventh. In adhering to the system long since discontinued in Europe of allowing moieties to officers of the Government; which, in contravention of a sound public policy, offers inducements to those clothed with authority to exercise that authority in the pursuit of private avarice, whoever may suffer, or however greatly the good name and welfare of the Government may be imperiled.

Eighth. By the continuance and enlargement of this principle of wrong, they have deranged commerce and obstructed importations, lessened the revenue therefrom, and alienated the affections of a large class of liberal and patriotic citizens.

Sir, the criminal officer of the Government aids the Government agents to perpetrate these outrages with his power to indict, to try and to punish, and he aids them because he receives 2 per cent. on the amount collected. He assists them by his stupendous power of criminal prosecution, in addition to the powers given to the official agents of the Government in detecting frauds. Your informer detects; your custom-house officer denounces; your district attorney prosecutes, and all are paid, not by the Government, but by the merchant against whom the charge is thus made and against whom it is thus the interest of these persons to make such condemnation. If they cannot get a whole pound of flesh they will take what they can get, as in the case of Phelps, Dodge & Co. when they took $271,000 although the amount claimed was $1,750,000.

Madison, in the first Congress which discussed and passed the tariff law of 1789, in speaking on the subject, said:

> A national revenue must be obtained; but the system must be such a one that while it secures the object of revenue it shall not be oppressive to our constituents.

I deem this declaration, coming from such a source at such a time, as almost equal to a constitutional provision.

It is directly applicable to the present execution of the revenue laws, and should be heeded and strictly observed both by the law-making as well as the law-executing powers of the Government. But we are not without constitutional directions to the same effect. There are two provisions which bear upon it, and which in my opinion have been violated. The authority under which Congress can levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises (article 1, section 8, of the Constitution) also contains an express inhibition, in these words:

> But all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

As our revenue laws are now executed the duties and imposts are not uniform throughout the United States.

The concentration at the chief ports of entry of the frequent and indeed constant interference with the importations by the unnecessary obtrusion of Government officials, operates as an additional tax upon importations. They cause expenses and outlay of money outside and independent of the duty imposed by law. Importers are subjected to an additional tax in consequence, which in the aggregate increases to no small extent the cost of importation. This is especially true of those places where, like New York and Boston, the importations are large. In other and minor ports of entry no such difficulties exist. I submit, therefore, whether the laws and the machinery provided to execute them, as operative in New York and Boston, do not in effect create a discrimination in favor of other cities which destroys that "uniformity" of operation which the Constitution requires.

The Constitution orders that all taxes or duties imposed upon foreign goods introduced into the United States shall be uniform in their bearing; that is, that no higher tax shall be levied in one State than is levied in another, that the imported merchandise introduced into the port of Philadelphia shall bear no higher duty than that imported into any other port. It is not sufficient to say that the tariff laws make no distinction in that they are alike operative everywhere throughout the United States. Under the present system the mere duty imposed by the tariff upon any article does not comprise the whole tax levied upon it by the Government.

If, as for instance by the regulations of the Treasury or through the avarice of Treasury special agents stimulated by the moiety or any other cause, additional expense is imposed upon importations at any one port, other and in addition to that fixed by law upon all, it is in effect not "uniform," and consequently in violation of that clause of the Constitution which requires uniformity.

Nor is this the only section of the Constitution which bears upon this question. The ninth section of article 1 provides that "No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another." This clause is more plainly violated than the eighth. Great preference has been given to the port of Philadelphia, for instance, over New York, because at the former port but one or two cases of extortion, causing large money exactions from importers, have occurred, while at the latter port they have been of daily occurrence for five years. This preference has been shown also in appraised valuations upon which duties have been levied, when at some places much higher rates have been established than at others for articles of the same value. The bill presented by the Committee on Ways and Means will go far to prevent many of these abuses and secure to a greater extent all the revenue imposed by the tariff acts of Congress. As a whole, the bill is a good one. While there are one or two features of it I think of doubtful policy, yet I am unwilling to hazard its passage by making opposition to them at this time. In my judgment the bill should be adopted, and if those appointed to carry it into effect shall faithfully perform their duties and be satisfied with the large salaries and receipts to which they may be entitled, and shall deal fairly and equitably with the merchants, we shall hear no more of the outrageous exactions, extortions, and oppressions which have recently been perpetrated upon them and which have not only disgraced the American character but retarded commerce and lost revenue to the Treasury.

It is true that under no laws which can be framed can the people have relief from oppression unless the officers who are appointed to execute them are themselves honest and faithful. We can devise no system not liable to abuse. We must have honest administration to secure good government, and until a reform thorough and complete shall be effected in the personnel of the custom-house and other officials, no laws that Congress can pass will accomplish all that is required. At present this cannot be done. All that can now be accomplished is to take away the legal justification which exists in favor of these corrupt officials and which gives them legal sanction in their wrongdoing, so that even the color of law under which they claim to act shall no longer exist. The bill printed by the committee will do this, and I hope the House will pass it without delay.

As showing the discrimination in levying duties, I beg to refer to the evidence given before the Committee on Ways and Means by a committee of the steel consumers of the United States, to the effect that fifty-eight pounds per ton net was the appraised value of a certain class of steel imported into New York, while at Boston it was fifty-eight pounds, 10 per cent. off, for the same article. Here is a difference which affects the cost of the steel and which adds to the duty at one place 10 per cent. more than at another. Notwithstanding that the tariff law fixes the duty uniform, the practice under it is not uniform.

Now, sir, the bill as reported by the committee is, in my judgment, defective only in one regard. In one regard I deem the bill radically wrong. We have abolished the principle of moieties; that is, we have taken away from all officers of the Government, and from all detectives and agents, if you please, any share or interest in any article forfeited in consequence of any attempt to evade the law. The word "moiety" means half; and under the principle of existing law one-half is forfeited to the informer, and the other half goes to the Government. But there has been so much wrong-doing under the system, it has become so odious, and it is so much in contravention of the spirit of the day, that the committee were unanimous in their desire to rid the country of it.

But in the fourth section of this bill the majority of the committee have incorporated a principle which in my judgment is equally objectionable. They propose to give for the employment of detectives in smuggling cases a sum to be appropriated by Congress and to be used in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. It was defended upon the ground that upon our frontier where smuggling was so frequent and easy of accomplishment, it was necessary to have detectives and to pay them in this way. In the origin of this Government, when Hamilton drew the first tariff bill, we had nothing but smuggling to provide against and the principle of allowing moieties arose entirely in the effort to attempt to detect frauds by smuggling, not frauds in invoices. We had then no revenue cutters as now; we had but an illy regulated custom-house, and no modes and agencies for detecting and prosecuting frauds. We therefore gave a moiety for detecting smuggling.

This bill is defective inasmuch as it perpetuates the same odious principle, only changing the word moiety to that of rewards for detecting smuggling, and not detecting evasions of the law by undervaluing goods. I am for the abrogation of the whole system, and I give notice that if this bill shall pass, whenever an appropriation bill comes up which proposes to give $100,000 or $200,000 to be disposed of at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, who himself tells us that he does not know how the secret service fund in his Department is disbursed, I shall oppose the appropriation of any money to pay any agent of the Government or any outsider for detecting smuggling, and allow the Secretary to pay him at his discretion. That is one of the sections of the bill to which I object. While I will not oppose the bill on that ground, and may not move to strike out that section, I would not be performing my whole duty in this debate if I did not declare that in my judgment that section of the bill is continuing the same odious practice, calling it rewards and asking Congress to create a new system and organize an outside detective force without official responsibility to the Government itself.

It may be that the Treasury agent who has been so active and successful in the prosecution of the merchants, and who has amassed so much money thereby, may organize, under this bill, in New York, an outside secret detective custom-house official agency. He takes no oath, he gives no bond, he holds no office under the Government; but if, under this bill, he should detect smuggling, he could go to the Secretary of the Treasury, and, with the outside influences which he evidently knows so well how to bring to bear, demand his compensation, and Congress would appropriate the money to pay it. I am opposed to this section, and shall never vote a dollar for that purpose. If detection of smuggling is to be rewarded, let money come from the results of their detections. If they detect smuggling, let them receive a portion of the result of the goods smuggled or attempted to be smuggled, and not let them be paid out of the public Treasury.

There are other considerations I had intended to present, but the hour having expired, I yield the floor.

During the delivery of Mr. WOOD'S remarks business was suspended to receive a MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 828) for the relief of Alexander Henderson; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also informed the House that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill (H. R. No. 2078) for the benefit of occupying claimants.

The message further announced that the Senate disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 311) for the relief of Joseph Montanari, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BUCKINGHAM, Mr. BOUTWELL, and Mr. DAVIS as conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a resolution, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, directing the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives to adjourn their respective Houses without day on the 22d day of June, A. D. 1874, at twelve o'clock noon.

ADJOURNMENT SINE DIE.

Mr. DAWES. I ask unanimous consent to take up for consideration at this time the concurrent resolution from the Senate for an adjournment sine die.

Mr. WOOD. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. KASSON. I object to its being called up and acted upon without being referred at all.

Mr. RANDALL. It is a privileged resolution.

Mr. WOOD. I yield that it may be acted on.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. LAWRENCE in the chair.) Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] insist on his objection?

Mr. DAWES. I believe that it is a privileged question, and I desire to call it up and ask the previous question upon it.

Mr. KASSON. I ask if that is in order pending my objection?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in order pending the objection.

Mr. KASSON. I insist on the objection. The House can act upon the resolution after a night's consideration better than it can now.

MOIETIES.

Mr. WOOD then resumed and concluded his remarks.

Mr. KASSON. I had hoped that it would not be necessary for a member of the committee, who had not prepared any speech on this question, and who had no party purpose to accomplish in this investigation, to address the House upon the subject of this bi'l. But when my worthy colleague on the committee who reported the bill [Mr.

ELLIS H. ROBERTS] thought proper to express impliedly his own dissent from one section of the bill which the majority of the committee regarded as a very important section, and when another worthy colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] attacks with all his force one of the provisions of the bill, and when another friend and distinguished gentleman upon the committee [Mr. WOOD] implies that he would like something else to accomplish the same purpose in a better mode, it is evident that somebody should have the boldness to state to the House the reasons why it is that the section attempted to be condemned exists and should be retained.

I avow the principle that whatever sustains the interest of the honest merchant sustains the interest of the Government; and whatever regulation of procedure may tend to guard the Government against fraud tends equally to guard the honest importers of this country against an unlawful competition on the part of men who dare to defraud unless there are means provided for the detection of such frauds.

It is because I believe in this identity of interest between the merchants and the Government that I condemn, as heartily as any man on this floor, laws which allow extraordinary powers, in the name of the Government, to interested men, tempted by the acquisition in a single day of an enormous fortune.

But, on the other hand, in view of the strong temptation which we all of us feel to sweep away everything that has been connected with the outrages practiced in New York especially, and to some extent in Boston, I feel it the duty of the Committee on Ways and Means to warn the House in some form against sweeping away every barrier against a flood of fraud which is employed by the dishonest to evade the payment of the duties imposed by the Government, and paid by the honest.

And in this I am supported, as my friend from New York [Mr. WOOD] knows, by a majority of the merchants who made their appearance before the committee, who demanded no such thing as sweeping away all these guards, and who admitted what I have now stated, that it is their interest as well as that of the Government to have the means of detecting and punishing the frauds which it is conceded have been perpetrated to the great detriment of the honest importer.

Now, sir, the proposition to which I wish to address myself is that of the third section of the bill, which my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] denounces as almost, though I think not quite, an attack upon the Constitution of the United States, and especially an attack upon the rights of citizens of the United States.

In order that the House may understand it I ask the Clerk to read the provisions of the present law found in the second section of the act of March 2, 1867. This is the existing law touching the seizure of books and papers, which we propose to repeal absolutely.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whenever it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the judge of the district court for any district in the United States, by complaint and affidavit, that any fraud on the revenue has been committed by any person or persons interested, or in any way engaged in the importation or entry of merchandise at any port within such district, said judge shall forthwith issue his warrant directed to the marshal of the district, requiring said marshal, by himself or deputy, to enter any place or premises where any invoices, books, or papers are deposited relating to the merchandise in respect to which such fraud is alleged to have been committed, and to take possession of such books or papers and produce them before the said judge; and any invoices, books, or papers so seized shall be subject to the order of said judge, who shall allow the examination of the same by the collector of customs of the port into which the alleged fraudulent importation shall have been made, or by any officer duly authorized by said collector. And such invoices, books, or papers may be retained by said judge as long as in his opinion the retention thereof may be necessary; but no warrant for such seizure shall be issued, unless the complainant shall set forth the character of the fraud alleged, the nature of the same, and the importations in respect to which it was committed and the papers to be seized. And the warrant issued on such complaint, with report of service and proceedings thereon, shall be returned as other warrants to the court of the district within which such judge presides.

Mr. KASSON. That, Mr. Speaker, is the provision of the present law under which whenever a judge is applied to he may issue his warrant to a marshal of the United States directing him to enter the premises described, and to seize the books, papers, and invoices referred to. Under this provision of law the largest portion of the complaints have arisen—not so much in consequence of the execution of the law, (though I hold it to be an obnoxious law and one which ought to be repealed,) but rather because the subordinate officers of the customs have gone into counting-rooms with this law in their hands and the merchants of New York, many of whom believed there was no dishonesty in their books, have said to the officer, "There is no need of taking out a warrant; you may have these books and examine them." Under these circumstances, obtaining possession of these books without a warrant, the officers have, as in the case of Phelps, Dodge & Co., held on to those books; they have explored their pages from beginning to end; they have examined everything in detail; and they have thus found technical frauds, (not frauds in intent,) under which fines and forfeitures amounting in the aggregate to enormous sums have grown up, and the payment of which they have claimed. Thus under the administration of this law, both through the judge and without the judge, it has become absolutely offensive and a stench in the nostrils of New York and other mercantile cities of this country.

Now, sir, we propose to repeal that provision; and instead of that law under which books have been taken and held for months—have been taken by consent to avoid the enforcement of the law—this bill proposes to do what? It provides that when a suit has been commenced—the existing law does not require a suit at law—when a suit shall have been commenced notice may then be issued by the attorney representing the United States to the merchant, telling him to produce in court specified books, papers, and invoices, being limited to business books and papers exclusively; and when produced in court they may be subjected to the examination of the prosecuting attorney of the United States, and evidence furnished by them may be used, not in criminal actions but in civil.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is said that this is an outrage; yet every lawyer on this floor knows that by a subpœna duces tecum you compel witnesses to bring such books into court; every lawyer knows that there is a process by which, through a bill of discovery, you compel a party to produce papers in his possession. Every lawyer knows that the law could not be enforced in many cases without the ability to require the production of books and papers. Taking this into view it is proposed here not to leave the court in one State to say that a subpœna duces tecum shall be issued; or the court in another State to resort to a bill of discovery. We do not propose to adopt either of these different modes of practice which are slow and ineffective, which delay justice and often enable a dishonest man to import his goods fraudulently to the ruin of the honest competing merchant.

Mr. TREMAIN. Is it not a familiar rule of evidence that both in civil actions for a penalty and in an equity proceeding by bill of discovery the defendant can never be required to produce books or give evidence that may tend to charge him with a penalty or forfeiture?

Mr. KASSON. I do not know the rule to be as broad as that. I leave it to be discussed by lawyers. I do know that since 1789 you have had upon your statute-books, not merely to enforce penalties and forfeitures in favor of the United States, but to protect honest merchants against dishonest merchants, a law that was intended to accomplish the same purpose. I send to the Clerk to be read the fifteenth section of the judiciary act of 1789. I do not want this House to be misled on the subject of books and papers by a supposition that this committee has recommended to the House a new, wild, unjust provision for the attainment of justice. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That all the said courts of the United States shall have power in the trial of actions at law, on motion and due notice thereof being given, to require the parties to produce books or writings in their possession or power which contain evidence pertinent to the issue, in cases and under circumstances where they might be compelled to produce the same by the ordinary rules of proceeding in chancery; and if a plaintiff shall fail to comply with such order to produce books or writings, it shall be lawful for the courts respectfully, on motion, to give the like judgment for defendant as in cases of non-suit; and if a defendant shall fail to comply with such order to produce books or writings, it shall be lawful for the courts respectfully, on motion as aforesaid, to give judgment against him or her by default.

Mr. KASSON. Now, sir, observe in all "actions at law" where if in chancery it could be reached by bill of discovery. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] refers to the common-law rule as if it was not within the promise of a statute to change the common-law rule of evidence.

More than that, under the statutes now in force, an oath from the importer is required that if he shall come into possession of any other and different invoice from that which he has already offered at the custom-house he shall bring that voluntarily to the custom-house and give notice of it. Now you say, though your law compels him to do this and subject it to your inspection, if by the next steamer there comes an invoice showing fraud in the first one, yet he shall not be obliged to produce the second one in a court of justice when your law has made him swear he will offer it to the collector as soon as it comes.

Mr. Speaker, I ask you what security exists for an honest importer if you give no means for ascertaining the misconduct of his dishonest competitor? If he is so bold in it that he preserves the dangerous files among his own papers, should he not be made to show them? It is not a question merely between the United States and the importer with respect to the revenue laws, but it is a question of honesty or dishonesty; and the evidence before our committee showed repeated cases where one invoice was presented at the custom-house, when another and different invoice was on file in the counting-room which they had promised to present at the custom-house, but had not done it.

Whatever the common-law rule may be, we have the right by statute to say what may be introduced as evidence before the court. The only question is whether the mode provided by this bill reported by the Committee on Ways and Means can operate harshly upon the honest man. If it operates upon the dishonest man harshly, let gentlemen get up and make their objections on that ground.

Do they say it is unconstitutional? I tell them, Mr. Speaker, a court of the United States, since this investigation commenced, has declared even that law which we now repeal, the law of 1867—has declared that law constitutional and valid; and if that law be valid in the opinion of a court of the United States, I ask you if this simple and uniform mode of getting access to and of producing the books and papers is not much more a valid and just provision of law?

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is about all there is to be said on that section unless this House is willing to decide that you shall have no means whatever of getting access to those books and papers. And remember, under the present law in respect to ad valorem duties the merchant must add carriage, he must add price of boxes, he must add even telegrams, he must add drayage, he must add an infinite number of odious things in order to get the ad valorem valuation and upon that pay the duty. Now these things are found——

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I wish to ask the gentleman a question on the point on which he now is, and the question I wish to ask is this: Suppose the United States attorney applies to the court saying he believes a certain letter, if produced, will show the defendant was guilty of some fraud or misstatement about his invoice, and the judge thereupon holds the defendant must produce that letter and determines the defendant's failure to produce it is not reasonable. Now, this statute in that case says the fact which the district attorney charges shall be taken as admitted absolutely. It does not go to the jury. Now have you not transferred the control of that question of fact from the jury to the judge in that way, in spite of the provision of the Constitution which says in all cases exceeding twenty dollars trial by jury shall be preserved?

Let me restate my question in other words. Do you not make the decision of a judge about a fact in dispute between a defendant and the Government conclusive on the question of fact by holding that the allegations shall be taken as admitted unless the judge is satisfied with the explanation of the failure to produce the books?

Mr. KASSON. The objection, if I understand it fully, made by the gentleman is more subtile than it is valid. I doubt if there is a State in the Union in which a similar provision of law is not found—that where you have traced into the possession of the defendant an important paper and he is unwilling to produce it, and does not produce it, I doubt if there is a State in the Union where in such a case the adversary's statement of its contents is not at once admitted as evidence in support of the charge.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. That is, only as evidence to go to the jury. It is not conclusive.

Mr. KASSON. Then I will come back to a higher authority than statutes of States of the Union—to the judiciary act of 1789, in which the precise principle of a judgment to be rendered on default is incorporated. I read from that act:

And if a plaintiff shall fail to comply with such order to produce books or writings, it shall be lawful for the courts respectively, on motion, to give the like judgment for the defendant as in cases of nonsuit.

There is no submission to the jury. The fact that the party is in default and does not explain the reason for the default is the reason why the courts hold this penalty over him of a judgment against him if he does not produce his books.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I desire to ask the gentleman a question, for I do not know that there will be any opportunity for discussion. Is not this section 3 more objectionable than the gentleman from Massachusetts states it? That gentleman puts it that judgment comes by the holding of the court. Now, is it not even more than that? Does not the section provide that on an application of a district attorney, without any discretion on the part of the court, the process shall issue, and if the papers are not produced that there shall be at once default? There is not even any holding or decision on the part of a court.

Mr. KASSON. I would like the gentleman to put an interrogation mark at the end of his speech. I would not otherwise know it to be a question.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The question is, does not this section leave it entirely under the control of the district attorney?

Mr. KASSON. I refer the gentleman most respectfully for an answer to his question to a bill "to amend the customs-revenue laws and to repeal moieties," where it is all written out in full, the bill simply declaring that the court is to issue the notice to the defendant or claimant to produce the book.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. And it says that the court "shall issue;" it does not say that in his discretion he may issue.

Mr. KASSON. Of course he shall issue, as it is the duty of all courts to issue process when proper application is made for it. But more than that, it does not say that the court is to give judgment, but that when the party fails to produce the book or to explain his failure, that allegation which has been called to his notice, of which he has been particularly notified, shall be taken to be true. There is no judgment of the court upon it. That allegation then goes to the jury.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Is there any point in this section where the discretion of the court comes in at all? I wish the gentleman to state it fairly.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] complained of discretion being given to the court and none to the jury, and now the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] complains that there is no discretion on the part of the court.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. There is none, either of the court or of the jury.

Mr. KASSON. I must ask my friend to study it more carefully in order that he may comprehend what the effect of this third section is.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have studied it very carefully.

Mr. KASSON. The provision is—

That in all suits or proceedings other than criminal.

That is the starting-point. In such suits, other than criminal, the attorney representing the Government may call for any business book, invoice, or paper belonging to or under the control of the defendant or claimant. That is a preliminary. This book or paper must be particularly described. The notice must contain the allegation which the attorney expects to prove by it. The notice must be served either personally or as original notices of suits are served upon which judgment is to be rendered against him. And if with all these guards the defendant fails to produce the book or paper and fails utterly to explain the reason why he does not, then the allegation that is brought home to his notice is taken to be true.

Why, Mr. Speaker, what is your judgment by default in all the courts of this country? What is the provision of this law upon which the judgment itself is rendered in cases of default, except that where you have brought your charge to the notice of the defendant, and he fails to respond or come into court and say why judgment should not be given against him, then judgment goes against him. Will you not allow evidence in the case to be presumed against him under like circumstances, when in every court of the Union you allow an entire judgment to go against him in case of default? I have spoken longer than I meant on this section. I only ask the House to remember that they must for the protection of honest importers give us some means to get hold of the frauds perpetrated to their injury. Gentlemen who are members of the Committee on Ways and Means will not deny for a moment that from the evidence before us we found that there were enormous evasions of duties, and that papers which ought to be submitted to the customs officers are not so submitted. No one can deny that under the present law the Government has a right to the invoices, and has a right to require the party to produce them, or to suffer default if he does not do so. I submit, in all earnestness, in behalf of the honest importers of New York, that we cannot with justice to them or to the Government surrender to these parties the right to require them to produce the necessary papers. I call further attention to the fact that the honest importer could have no fear in producing at reasonable times his papers or books, which show that his transactions have been correct and just.

Leaving that question, I only desire to call attention to one further point to which my colleagues on the committee have perhaps not given as much attention as it deserves. My friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] charges that the third section trenches on the Constitution. I should like gentlemen on this floor to look at the twelfth section of this bill, and to ask whether some of us are not justified in dissenting from the provisions of that section also. I will ask the Clerk to read the first eight lines of the section, which will be found on page 8 of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That any merchandise entered by any person or persons violating any of the provisions of the preceding section, but not subject to forfeiture under the same section, may, while owned by him or them, or while in his or their possession, be taken by the collector and held as security for the payment of any fine or fines incurred as aforesaid, or may be levied upon and sold on execution to satisfy any judgment recovered for such fine or fines.

Mr. KASSON. Now I call the attention of the gentlemen who are so fearful lest we are doing injustice to some parties in requiring them to produce honest books, or, if you please, dishonest books and papers, to the fact that they make no dissent, no charge against this section, and yet what does it do? It says that if I have shipped goods from England to John Smith, a commission merchant in New York, and in entering them John Smith in New York makes a fraudulent or erroneous entry, and incurs a fine or forfeiture on that entire invoice, and you, Mr. Speaker, make another shipment from London to the same John Smith in New York, which is duly entered, and there is no fine or forfeiture incurred, then if in the mean time they have found out that on my entry a fine or forfeiture was incurred, your goods to double the amount of mine may be seized and held as security, and sold on execution to satisfy the United States for my account. I know of no principle of constitutional right that can justify you in taking my property to pay your debts, or in taking your property to pay my debts. On the constitutional question let gentlemen point to that provision of the Constitution which gives to a court of the United States the right to take my property to pay your fine, penalty, or forfeiture. I commend the clause of the twelfth section which has been read to the judgment of the House, and if there be opportunity I shall be glad to move to strike out the words "or while in his or their possession," in the fourth and fifth lines, in order that the provision may be confined to the property that is owned by him or them, and which is, therefore, justly liable for the amount of the forfeiture to the Government, inasmuch as it will belong to the same ownership which was liable in the former instance. I know of no merchant that wishes this done. I know of no man in the country who desires to establish the principle of seizing one man's property to pay the debts of another.

Having spoken upon this point, I believe I have spoken on the only objectionable point in the bill to which, as a member of the committee, I give so much importance as to desire to call the attention of the House to it. I should have been glad if the Committee on Ways and Means had been entirely unanimous in all the features of the bill, and if my colleagues had made no point on the third section I do not know that I should have felt it to be my duty to make one on the twelfth section. But I do deem it, in comparison with the third section, of vastly more importance than that. The third section is harmonious with our legislation from the act of 1789 down to the present time, so far as the principle of it is concerned.

A few words now as to the general features of the bill. The evils which have called for this investigation, and the outrages which have made our blood boil, are partly owing to some honest gentlemen of New York, as honest, honorable men, I believe, as stand on the soil of the United States, who have allowed themselves to be cowed by the authority of the minor officers of the United States Government. They should have come to Congress early and promptly, or they should have gone, as one of them at least did, to the Secretary of the Treasury and said to him, "Sir, your subordinates are attempting to perpetrate an outrage upon me."

One of them went there, and he says that Mr. BOUTWELL received him kindly and offered him every justice and gave him every facility. And yet under the terror of this one-man power in New York, surrounded by the influences of which he speaks, he refused to litigate and finally voluntarily paid the sum of $271,000. I said to him, or in his presence, as I say here, that that was his fault; that his firm should have had the courage to stand up for their rights, and put these petty tyrants under their feet.

Now if, as has been said, any of these corrupt officials have been retained in any Department of the Government of the United States, I charge the responsibility where it belongs; not on the minor men, but on the chiefs. When the chiefs of this Government knew that these men were extorting hundreds and thousands of dollars unjustly from the merchants of New York, I ask why the order did not issue from the Department requiring those cases to be brought before the Secretary of the Treasury, or dismissing the official who refused to obey that order? When you put before a man of small means the temptation of $10,000, $50,000, or $100,000, and then by your laws give him power to act tyrannously, I ask if you are to blame exclusively the man of minor power and minor position? Let the responsibility be shared between your law that permitted this to be done and the heads of the Department who tolerated if they did not encourage this action. Jayne and the others of them did what the law seems to have allowed them to do; and the law is responsible and the men who kept them in office, after they had used their power so tyrannously.

Now we propose to repeal those laws; we propose to reduce these temptations. We attempt no longer to make it for the special interest of the officers of the Government to carry out the laws of the country; but they are to administer them solely for the purpose of gathering and collecting the revenues, influenced only by the amount of the salaries allowed them. If they are in the employ of the Government, whether high or low, we do not leave them one penny in the way of moieties, not one penny in the way of reward. The theory of the bill is right. The officer who holds an appointment under the Government is bound to give the Government his best services.

But I fear the result in practice; I fear that in flying from one set of evils we will encounter others. Perhaps I should be wanting in my duty in speaking on behalf of the report of the committee in this respect if I did not call the attention of the House to the fact that about 1846 you were for three and a half years without a law that allowed to either officers or informers any moieties of the penalties, fines, and forfeitures recovered. The court construed a law of the United States as abolishing all moieties. During the three and a half years previous to that construction of the court the amount yielded by fines, forfeitures, and penalties was in round numbers $82,000. During the three and a half years from the time the decision of the court took effect, construing the law against moieties, the fines, forfeitures, and penalties yielded only $8,000 in round numbers. Then the construction of the law was changed; fines, forfeitures, and penalties were restored, and in the following three and a half years they rose to $56,000.

I say it is my duty to call the attention of this body to this fact, which was testified before the committee. Yet I am not willing by reason of this to restore the old condition of things. My only question was whether in taking away these moieties from every officer who passed judgment on the acts of the merchant we did not go far enough, and whether we ought not to leave a subordinate officer the encouragement of a moderate reward to stimulate his diligence. The committee have decided that it was wiser to take it away from all officers and employés and give it only to the outsiders disconnected with the Government. I stand with the committee, rather than make any issue here, having been heard in the committee as to the safer mode, in the interests of the public service as well as in the interests of the merchants of New York.

Now, these are the general objects of this bill. But I fear greatly that in the extreme action produced by our indignation at the outrages perpetrated we may go, by reaction, too far the other way, unless the sober judgment of this body shall be brought to bear upon the provisions of this bill. I am myself satisfied that our bill goes as far, taken as a whole, in the direction of removing guards of the revenue, removing the securities imposed by law and regulation, as it is safe for the House to go, and I trust no part of the bill will be stricken out that tends to secure the Government and the rights of the honest importer.

Mr. BURCHARD obtained the floor.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

Mr. PLATT, of New York, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, submitted a report upon the subject of a subsidy to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company; which was ordered to be printed and recommitted.

MOIETIES.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill relating to moieties.

Mr. BURCHARD. I do not intend to detain the House by discussing the general features of the pending measure. I desire more particularly to call attention to the section just discussed by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] and in regard to which there is an amendment pending. At first I was inclined to believe that in repealing the law authorizing the seizure of books and papers there should be some provision which would allow the Government officer prosecuting these claims the right to inspect the papers by which the Government must prove its case. But in examining the statutes in existence prior to the passage of the law of 1868 permitting the seizure of books and papers, I found that the prosecuting officer, the district attorney, had the right in a suit for the recovery of duties to require the party defendant to produce the books and papers which he deemed necessary to establish his suit, although he could not do it in a case of forfeiture. The act of 1863 allows the United States prosecuting officer to require the production or rather the seizure of books and papers for any purpose.

The difference between the law of 1789, which was in force prior to the act of 1863, and which would be again in force if we repeal the act of 1863—the difference between that law and this bill if section 3 should be adopted is that under this section the United States will be permitted to require the production of books and papers in an effort to establish a forfeiture and in case of a suit for a penalty. If we adopt the bill as it stands with section 3, we must repeal a statute of the United States enacted in 1867 which seems to have been well considered and which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

No answer or other pleading of any party, and no discovery or evidence obtained by means of any judicial proceeding from any party or witness in this or any foreign country, shall be given in evidence or in any manner used against such party or witness or his property or estates, in any court of the United States or in any proceeding by or before any officer of the United States, in respect to any crime or for the enforcement of any penalty or forfeiture by reason of any act or omission of such party or witness: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to exempt any party or witness from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed by him in discovering or testifying as aforesaid.

Mr. BURCHARD. The House will observe that under the law just read no evidence obtained from a party or witness by means of a judicial proceeding can be given in evidence or in any manner used against his property or estate in any court of the United States in any criminal proceeding, or for the enforcement of any penalty or forfeiture. That provision was enacted by Congress and established as a general principle to cover all cases. Now shall we adopt this measure and make an exception in the case of a prosecution to enforce a suit for a forfeiture in revenue cases? If we repeal the act of 1863, in regard to seizures of books and papers, the United States in a suit for duties has an adequate and a better remedy by virtue of the provisions of the judiciary act of 1789 than we give by this third section. It can under penalty of a judgment by confession enforce the production of books and papers. I therefore see no necessity for the adoption of the third section to aid the Government in ordinary actions, such as suits for duties. Does the House desire to repeal the provision of law just read and to which I called attention? Will it require a person to furnish evidence to be used against himself in the enforcement of a forfeiture?

I admit the force of the consideration so strongly presented by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] that the twelfth section of this bill includes a provision which is equally severe; and I hope that an opportunity will be given to vote upon an amendment which will remove the ground of criticism against that section—an amendment, in other words, to strike out so much of the section as authorizes the seizure of another man's goods and property for the violation of law, or the penalty that may have been incurred by the consignee of the goods. It seems to me that this is a harsh proceeding, and that it is sufficient that the goods of the owner should be seized for a penalty or a violation of the law to which he is liable.

Many of the very excellent provisions of this bill which have been very ably and clearly discussed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS,] my colleague on the committee, are as he has stated similar to those in the customs laws of Great Britain. I should have preferred, for one, that the committee had gone further in that direction, abolished the whole system of custom-house oaths; that they had been satisfied with the provision of the English system that requires the unsworn declaration or statement of the importer. It should be sufficient with adequate penalties for false statement. "Custom-house oaths" have become a by-word. They are generally of no force or validity except by reason of the penalties to be incurred and the indictment that may be presented against the importer for taking a false oath. We scarcely ever hear of an indictment or conviction for perjury of those who have sworn to false entries. There may be such convictions; gentlemen from commercial cities are of course more familiar with these matters than I am. But Great Britain, profiting from her experience, has abolished the whole system of custom-house oaths; I see no advantage in adhering to them. The committee have deemed it advisable not to be too radical but to be careful to adopt only such necessary and pressing amendments as would obviate the harshest features of the existing law.

There is another suggestion that may occur to gentlemen in considering this bill. Why should any moieties be allowed to any one, either in cases of fraudulent importation or in cases of smuggling? If the system of stimulating the officer to do his duty by giving him a share of the penalty is wrong, corrupting, injurious to the public service, why not abolish the whole system? But I will say in behalf of the committee that this measure of reform is in the right direction, and therefore I most heartily and cordially support the bill. I do not desire to antagonize any of its features, although it might be improved in that direction. It is a bill that will remove some of the harshness of the existing law, not only as designed in its enactment but also as interpreted by the courts and revenue officers. Not deeming it necessary to discuss the necessity of the bill, or the evidence that has been presented, or the provisions of the old law, but merely to call attention to these two or three points upon which there is an antagonism, and upon which there are pending amendments, I leave the question for other gentlemen to discuss.

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Speaker, in the division of the work which has necessarily devolved upon the Committee on Ways and Means, I have not been required to look especially into the bill now pending nor have I performed any important service in preparing it. That duty was devolved upon other gentlemen as a sub-committee; and the bill reported is substantially the work of that sub-committee. Nor does my place of residence and the little experience which I have had in connection with these matters make me especially familiar with this class of legislation; and from the isolated position of my district, its citizens have no interest in this measure which is not common to every other interior district of the United States. I have long since been brought to realize, however, that in framing a law for the collection of the revenue, whether it be customs revenue or internal revenue, so as to make that law efficient for the collection of the revenue, it is very difficult to avoid trenching upon the rights of private citizens. Hence there is no duty devolved upon the Government, either State or national, which is more delicate than the one which provides for taxation in all its forms.

I entered upon the investigation which resulted in the reporting of this bill with a full realization of this fact, without any prejudice against the law or the precise operation of the law, desirous only to make myself familiar with the law before the investigation was concluded, and to satisfy myself whether any additional legislation was needed on the question or not.

The fact has been impressed on my mind that the machinery of existing laws is of more remarkable character in many respects than is elsewhere to be found on the statute-books of the country. Even the laws enacted during the war for the prosecution of that war, which have always been regarded by men in my peculiar position as extra-constitutional and conceded to be of doubtful constitutionality I believe by everybody on both sides of the House, were not more extraordinary in their character in many respects than the law proposed to be repealed by the bill under consideration. As the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] well said, it may be considered one of the outgrowths of legislation from the peculiar condition in which the country found itself when this law was enacted in 1863.

The importing merchants of this country, those especially interested in this legislation, can fully appreciate and realize the force of the remark which the present Chief Magistrate of the United States made in his inaugural address, certainly in one of his first communications to the public after he came into office, that in order to demonstrate the evils of a bad law, or in other words to satisfy the country a law is bad, is to rigidly enforce it, thereby securing its repeal. From 1863 this law remained on the statute-book, not exactly a dead letter, but enforced in such a way as not to attract any special attention.

No cases of special hardship have been brought to the attention of the committee during these years under the administration of Secretary McCulloch and Secretary Chase. In 1869, after the present Administration came into power, the necessary machinery for the full execution of this law was put in force. Special Treasury agents, detectives under the Treasury Department, were all assigned to duty at the principal ports of the country, and especially at the great port of New York, charged with the special duty of enforcing this law to the letter. The result has been the enormities of the law have been brought to the public attention and have culminated in a demand for its repeal.

I concur most heartily in all the provisions of the bill, and especially that provision which repeals all moieties, which takes away from the officer the incentive to seize upon, to pounce upon, the importing merchants for slight and trivial offenses, and to wreak upon them unusual penalties out of all proportion to the nature of the offense. I believe, sir, it is the duty of this Government and the duty of all governments which claim to be free and honest and desire to be so considered, that they shall provide the necessary officers to execute whatever laws may be passed on the subject of taxation or any other subject, and those officers should receive a fixed compensation, or compensation of some sort ascertained by law. They should have no compensation beyond that fixed salary for public service. If there be any extra compensation allowed to them it should be from the Treasury, from the same source from which they receive their salaries. No principle has been brought to my mind upon which the moiety feature in the present law can be defended.

The law for the seizure of books and papers of citizens is anomalous in its character, and trenches, I think, upon the constitutional rights of the citizen. It has been executed in some cases involving great hardship and by methods entirely indefensible. It is a violation of what we all understand to be the rights of all American citizens, compelling them in fact to provide testimony for their own conviction, not only directly in civil cases but indirectly in criminal cases.

The committee have reported a section in the bill which repeals that provision of the law. But it provides a substitute to which I am also opposed. I do not pretend to say that in any case or in many cases the substitute would operate as a hardship. But it is unusual and contrary to the ordinary course of things. I would prefer that the Government should be left to find its own testimony in all cases as a private citizen is left to find his testimony in suits with other private citizens. I ask the Clerk to read this section that it may appear in the RECORD and be brought more closely to the attention of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That in all suits and proceedings other than criminal arising under any of the revenue laws of the United States, the attorney representing the Government, whenever, in his belief, any business book, invoice, or paper, belonging to or under the control of the defendant or claimant, will tend to prove any allegation made by the United States, may make a written motion particularly describing such book, invoice, or paper, and setting forth the allegation which he expects to prove; and thereupon the court in which suit or proceeding is pending shall issue a notice to the defendant or claimant to produce such book, invoice, or paper in court at a day and hour to be specified in said notice, which, together with a copy of said motion, shall be served formally on the defendant or claimant by the United States marshal by delivering to him a certified copy thereof, or otherwise serving the same as original notices of subpœna in the same court are served; and if the defendant or claimant shall fail to produce such book, invoice, or paper in obedience to such notice, the allegations stated in the said motion shall be taken as confessed unless his failure to produce the same shall be explained to the satisfaction of the court. And the said attorney shall be permitted to make examination of said book, invoice, or paper, if produced, and may offer the same in evidence on behalf of the United States. But the owner of said books and papers, his agent or attorney, shall have free access to them at all reasonable times pending their custody by the court.

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Speaker, it will be seen by reading this section that the United States attorney has only to allege that certain books or papers exist containing certain matters which are of importance in the case, and if the party fails to produce those books and papers according to the notice served upon him, these facts are to be taken as confessed against him, unless he is fortunate enough to be able to show that he does not possess such books, or to render some excuse for their non-production which will satisfy the court. This, sir, puts the burden of proof upon the defendant in such a way that is unusual and anomalous. It requires him if there be no such books to prove the fact, which is a proof of a negative character and something that is not usually required in legal proceedings. In other words, it changes the burden of proof often to the prejudice of the citizen, and if a motion shall be submitted to strike out this section, as I presume there will, I shall feel compelled to vote to strike it out.

There is one other feature of this bill to which I desire to call attention, and I shall then yield the floor, as I do not wish to occupy much of the time of the House at this late hour of the evening. In lieu of the moieties it is provided that compensation may be paid to informers under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. This is similar to a provision which we now have in regard to the collection of internal-revenue taxes, with respect to information furnished by outside parties in cases which have not been brought to the attention of the ordinary revenue officers But, sir, these two branches of the public service are, in many respects, different. All the customs revenues, or nearly all, are collected at a very few ports in the country. Very much the largest amount—I believe two-thirds or three-fourths of the whole—is collected at the city of New York. I am apprehensive that this provision will be the means of building a sort of outside power in which some of these ex-detectives and ex-special Treasury agents, and others now expert in this business of protecting fraud, will become the managing men and the officers, and that most of the money here provided for will go into their pockets.

I am not prepared to go against this feature of the bill, but I do want to express my apprehension that it may not work well, and to call the attention of the House to it that it may be carefully considered. Under other circumstances I might not feel so apprehensive, but I have a strong impression that it will soon become the business of a class of men that we are trying to get rid of, by the legislation which we have now under consideration; and that we will hear from the gentlemen again in a different relation to the importing merchants, but still often very much to his annoyance and sometimes to the hinderance of public justice. But, sir, I will not occupy the attention of the House much longer. I now yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER.]

Mr. POTTER. I have not had the advantage of hearing all the debate which has taken place on this very interesting bill, having been detained during the early hours of the day in the Judiciary Committee, but I have listened with interest to what I have heard on the subject since I came into the House, and I agree with my colleague [Mr. WOOD] and the other gentlemen who have followed him in addressing the House, that this bill is far from perfect. At the same time I appreciate the difficulties of the subject with which the bill deals. I have myself heard from merchants in New York such views as those which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] has expressed, as to the danger to which honest importers would be exposed from flinging the doors too wide open in the regulations to prevent frauds in the importation of foreign goods, and thereby subjecting honest merchants to an unequal competition with the dishonest.

In regard to the third section to which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] called attention, I think myself, that if that section provided that when the party complained of was charged with having in his possession books and papers which could throw light on the transaction in question and would not produce them, and the refusal should be submitted to the jury to determine what effect in deciding the case the non-production of such books or papers should have, it would be an improvement on the provision reported. Such a provision would, it seems to me, answer all the purposes of protecting the Government, while it would relieve the bill from the objections suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] to any measure so severe as this which provides that if the defendant does not produce the books or papers required by the court he shall be held to have admitted as absolutely true that their contents are what the Government alleges them to be.

Mr. POLAND. If the gentleman will allow me, I will have read an amendment which I propose to that section.

Mr. POTTER. If the gentleman from Vermont will kindly wait until I conclude, as I shall be very brief, I should prefer it. I do not doubt we shall agree about his amendment.

But whatever may be the imperfection of this bill, it is at least certain that this bill is a great improvement on the existing laws which it proposes to repeal. I do not know of anybody who will now raise his voice in defense of the existing laws; nobody so far has yet done so in this debate, and I understand that there is no member of the Committee on Ways and Means, of whatever politics, that does not favor their repeal. And yet these are not new laws. The evils complained of in respect of them are not new. These laws have been in operation and in extended operation for many years, and the evils existing under them have been felt, and very onerously felt certainly in that portion of the country where I reside. The reason why there has been no general complaint to Congress in respect of them may partly be, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] has suggested, that these laws were never before so earnestly and oppressively enforced as under the present Administration, but partly, also, because of the apprehensions men naturally have of being engaged in any contest with the Government, in which they may be publicly charged with fraud, from the fear that they may thus bring upon themselves suspicion and discredit which may involve them in business and financial embarrassments.

This apprehension was, I think, intensified by the fact that during the war we had come in this country to have exaggerated notions of the power of the Federal Government, so that if you wanted to condemn a man, all you had to do was to charge him with being disloyal. The little bell was rung so much and so frequently, both here and in other parts of the country, that men came naturally to have great sensitiveness about any conflict with the Federal authorities. I am glad to believe that that excessive apprehension is wearing away. Such a condition of things—I mean one in which men submit to extortion rather than contest with their Government for their just rights—is certainly a very sad condition of things. It cannot but lead to corruption and abuse; because when a man, finding the officers of the Government coming down on him and extorting what he ought not to pay, feels satisfied that he cannot get justice by resisting, he is too apt to think himself justified in entering into compromises and improper relations with the officials with whom he has to deal, and thus is led into corrupt and dangerous practices. This is an unfortunate condition of things, and one that ought not to exist, and yet when the laws are improperly framed one which is much more likely to exist in this country than in most others, because in this country the people have never suffered from oppression. There have been no privileged castes or classes in this country, and no absolute rulers; so that, not being long subjected to oppression, the people have never been, as in older countries, induced to form combinations to resist such oppression. Gentlemen will recollect that in the Middle Ages guilds of the different trades were formed to protect those trades, so that if one of the guild was wronged or oppressed there might be a combined effort of all the trade to defend him against those who would wrong him. In this country we have never felt the need of such combinations, and the result has been that in this country of all countries in the world the Government can in many respects oppress its citizens more and with less opportunity for redress than in almost any other of the great nations.

Nevertheless it did happen in this case, and that is what I desire to call attention to, that when the merchants of New York and the other principal ports thought it time to make a combined and earnest stand against the internal-revenue, seizure, and moiety laws which oppressed them and brought their complaints to Congress and earnestly and unitedly demanded redress, they at once commanded attention, so that the Committee on Ways and Means are now unanimous in asking the repeal of the existing objectionable legislation. Sir, those laws have been in operation for years, and if there has been no combined outcry against them, it is not because men have not suffered before; but because men have not made common cause in their resistance to these laws have preferred to buy relief from unjust exactions to complaining of and exposing them. But no sooner have they energetically resisted than the result has been that Congress responds to their call for a removal of these evils. And so it will always be. As the country increases, as its numbers and interests become greater and more conflicting, the necessity for men to combine for their own protection and to give attention to the conduct and affairs of Government will increase also. Indeed some attention to public affairs becomes every year more and more the duty of all citizens.

There was a time when the people could afford to let the Government do pretty much as it pleased and pay no attention to the action of the State or Federal Legislatures, because Government was not likely in so sparse and poor a country to do anything to seriously interfere with their ordinary rights and avocations. But as the country gets richer and greater, it will be more and more found that the legislation of Congress and of the States does directly affect the citizen; and therefore it becomes more and more the interest and the duty of the citizen to give due attention to legislation, and when that legislation is injurious to combine with those of the same class and like affected by it to seek to have it corrected. And I think we shall omit one of the lessons arising out of this occasion if we do not bear in mind how immediately when there is a combined complaint on the part of the citizens affected, Congress has set itself in motion to correct the abuses which have been existing for years, and which ought to have been abolished long ago, and how there may be great abuses for years going on which will only be corrected by the united action of those injured. Sir, I hope these seizure and moiety experiences will impress upon Congress the danger and evil of such severe and reckless legislation, and upon the merchants of the country the duty and the necessity of setting themselves in motion to demand relief from Congress when such great abuses exist, instead of submitting to extortion and trying each man to buy peace for himself.

It has been too long the fashion to speak of attention to politics and public affairs as if it was a discreditable business, to be abandoned to those who follow it for profit only. But in fact no great nation can go on prosperously with all its best citizens ignoring public affairs. And just as its wealth and numbers increase and the interests of its people become more conflicting, does the necessity and duty of all good citizens to give attention to public affairs increase also. I do not believe that in any other great nation the abuses arising out of the legislation about to be repealed would have been so quietly submitted to, and I am most glad that they are at last likely to come to an end.

APPOINTMENTS ON COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, announced the following appointments:

Mr. HAGANS, to fill a vacancy upon the Committee on the District of Columbia; and

Mr. BARBER, as an additional member of the Committee on War Claims.

MOIETIES.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill in regard to moieties.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I understand that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is willing to withdraw his amendment of which he gave notice this morning.

Mr. BECK. I have been advised by the gentleman in charge of this bill that the amendment which I offered might embarrass its passage. I regard the bill as too important to run any risk of any sort, and as it is his opinion that my amendment would embarrass the bill, I propose to withdraw it, and to offer it as an amendment to the bill accompanying the report on the Sanborn contract, when that report is made from the Committee on Ways and Means, the gentleman in charge having agreed to give me an opportunity to offer it.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. That amendment having been withdrawn, I withdraw the motion to recommit, and call the previous question.

Mr. NIBLACK. I understand that the hour following the order for the previous question will be occupied in debate. I ask the gentleman if he proposes to call for a vote on the bill to-night?

Mr. POLAND. I ask the gentleman from New York to yield to me for an amendment.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I will do so.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend section 3 by striking out the words "the allegations stated in the said motion shall be taken as confessed unless his failure to produce the same shall be explained to the satisfaction of the court," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "or explain satisfactorily why he does not or cannot produce the same, the neglect or refusal to produce may be weighed and considered as evidence against such defendant or claimant;" so that portion of the section will read as follows:

> And if the defendant or claimant shall fail to produce such book, invoice, or paper in obedience to such notice, or explain satisfactorily why he does not or cannot produce the same, the neglect or refusal to produce may be weighed and considered as evidence against such defendant or claimant.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I will allow that amendment to be offered and be considered as pending.

Mr. KASSON. I ask consent to insert in the third section, after the words "which he expects to prove," the words "by the evidence therein contained."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. In line 10 of that section, instead of the word "shall," I would suggest that the words "may in its discretion" be used, so that it will read: "the court in which suit or proceeding is pending may in its discretion issue a notice," &c.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I cannot yield for that.

Mr. DAWES. If the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] can be adopted now by common consent, I will withdraw my motion to strike out the third section.

Mr. HALE, of Maine, and Mr. BECK objected.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon seconding the previous question.

Mr. NIBLACK. Will the gentleman from New York give some intimation as to what is proposed about the vote upon this bill?

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I propose to yield the bulk of my time to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, [Mr. DAWES,] and it will depend upon him whether the vote be taken to-night or in the morning.

Mr. NIBLACK. We are to have a night session for debate to-night.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I trust the gentleman will not object to ordering the previous question now.

Mr. NIBLACK. I do not; but I want it understood whether we are to have a vote to-night.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon seconding the previous question.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I hope the gentleman from New York will answer the question of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. That can be done afterward.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I now yield fifty minutes of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. ELDREDGE. I hope the gentleman from New York will answer the question of the gentleman from Indiana; or does he refuse to give the House that information?

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman having yielded to me, I will say that I will do just as the House desires; proceed with my remarks to-night or to-morrow.

Mr. NIBLACK. I do not object to the debate going on now; but I want to have it understood that when the debate is over the vote will not be taken to-night. If the gentleman will yield I will move that the House take a recess.

Mr. DAWES. I will yield to enable the gentleman from Indiana to test the sense of the House, saying to the House that I will do in this matter just precisely what the majority may say; either go on to-night or to-morrow. I do not mean, after the elaborate debate that has taken place, to take much of the time of the House to say what I want to say.

Mr. NIBLACK. I move that the House now take a recess until half past seven.

Mr. PARSONS. I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts wants but twenty minutes and that the gentleman from New York does not want to occupy any further time.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. On the contrary, the gentleman from Massachusetts desires fifty minutes.

The question was taken on the motion for a recess; and it was not agreed to, ayes 40, noes not counted.

Mr. DAWES. It is often the fate of the legislator, impelled by the seemingly common sentiment of the country, to undertake a matter of legislative reform, and long before he is able to ripen it into legislation find that the excitement or demand has been crowded out by what seems at the time to be more important business. Six or eight months ago the merchants of the two principal sea-ports of the country, where nine-tenths of all the revenue of the country was collected, were wrought up by the administration of the then existing law to a feeling that the public safety and the liberties of the people, the general good as well as their own rights, demanded a radical reform in the mode and manner of enforcing the revenue laws of the land. As soon as that committee of Congress which has jurisdiction of the matter were able to consider properly and bring before the House of Representatives for their action such reform as the experience of the time seemed to demand, it is seen that to-day with the utmost difficulty my colleagues on the committee, bringing all their ability to bear upon the discussion of this subject, have been able to command the attention of the House to the matter they present, coming as they do at the heel of the session, when business crowds upon us, and anxiety for adjournment makes us unwilling to spend one hour more than absolute necessity may require for the consideration of any subject.

It is under these circumstances that now at this late hour of the day and of this debate, I am called upon by the Committee on Ways and Means to sum up as well as I may this whole matter, and to show the House why the committee propose in the short bill before us measures which, if members have examined them alongside of existing laws and existing interpretations of law, must be seen at once to work a more radical change either for the better or for the worse in the administration of the revenue laws of the country than has been proposed in the last thirty years.

Calling to mind the history of this matter, the House, I think, will do the committee the justice to believe that it is not their fault that this important measure comes here at so late an hour in the session that it seems to the House unnecessary almost to discuss it; so that members are willing to take on faith measures of which I am afraid some of them do not understand the full scope and effect with regard to the national finances and the administration of the law. I say this not because I suppose members are incapable of such understanding or not desirous of it, but because I assume that many members are, as I was myself six months ago, comparatively ignorant of many of the difficulties and complications in which the whole subject is involved.

The House will bear in mind that two or three years ago our attention was called to what seemed to be defects in the administration of the customs laws. The Secretary of the Treasury in 1870 and 1871 called the attention of the House to the fact that while there was general complaint that the officers of the customs were poorly paid, and while there was a desire and seeming necessity that most of them should have their compensation raised, yet under existing laws and modes of administration some of them were receiving enough over and above what he deemed the fair compensation to put the whole customs revenues of the country upon a footing of enlarged and liberal and generous compensation without taking one dollar from the Treasury. He called attention to the fact that in the very year in which he prepared his report, while men upon whose judgment, fidelity, and integrity the appraisement and weighing and other details of the customs revenue depended were getting but $1,200 or $1,500 or $2,000 a year in the cities of Philadelphia, New York, Boston, and San Francisco, yet the collector, the naval officer, and the surveyor of the port of New York were receiving every year more than $50,000 a year over and above the salary fixed by law. He called attention to the fact that such a condition of things demanded the attention of Congress and required some remedy.

The President of the United States in submitting that report to Congress called attention to the same fact and recommended us to consider what remedy should be provided. In the next report of the Secretary of the Treasury was a repetition of the same thing. Three successive reports from the Secretary of the Treasury called our attention to the fact that while certain officers of the customs were receiving enormous, and in some instances almost incredible amounts, others were failing to receive even enough to preserve them from the temptations to dishonesty which beset their paths on every side.

Two years ago I myself called attention to what was the general complaint of the merchants of the cities of New York and Boston, that they were exposed in their private and confidential papers and in the sacredness of their own homes to invasion by Government officers under the forms and pretenses of law; and a bill which received the sanction of the Treasury Department—a measure efficient and stringent enough to answer all the purposes of the Government while meeting all the demands of the merchants as to the protection of their just rights; a measure which thus combined the recommendation of the two interests chiefly concerned—was introduced by myself into this House as a report from a committee and was passed without opposition. When the knowledge of the passage of that bill reached the custom-houses of this country some influence—I know not what it was—put it to sleep, and it is asleep to-day. That same bill was introduced again, was again passed by the House of Representatives, and has gone to the same slumber.

On the second day of this session I introduced into this House a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury to report to the House the result of the administration of the customs laws in fines, penalties, and forfeitures, and whither they had gone, from March 4, 1869, to the 1st of December, 1873; so that the House might see upon paper the fruit of the law which was causing all this complaint—which was breeding or fostering or nursing all the discontent, all the corruption and demoralization with which the custom-house administration reeked from one end of the country to the other. Although that resolution was introduced on the 2d day of December, and although personal application was repeatedly made to those having it in charge, it was not until the 12th of February that we were permitted to see the result. And, sir, what is it? At the port of New York something like three-fourths of all the revenue of the country is paid; at the ports of New York and Boston some seven-eighths of the whole revenue is paid; hence the resolution of inquiry was restricted to those ports. During a period of four years some six or seven hundred million dollars—I have not the exact amount, but I have no doubt the aggregate is about $700,000,000—have been paid through those two custom-houses; and during the same period the machinery of the law that has worked all this complaint has brought into the Treasury, in the enforcement of the collection of duties that had been in the first instance avoided, $158,678.73 in the port of New York, and $21,660.25 in the port of Boston—about $180,000 in all, out of six or seven hundred million dollars. And what has been the cost of collecting this amount of duties, in payment of which there was default? In order to discover and collect this amount the Government had paid beyond the salaries of its officers, $1,020,721.97 at the port of New York and $304,151.31 at the port of Boston. I submit the figures in detail:

Fines, penalties, and forfeitures collected at ports of New York and Boston from March 1, 1869, to November 30, 1873.

	New York.	Boston.
Gross proceeds	$2,280,614 72	$652,892 80
Duties	158,678 73	21,660 25
Costs and expenses	114,081 53	21,831 32
Net amount covered into Treasury	2,007,854 46	609,401 23
Paid to collector	174,127 57	50,816 40
Paid to naval officer	162,286 62	50,817 74
Paid to surveyor	159,376 04	50,817 60
Paid to informers	491,342 26	152,798 18
Total cost	1,101,214 02	377,081 24
Amount retained in Treasury	1,020,721 97	304,151 31
Cost, per cent., of collecting duties, (for each dollar of duty collected)	6 87	14 98

It has cost the Government all the moneys which would otherwise have gone into the Treasury of the United States had men worked for their salaries and not otherwise.

It has cost them for every dollar of that duty in New York City $6.87, and for every dollar of it at Boston, $14.98. How has it been done? It has provided for every delinquency of undervaluation of a single item, no matter whether it be six dollars or six thousand dollars of an invoice, the whole invoice, whether one hundred or one million dollars, shall be forfeited to the Government. What do you do with it when you forfeit it? You put one-half into the Treasury of the United States and take the other half and give one-half to the informer, and take the other half and divide it into three parts and give it to the collector, naval officer, and surveyor of the port; that, although they may be as innocent of any effort either to discover the fraud or enforce the law as you or I; that, though when called upon to appear before the Committee on Ways and Means and show cause, if any existed, why such a law should remain upon the statute-book, they politely informed us so little did they know of the cases that had been administered upon they could throw no light upon it; that, although when the informer came before the committee to vindicate the law, this whole report was taken up and in one after another of these cases he was called upon to tell what the collector of the port had to do with it, or the surveyor of the port, or the naval officer, and one after another of the column of cases, running the finger down the whole column, the universal answer was, "Nothing that I know of."

Mr. NIBLACK. I hope the chairman will yield to me a moment. I omitted to refer to a matter which I intended to notice.

Mr. DAWES. Wait until I get through and then it will come in better.

Mr. NIBLACK. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to a fact which I wish to state.

Mr. DAWES. I have no doubt it will help my speech, and I will be glad to hear it.

Mr. NIBLACK. It did not appear in the testimony, but I have been informed there have been four thousand seizures under this law during the last five years, and of these four thousand seizures only one case has been prosecuted criminally, all the rest having been compromised by the payment of money. It would seem, therefore, the principal object of making these seizures has been to extort money with regard to the criminal acts involved or the perjury involved in making these false invoices. I do not know whether my information is correct, but I state it to call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to the fact.

Mr. DAWES. I wish now to ask the attention of the House to the amount we have been able to find out—I do not mean to say the whole amount which these men have got, but the amount we have been able to find out without their help—that these men have obtained by the law which we propose to change. So far as we have been able to discover, Hiram Barney, for three years and five months over and above his salary of $6,000 a year, received $64,607.29; the naval officer under him received the same, and the survey or under him received the same, making a total of one hundred and ninety-three odd thousand dollars. The informer was entitled to just as much. That added makes during a period of three years and five months paid out to these officials and this informer three hundred and eighty-seven odd thousand dollars. Simeon Draper was in only eleven months and twenty-four days, and in addition to his salary he had fifty-five odd thousand dollars; his naval officer and surveyor the same, and the informer the same. That made in eleven months and odd days three hundred and thirty-odd thousand dollars. Preston King for eight months and fifteen days, besides his salary, received thirty-three thousand and odd dollars, and his surveyor and naval officer and informer received the same; in all amounting to $199,000 in eight months only. Henry A. Smith for two years and ten months received one hundred and two thousand and odd dollars, and his surveyor and naval officer and informer the same; making a total of six hundred and six thousand and odd dollars, which was divided between him and these officials under him. Moses H. Grinnell for a year and six months received $140,000, and the officials under him received the same amount; making for that year and six months a total of $247,000. Thomas Murphy, a year and four months, had $55,997; and he and his associates, by the same rule, counted up $335,000. Chester A. Arthur—still resting upon the bosom of his moieties, when sent for to New York, positively declining to shed the light of his experience upon the Committee on Ways and Means, or explain the reasons that moved him to adhere to the continuance of this law—in the short period of two years has got, as far as we could trace—not counting the unsettled cases still to be gathered up by the harvest which lasts many months after men go out of office—has already got $56,120, and his naval officer the same; counting up to these officers now in repose in the custom-house in New York, while we are struggling here to find the means by which to make the two ends of the Government, its receipts and expenditures meet, the modest little sum of $336,721.26.

Table showing in detail the moieties to the collectors, naval officers, and surveyor of the port of New York.

Collector.	Term.	Collector's share.	Naval officer's share.	Surveyor's share.	Informer's share.	Total.
Hiram Barney	From April 8, 1861, to September 7, 1864, 3 years and 5 months	$64,607 29	$64,607 29	$64,607 29	$193,821 87	$387,643 74
Simeon Draper	From September 8, 1864, to August 3, 1865, 11 months and 24 days	55,014 55	55,014 55	55,014 55	165,043 65	330,087 30

Sir, the law is based upon the principle, as has been well said, of the farmer telling his hired man who gathers his crop, "you may glean after yourself." No man of experience need be appealed to with any hesitation as to his knowing that when that order is issued to any man the gleaning will be more than the raking. But I do not know that anybody desires to maintain that law. Even my colleague from the Essex district [Mr. BUTLER] has introduced a bill to take away from these officials all of their share in these moieties. But there are those who insist upon it that efficiency in the administration of the law requires that the informer shall have his share still.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Since my colleague has called attention to that bill which I introduced, will he have the kindness to inform the House that it was the first bill introduced this session.

Mr. DAWES. I am requested to state to the House and the country what I think is true, so far as I am aware, that my colleague's bill was the first that was introduced at this session to take away from the officials their share in these moieties, but leaving it to the informer.

Sir, who is the informer? He is to have one-half of one-half. The officials take the other half and divide it into three parts. His is the lion's share. Sir, the informer in every position of society, in every place, and in every calling, is an odious and despised being. Everybody shrinks from him, no matter what be his position or his calling. He that goes about making a business of informing against his neighbor, so shocks the common sense of justice, decency, and honor in all mankind, that he is universally despised. But let him do it for pay; let it be understood that he goes up and down the earth paid to inform against his fellow-men, and the intensity of the feeling of hatred with which he is regarded and the feeling that he ought to be hunted around the earth is increased tenfold. Add to that that he is to have half of what may be made out of his informing. He is bad enough when he volunteers without compensation from any motives of malice or otherwise to inform against his neighbor; he has no place whatever in decent society. But when he does it for pay, much more when he is to have half of the proceeds of his cursed employment, the door of decent society ought to be and will be shut against him.

The leper may be tolerated among men, for his leprosy is his misfortune. The man that carries about him a loathsome disease, that is not his fault but his misfortune, engages the charity of the world to build a hospital for him and to care for him with pity and compassion. But the vile, festering, putrescent informer, who goes about the earth assured of one-half of what he can make by his informing, finds no place as yet where decent men will harbor or countenance or associate with him.

Shall the Government of the United States take the wages of his sin and his iniquity and divide it with him? It is he who is the last refuge of this system. One after another they let go, or give up and throw overboard, and say we will not defend them. We will not defend an official, appointed by the Government perhaps for his good character and under the control of the Government in his actions, subject to removal if he abuses his trust; no, we are willing to say that he shall not have this; but the man who is under no control, the volunteer who cuts himself loose thereby from society, without either calling or position, forfeiting by the very willingness to take this every other position of trust and confidence—it seems it is thought best that we should save him, it seems best that we should save and guard him by new legislation, that he may have one-half or one-quarter, it may be, of all fees and penalties and forfeitures. We guard this man, roving around among the merchants of the cities of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, with money enough, the fruits and promises of his success, to enable him to furnish the means that will invade the confidential relations that exist between the merchant and his clerks, tainting the most sacred trusts, lying in wait for the unwary, as it was shown before the Committee on Ways and Means, at the desk of the custom-house and seeing the merchant unwittingly put in his foot, by omitting, it may be by accident or by ignorance or by any of a thousand ways consistent with his honesty, to conform to the most complicated system of revenue laws that exists in the world—standing I say at the desk, and seeing the merchant from day to day openly and unconscious of anything wrong making mistakes in his invoices, with a law behind him which says that a mistake in one item forfeits the whole invoice, and then when they are piled up by the dozen upon the desk of the custom-house going and informing against him and getting one-quarter of the forfeitures! And if the merchant appeals, under that law to the collector of the port, the law makes that collector the appellate court. If he decides that this man has not been simply guilty of a technical neglect, he lets him go, and he does not himself get anything. But if he decides that the merchant is guilty, he gets one-sixth. The court that this law has provided for the merchant to appeal to, to decide whether or not he has conformed to the law, has one-sixth of all the penalties if he decides that the man violated the law, and if he decides that he has not so done, he does not have anything. The district-attorney, who is put there as the officer of the Government in a semi-judicial character to see that justice is done between the Government and the accused, gets 2 per cent. of all, and the informer gets what I have told you.

This is the law that was brought to the attention of the Committee on Ways and Means, and as a substitute for which they have reported this bill. It is a law that has passed away in other countries, has had its day. The informer is not known in the British customs service now. The customs officer in the British customs service is not tempted in the administration of the law by any bribe. He is paid a fair salary, as ours should be. He is held to his official integrity and efficiency, and that the government exacts of him and for that it pays him. Now, is there anything in our law that renders it impracticable for us to treat with the merchants of New York and of Boston and of Philadelphia and of San Francisco as honest men until they are shown to be dishonest men? Is there anything in their calling, is there anything in their character, is there anything in the nature of their business, or in our relation to them, in practice, not in law—there is enough in our laws—but is there anything in the nature of it that renders it impossible for us to administer the laws upon them and with them as we do with other people?

Through the portals of the ports of New York and of Boston enters seventh-eighths of the commerce of the country, and consequently seven-eighths of all the wealth that comes to our shores in the vessels that plow the deep and whiten every ocean with their sails. They are some of them styled contemptuously before the committee "merchant princes." Some of them have become such by industry and frugality and fidelity to business relations with everybody else certainly but the Government. Some of them are young and enterprising men, beginning without capital and growing by devotion to an honorable calling, most honorable in all nations and all ages of the world, up to a competency and an independence, and to command the respect of mankind wherever they are known. What in their characters, what in their lives, what in their dealings with their fellow-men that should lead us to infer that in their dealings with the Government of the United States there is any such mysterious and malign spell upon them that we cannot fix our laws so plainly and the machinery for their execution so simple that they, as others, can walk into our courts and feel that whether the judgment be for or against them that judgment is a righteous and a just one, commanding their respect as well as their obedience? On the other hand, this very system itself has just precisely the opposite effect. It teaches merchants to devise means of evading the law and the administration of it. The result is to drive high-minded and high-toned merchants out of business, and their places are taken by that class who take their chance in the world even by a violation of the law for the profit which in the long run they think it will yield, or it drives the importing business of this country into the hands of foreigners, who from the other side of the water send their goods here to irresponsible consignees who have nothing to lose and therefore nothing to fear. Such is the result fast coming to be the common law in the mercantile community of this country under the system this bill hopes to remedy. The wise, prudent man is seeking some other calling or absolute retirement rather than submit himself to the chances of accident and mistake that are inseparable from a complicated system, administered by men whose interest it is to let them pass into the grasp of the law, into the mistakes and pitfalls the law itself has dug for them, in order that the fruits thereof may come into their own coffers. It is a source of revenue that debauches the whole customs service of the country.

Men abandon honest callings that bring them a moderate compensation, and seek an employment that brings them these large returns. A man who in the short time we have been here has gathered as his share of the moieties somewhere in the neighborhood of $400,000 was tempted from a quiet village, not many hundred miles from New York, where he was pursuing a humble calling which yielded him a moderate compensation, to tender his patriotic services to the Government of the United States in the capacity of a Treasury agent, in which he could act as informer. He now goes back to his native village, builds houses and stores, and steeples rise up there on which is written "The wages of an informer."

Men leave the revenue service of the country, and when we ask them why they do it, they say they could not afford to stay there at that compensation. When we ask them what they now do, they say that they have gone into the business of collecting the revenues of the country at the halves. Everything now is being taken at the halves; 50 per cent. is the common compensation when you deal with the Government. There are men who have gone into a systematized, organized association, who go around this country and inform honest bondholders that there is interest due them here at the Treasury Department, that it is pretty difficult to collect it, and they will collect it for them at fifty cents on the dollar. Hundreds of thousands of dollars of interest money has been taken every year out of the Treasury of the United States by these men, who have turned their backs on honest callings and devote themselves to this 50 per cent. business.

The official service of the United States is being sapped and mined, and no such thing as a healthy, honest public service for fair and reasonable compensation in the revenue service of the country can long be maintained unless reform something like this radical change in the administration of the Government shall be adopted.

It does not stop with Jayne, nor with Sanborn, nor with men of that class. It spreads like a contagious disease, and every official who comes in contact with these men, or with this service, becomes uneasy in his calling, unwilling to toil as he has done, and therefore he turns his back upon an honest and honorable position the moment he can find an opportunity to fill his pockets under this system of revenue service which has existed now for the last ten or fifteen years, growing every year in the enormities of the amounts gathered in by these men, like a ball of snow rolled up little by little, until it becomes the great and overshadowing complaint that is now presented by this report of your committee.

The details of this bill, what it attempts to remedy and how it attempts to remedy it, I will not now undertake to explain. Four or five members of the committee have done so in detail. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS,] who with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] was on the sub-committee that prepared this bill, has in detail gone over the provisions of the bill. No gentleman as yet has raised his voice against its principles. The third section of the bill, if modified as proposed by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] is unobjectionable to anybody.

Mr. TREMAIN. Does the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. DAWES] think it right in a proceeding for a penalty or forfeiture to leave it to a jury to draw an unfavorable inference against a man who does not produce his books? That is the effect of the amendment.

Mr. DAWES. I myself was opposed to the section and have moved to strike it out. I have desired not to go too far, not to let the bars down entirely, but to see if it were not possible to obtain efficiency and at the same time have proper safeguards. If it be possible to take the sting out of the third section, and yet enable the Government of the United States to call upon a party to produce evidence, I am in favor of it. But I am not here or anywhere in favor of compelling a party to produce evidence against himself that shall work any penalty, fine, or forfeiture whatever upon him. That would be in violation of the sacred principles of Magna Charta and of the Constitution of the United States. There is no law nor practice of the Government of the United States that undertakes to make a party produce evidence that will work any fine, penalty, or forfeiture upon him. It is a common practice in the courts to give a party notice to produce a paper, and if he fails to produce it the party calling for it can prove its contents. I should be in favor of trying that experiment in the administration of this law. And if my friend from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] thinks the third section with the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] goes further than that, I will go with him in striking it out.

Mr. TREMAIN. You need no statute to allow you to give secondary evidence of books and papers.

Mr. DAWES. I am aware of that.

Mr. TREMAIN. This statute would apply to the books of a party.

Mr. DAWES. I have now occupied much longer time than I expected, and in a very unsatisfactory manner to myself. This whole reform has been one which I have felt was of vastly more importance than I could indicate even to my fellow-members upon the committee. They have devoted themselves to this bill more than I have been able to do. Therefore the charge of it has fallen into abler and more careful hands than it otherwise would have done.

But the attention of Congress has been called by the President and by every Secretary of the Treasury, I think, since I have been in Congress to this evil, growing more and more alarming every day. The merchants of New York and of Boston (some of whom have been found in fault in the administration of the complicated requirements of the law) have come before the committee and have asked only this: Protect every honest merchant, punish with every severity in your power every dishonest merchant, but let no share of the fines and penalties which righteously should be visited upon every dishonest merchant be given to anybody as a stimulus to go prowling around among the business people of the land to find if possible wherein they may be brought under the operation of the law.

Mr. RICE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICE. I wish to ask whether the long and close investigation on the part of the committee shows that all the evil practices, all the unmanly acts, and all the indecencies have been committed by officers of the Government or those employed by them?

Mr. DAWES. O, no.

Mr. RICE. I ask this question in good faith. I am not acquainted with the subject. Such would seem to be the intimation from every speech that has been delivered to-day.

Mr. NIBLACK. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICE] that that is very near the truth.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Jayne, the most distinguished, I believe, of the informers that have appeared in the land, testified before the committee that he had examined sixty-one of these cases, and that forty-nine, I think, (or about that number,) arose from complicity of custom-house officials with bribery and other crimes that had been committed:

There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that the merchants have, like every other class in the world, dishonest men among them; but the imputation that as a body they are liable to the charge of dishonesty would be repelled, I think, by any one who knows them. If there are dishonest men among them, the honest ones want them exposed and punished.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS resumed the floor.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I wish to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] whether the officers of the law as a class are not honest as well as the merchants as a class?

Mr. DAWES. I think they are.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I would like to ask my colleague a question. If there were forty-nine officials bribed, did not forty-nine merchants bribe them?

Mr. DAWES. I would answer that question if I had the opportunity.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, the course of this debate leaves very little for me to say; and I have no disposition to occupy the time of the House. It would have been very easy for the Committee on Ways and Means to propose a great deal more than this bill includes; but I believe they are a great deal more anxious to achieve results than simply to make propositions. We are desirous to accomplish real reforms; and we believe we have included in the bill as much as it is safe now to ask.

I call the attention of the House to the fact that not one word has been said upon this floor against the general principles of the bill. Opposition has been made to the third section, with reference to which there is to be a separate vote. I may be excused for saying that this section is not in the bill by any vote of mine; and if I may be permitted so to do, I will vote to strike it out.

There are other duties resting upon our committee than the consideration of sensational propositions. We have sought to embody in this bill practical legislation. We have sought to protect the Government and the revenue—to maintain public morality while we have been just as anxious to guarantee the rights of the people.

Mr. Speaker, none of the evils which we propose now to reform are the work of the republican party. I am not one who has introduced politics on this floor. During the entire democratic rule these moieties were distributed not in the eye of the country, not even by a Secretary of the Treasury, but by the collectors themselves at the various ports, without public notice or report. And it is a republican administration that first of all brings the thing to the light and proposes to strike down the abuse.

I had hoped that we should get through this discussion without one word of partisan allusion. I have made no such allusion, and am unwilling now to make any. But great reforms are proposed in this bill, and by whom? By republicans. A majority of the committee which has the honor to report this bill are republicans; and I challenge any one anywhere to say that republicans have not been zealous in commencing this work and in carrying it forward step by step. If the republican party is to be challenged here upon a bill like this, I for one am ready to say that since the Government was founded no reforms equal to this have been attempted by a party in power with reference to the emoluments of its own officers, with reference to the administration conducted by itself.

Abuses will grow up under any party, and it takes brave men even in opposition to fight abuses. Abuses will grow up under a party in power; and when such a party is brave enough to strike down to the roots, that party has a right to brush aside any partisan allusions that may be made by anybody anywhere.

Mr. Speaker, gentlemen may criticise the republican party. I will criticise the republican party as bravely as I know how to do. I will attempt all the reforms which in my judgment can be achieved; and I will do it in the conviction that thus the republican party does its duty to itself and at the same time to the country. And the party which is brave enough to reform itself will live. Corruption will break out in any party, and it is the work of administration and of legislation to check that natural tendency. The republican party is the sole party that has ever sought to cure its own corruptions; and a party that has courage to do this is a party that shall never die.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say——

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The debate is exhausted. No further remarks are in order.

Mr. HEREFORD. I would ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS] what party passed the law under which the Sanborn contracts were made, and whether the gentleman himself did not vote for it? I hold in my hand the Congressional Globe, which shows that he did.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] is clearly out of order.

Mr. NIBLACK. This whole debate has been out of order; it has been extended ten minutes beyond the time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has limited it precisely to the hour.

Mr. WOOD. My colleague [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS] has taken advantage of his last ten minutes to bring in partisan considerations——

The SPEAKER, [rapping.] The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. NIBLACK. It was a very unnecessary performance, to say the least.

Mr. WOOD. And very unkind and discourteous.

The SPEAKER. The question first recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words on page 3, lines 18, 19, 20 and 21, "the allegations stated in the said motion shall be taken as confessed unless his failure to produce the same shall be explained to the satisfaction of the court," and insert as follows in lieu thereof:

Or explain satisfactorily why he does not or cannot produce the same. The neglect or refusal to produce may be weighed and considered as evidence against such defendant or claimant.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question next recurred on the amendment of Mr. DAWES to strike out the section as amended.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 97, noes 43.

So the section, as amended, was stricken out.

The question next recurred on Mr. DAWES's motion to add to the sixth section the following:

And any such person so furnishing information as aforesaid, who shall pay to any such officer of the United States, or to any person for the use, directly or indirectly, of any portion of said money or any other valuable thing, on account of or because of such money, shall have a perpetual right of action against said officer or other person and his legal representative to recover back the same or the value thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COLLECTION OF MONEYS DUE THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. FOSTER. I now report back from the Committee on Ways and Means, under the authority conferred on that committee to report at any time, the bill (H. R. No. 3256) to repeal so much of the act approved May 8, 1872, entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1873, and for other purposes," as provides for the employment of persons to assist the proper officers of the Government in discovering and collecting moneys withheld, and for other purposes.

Mr. DAWES. Is it in order to call up at this time the Senate concurrent resolution for final adjournment?

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman has not the floor for that purpose.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] yields to me for that purpose.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let us adjourn for the evening, and then we can settle this question of final adjournment hereafter.

FOREIGN CONVICTS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in compliance with resolution of the House of the 9th instant, a report of the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, relating to the landing in the United States of foreign convicts; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (S. No. 253) to authorize the county commissioners of Thurston County, in Washington Territory, to issue bonds for the purpose of constructing a railroad from Budd's Inlet, Puget Sound, to intersect the Northern Pacific Railroad at or near Tenino; when the Speaker signed the same.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. DAWES. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a concurrent resolution from the Senate fixing the day of final adjournment.

Mr. KASSON. I object.

Mr. RANDALL. Is it not a privileged question?

The SPEAKER. It is a privileged question in this respect: This resolution is from the Senate. It lies on the Speaker's table. It requires a motion to go to the business upon the Speaker's table to read this particular paper. The question itself as an act of the House is privileged. This particular paper could not be taken from the Speaker's table, coming, as it does, from the Senate, without unanimous consent.

A MEMBER. Let it go to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to its going to the Committee on Ways and Means. The House is competent to act for itself.

Mr. MAYNARD. That should be referred to some of the committees of the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is not a motion to take a recess in order?

The SPEAKER. It is; but the Chair thought this matter might be settled.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I insist on the Chair putting the motion to take a recess which I make.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The session this evening is for debate only as in Committee of the Whole, no business whatever to be transacted, Mr. BARRY, of Mississippi, in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

And then (at twenty minutes to six o'clock p. m.) the House took a recess until half-past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. BARRY.) The House meets to-night as in Committee of the Whole for debate only on the President's annual message, no business whatever to be transacted.

CURRENCY AND FINANCE.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Speaker, the crisis of last fall and the general derangement and depression of business which followed brought the financial question conspicuously to the foreground early in the session. And the President, conscious of the gravity of the subject, in his annual message offered various suggestions and recommendations for the consideration of Congress. Since the general field has been so fully canvassed in the discussions already had, and especially in view of the action of Congress in the passage of what is known as the Senate bill, and of the President in vetoing it, I propose to confine myself principally to a review of the subject, hoping this course may throw some light upon the obscure situation and the better enable us to solve the problem which is still unsettled. The President expressed doubts, in his veto message, whether the Senate bill would practically add a dollar to the circulation, and placed the veto upon the ground that it would at least theoretically increase the volume. As he defended this action from behind the intrenchments of his oft-expressed views and pledges, let us go back a little and see what some of these views and pledges are.

In his last annual message the President says:

My own judgment is that however much individuals may have suffered, one long step has been taken toward specie payments; that we can never have permanent prosperity until a specie basis is reached; and that a specie basis cannot be reached and maintained until our exports, exclusive of gold, pay for our imports, interest due abroad, and other specie obligations, or so nearly so as to leave an appreciable accumulation of the precious metals in the country from the products of our mines.

As a means of reaching a specie basis, therefore, the President does not urge contraction of currency or increased taxation; but clearly recognizes not only the importance but the necessity of our export trade, and gives it as his deliberate judgment that—

To increase our exports, sufficient currency is required to keep all the industries of the country employed. Without this, national as well as individual bankruptcy must ensue. Undue inflation, on the other hand, while it might give temporary relief, would only lead to inflation of prices, the impossibility of competing in our own markets for the products of home skill and labor, and repeated renewals of present experiences. Elasticity to our circulating medium, therefore, and just enough of it to transact the legitimate business of the country, and to keep all industries employed, is what is most to be desired.

It will be observed that the President here speaks of "undue inflation," but does not attempt to indicate what, in his judgment, would amount to such, nor what quantity of currency would be sufficient, except that in relation to the circulating medium he declares that there should be just enough of it to transact the legitimate business of the country and to keep all industries employed. This he supplements, however, with the further statement that—

In view of the great actual contraction that has taken place in the currency, and the comparative contraction continuously going on, due to the increase of population, increase of manufactories, and all the industries, I do not believe there is too much of it now for the dullest period of the year.

And—

It is patent to the most casual observer that much more currency or money is required to transact the legitimate trade of the country during the fall and winter months, when the vast crops are being removed, than during the balance of the year.

He pronounces the volume of currency equal only to the requirements of the dullest period of the year, and consequently it must fall short of the demands of the more active periods.

Again—

During the last four years the currency has been contracted directly, by the withdrawal of 3 per cent. certificates, compound-interest notes, and seven-thirty bonds outstanding on the 4th of March, 1869, all of which took the place of legal-tenders in the bank reserves, to the extent of $63,000,000.

During the same period there has been a much larger comparative contraction of the currency. The population of the country has largely increased. More than twenty-five thousand miles of railroad have been built, requiring the active use of capital to operate them. Millions of acres of land have been opened to cultivation, requiring capital to move the products. Manufactories have multiplied beyond all precedent in the same period of time, requiring capital weekly for the payment of wages and for the purchase of material; and probably the largest of all comparative contraction arises from the organizing of free labor in the South. Now every laborer there receives his wages, and for want of savings-banks the greater part of such wages is carried in the pocket or hoarded until required for use.

What lessons are here taught? Clearly that in the President's opinion a specie basis cannot be reached except through the increase of our exports; that an increase of our exports cannot be had without currency sufficient to keep all the industries of the country employed; that there is not too much currency now for the dullest period of the year; that the demands for it have vastly increased, while the volume has been greatly diminished.

If the currency has been so much contracted, the uses of it so much extended; if the busy seasons require so much more than the dull, and the quantity extant is not too much for the "dullest period of the year," is it not fair to presume, nay more, is it not the inevitable logical conclusion, that in the President's estimation the volume is insufficient and ought of necessity to be increased? But to obtain the needed increase the President recommends a method to give elasticity to the currency so as to graduate it to the various demands of the year. This "elasticity" is the presidential talisman. He says:

I submit for your consideration whether this difficulty [of the present system] might not be overcome by authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue, at any time, to national banks of issue, any amount of their own notes below a fixed percentage of their issue, say 40 per cent., upon the banks depositing with the Treasurer of the United States an amount of Government bonds equal to the amount of notes demanded, the banks to forfeit to the Government, say 4 per cent. of the interest accruing on the bonds so pledged during the time they remain with the Treasurer, as security for the increased circulation, the bonds so pledged to be redeemable by the banks at their pleasure, either in whole or in part, by returning their own bills for cancellation to an amount equal to the face of the bonds withdrawn.

Yet this was not intended or expected to give an India-rubber stretch to the present volume or to affect its distribution during the busy seasons, but to actually increase its quantity. This might be done, too, at any and all periods, and an opportunity is thus afforded for actually increasing the volume more than double the amount provided for in the bill vetoed. If the whole of the 40 per cent. of the $354,000,000 of the national-bank circulation should be thus issued, it would amount to more than $141,000,000, and the increase under the Senate bill could not exceed $64,000,000, as I shall hereafter show.

How do these views contrast with those expressed in the veto message? They stand as widely apart as the antipodes. In the veto message the President says the bill theoretically increases the volume of currency, and adds:

The theory, in my belief, is a departure from the true principles of finance, national interest, national obligations to creditors, congressional promises, party pledges—on the part of both political parties—and of personal views and promises made by me in every annual message sent to Congress, and in each inaugural address.

What estimation, in his veto message, does he place upon the value of the export trade as a means of reaching a specie basis? It speaks for itself in unequivocal phrase, and causes the President to say:

I am not a believer in any artificial method of making paper money equal to coin when the coin is not owned or held ready to redeem the promises to pay; for paper money is nothing more than promises to pay, and is valuable exactly in proportion to the amount of coin that it can be converted into. While coin is not used as a circulating medium, or the currency of the country is not convertible into it at par, it becomes an article of commerce as much as any other product. The surplus will seek a foreign market as will any other surplus. The balance of trade has nothing to do with the question. Duties on imports being required in coin creates a limited demand for gold. About enough to satisfy that demand remains in the country. To increase this supply I see no way open but by the Government hoarding through the means above given, and possibly by requiring the national banks to aid.

Again:

As a measure preparatory to free banking, and for placing the Government in a condition to redeem its notes in coin "at the earliest practicable moment," the revenues of the country should be increased so as to pay current expenses, provide for the sinking fund required by law, and also a surplus to be retained in the Treasury in gold.

Here we learn for the first time that the increase of exports, the "balance of trade" has nothing to do with the question of reaching a specie basis, and that an increase of the revenues, additional taxation upon the people, is the panacea for our financial maladies and the "bow of hope" for our business future.

This currency too, suddenly becomes of doubtful character. In December last, as we learn from the annual message, it was held in the following high repute:

The experience of the present panic has proven that the currency of the country, based as it is upon the credit of the country, is the best that has ever been devised. Usually in times of such trials, currency has become worthless, or so much depreciated in value as to inflate the values of all the necessaries of life as compared with the currency. Every one holding it has been anxious to dispose of it on any terms. Now we witness the reverse. Holders of currency hoard it as they did gold in former experiences of a like nature.

But in April, if we are to give credence to the veto message, it has become a defective, "irredeemable currency," mere promises to pay, and not dependent upon the credit of the nation for its value. In his veto message, quoting and reaffirming the doctrines of his annual message of 1869, the President says:

Among the evils growing out of the rebellion and not yet referred to, is that of an irredeemable currency. It is an evil which I hope will receive your most earnest attention. It is a duty and one of the highest duties of government to secure to the citizen a medium of exchange of fixed, unvarying value. This implies a return to a specie basis, and no substitute for it can be devised.

Furthermore:

I am not a believer in any artificial method of making paper money equal to coin when the coin is not owned or held ready to redeem the promises to pay; for paper money is nothing more than promises to pay, and is valuable exactly in proportion to the amount of coin that it can be converted into.

In the last annual message, as a further approximation to a specie basis, in addition to the increase of our export trade through the employment of all the industries, he makes this further suggestion:

In any modification of the present laws regulating national banks, as a further step toward preparing for resumption of specie payments, I invite your attention to a consideration of the propriety of exacting from them the retention, as a part of their reserve, either the whole or a part of the gold interest accruing upon the bonds pledged as security for their issue.

And to provide against some of the supposed evils of the present banking law, he adds that—

Elasticity in our monetary system, therefore, is the object to be obtained first, and next to that, as far as possible, a prevention of the use of other people's money in stock and other species of speculation. To prevent the latter, it seems to me that one great step would be taken by prohibiting the national banks from paying interest on deposits, by requiring them to hold their reserves in their own vaults, and by forcing them into resumption, though it would be only in legal-tender notes.

The retention by the banks as a part of the reserve of either the whole or a part of the gold interest accruing upon the bonds pledged as security for their issue; the prohibition of payment of interest upon deposits; the requirement that the banks shall hold their reserves in their own vaults, and the forcing of resumption of the bank circulation "though it would be only in legal-tender notes"—these are the clear, explicit, and unequivocal suggestions of the President to Congress last December. They were thrown out for the consideration of Congress without any recommendation that they should be adopted literally, but with the expression of the hope that Congress might devise some method to secure such elasticity to the currency as would keep employed all the industries of the country, and at the same time prevent such an inflation as would "put off indefinitely" the resumption of specie payments. "Put off indefinitely" is the language used; not that specie payment might not be delayed or extended to a reasonable and practicable period.

Seconding these suggestions of the President Congress took action in the matter, and after the most full deliberation and discussion passed the following bill:

An act to fix the amount of United States notes and the circulation of national banks, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the maximum amount of United States notes is hereby fixed at $400,000,000.

SEC. 2. That forty-six millions in notes for circulation, in addition to such circulation now allowed by law, shall be issued to national banking associations now organized and which may be organized hereafter; and such increased circulation shall be distributed among the several States as provided in section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870; and each national banking association, now organized or hereafter to be organized, shall keep and maintain, as a part of its reserve required by law, one-fourth part of the coin received by it as interest on bonds of the United States deposited as security for circulating notes or Government deposits; and that hereafter only one-fourth of the reserve now prescribed by law for national banking associations shall consist of balances due to an association available for the redemption of its circulating notes from associations in cities of redemption, and upon which balances no interest shall be paid.

This bill is substantially in accordance with the views of the President, submitted in his annual message. It requires the banks to keep as a part of their reserve one-fourth part of the coin received as interest on bonds deposited as security for circulating notes; it requires three-fourths of the reserves to be held in the vaults of the banks; it prohibits interest upon the remaining fourth, held by associations in cities of redemption, and does not increase the volume of currency so much as that indicated by the President as necessary to keep our industries employed and to augment our export trade. And the redemption of the bank circulation recommended, "though it be only in legal-tender notes," was fully provided for by the Senate bill, since the legal-tender issue was extended to the same maximum ($400,000,000) as that of the national-bank circulation. Still the President in his veto message is not content with this kind of redemption, but adds, when dwelling upon the question of free banking, the further qualification that the legal-tender notes shall "themselves be redeemable and made equivalent to coin." Here is his language:

With the amount of United States notes to be issued permanently fixed within proper limits, and the Treasury so strengthened as to be able to redeem them in coin on demand, it will then be safe to inaugurate a system of free banking with such provisions as to make compulsory redemption of the circulating notes of the banks in coin, or in United States notes, themselves redeemable and made equivalent to coin.

Moreover, in his first inaugural the President gave assurances to the country that he would have "no policy to enforce against the will of the people," and in his last annual message concluded his suggestions upon the currency by saying:

The decisions of Congress on this subject will have the hearty support of the Executive.

Notwithstanding these pledges and the fact that the bill passed is in substantial compliance with the President's recommendations, he withholds his approval, saying in his veto message:

Herewith I return Senate bill No. 617, entitled "An act to fix the amount of United States notes and the circulation of national banks, and for other purposes," without my approval.

In doing so, I must express my regret at not being able to give my assent to a measure which has received the sanction of a majority of the legislators chosen by the people to make laws for their guidance, and I have studiously sought to find sufficient arguments to justify such assent; but unsuccessfully.

This veto is based upon the sole ground that it will theoretically increase the volume of currency. He says:

Practically, it is a question whether the measure under discussion would give an additional dollar to the irredeemable paper currency of the country or not, and whether by requiring three-fourths of the reserves to be retained by the banks, and prohibiting interest to be received on the balance, it might not prove a contraction. But the fact cannot be concealed that theoretically the bill increases the paper circulation $100,000,000, less only the amount of reserves restrained from circulation by the provision of the second section. The measure has been supported on the theory that it would give increased circulation. It is a fair inference, therefore, that if, in practice, the measure should fail to create the abundance of circulation expected of it, the friends of the measure, particularly those out of Congress, would clamor for such inflation as would give the expected relief.

That the increase, however, either practically or theoretically, would have amounted to $100,000,000, is a grave mistake. The President claims the right under the present law to cause to be issued the whole of the $44,000,000 reserve, and says in his veto message:

The forty-four millions have ever been regarded as a reserve, to be used only in case of emergency, such as has occurred on several occasions, and must occur when from any cause revenues suddenly fall below expenditures; and such a reserve is necessary, because the fractional currency, amounting to fifty millions, is redeemable in legal tender on call.

For the purposes of the argument, it is not material whether or not this right exists to issue the legal-tenders till the maximum of $400,000,000 is reached. Since the President claims that right and continues to exercise it, he cannot consistently and reasonably urge that the bill vetoed increased the legal-tender issue a single dollar. The only increase, therefore, according to the President's claim, is the amount added to the national-bank circulation, being $46,000,000. And as a matter of fact the Secretary of the Treasury has issued since the beginning of the crisis last fall $26,000,000 of this legal-tender reserve, and there is now outstanding $382,000,000; so that in no view can the bill be fairly said to increase the volume more than that necessary to reach the maximum of $400,000,000 of each class of issues, which is only $64,000,000, and even a portion of this is required to be held as reserves.

In what I have said I have not intended to express an opinion upon the merits of the bill vetoed. I have been discussing merely the presidential policy. However, I think the measure open to objections, but not on the grounds urged in the veto message. Still the bill was the best that it seemed possible to obtain at the time, and I gave it my support, hoping it might bring some needed relief to the languishing industries of the country. But the capitalists of New York and the East interposed. Holding the lion's share of the money of the country, they clamor against any increase. Last September, however, these self-same men were vociferous for more money. They then sought the President and obtained millions of the reserve. Having thus secured the relief they desired, they upon the passage of the Senate bill by Congress again came down upon this capital—

——Like the wolf on the fold,
And their cohorts were gleaming in purple and gold.

Throughout the money centers of the country, and particularly in the East, they called meetings and appointed committees to besiege the President with importunities. The following telegram, heralded over the land and published in the dailies, will show the character of these committees and the urgency of their solicitations:

NEW YORK, April 15.

A meeting of prominent bankers, merchants, and capitalists of this city was held here this evening. Peter Cooper presided. A petition to President Grant was read, soliciting his veto regarding the Senate bill for the expansion of the currency, and designating it as a stain on the honor of the Republic. The petition was signed by a majority of the presidents of banks in the Clearing-house Association.

Resolutions were adopted appointing a committee to present the petition to the President. The committee consists of leading financial men. This committee will meet on Friday morning at Washington to present their views to the President before the meeting of the Cabinet at noon.

They sought and obtained the presidential presence. What influence was thus exerted over him it is not for me to say, but I leave it for the country to judge in view of his former declarations and the subsequent events.

While I do not desire to enter into any extended discussion of the general financial problem, I beg attention to a few other considerations.

I am not one of those who believe in resorting to legislation to relieve every financial embarrassment; but when unwise legislation has brought about this embarrassment, and still stands in the way of those natural laws which would otherwise control the monetary system and regulate the supply and demand of the currency, I feel it to be an imperative duty to remove the obstructions by further legislative action. In my judgment, however, many and indeed most of the measures proposed do not tend to that result.

The great anxiety on the part of those who champion what is called specie payment is not only to limit but to curtail the amount of currency, and particularly to retire and cancel the whole or a part of the outstanding legal-tenders. The legal-tenders are at once the cheapest and best of all our paper circulation, and for their retirement I have heard no good or sufficient reasons. They cost the people no annual interest to float them. They are equal in all respects and superior in many to the national-bank notes, and their basis of security is the credit and wealth of the nation itself. How is it with the national-bank notes? They cost the people, with the present volume, some $20,000,000 a year. They are nominally issued by the banks, but really by the Government. They rest for their security not upon the banks, but upon the bonds of the United States. For the payment of these bonds the nation alone is responsible, so that the security in each class of issues—the legal-tender and the national-bank note—rests ultimately upon one and the same basis. The qualities thus imparted to the bank-note through the faith and credit of the Government alone give it value and cause it to be circulated currently throughout the country as money. Back of each class of issues stands the Government itself. Neither has value without this security; both are entirely good with it.

Since the legal tender is furnished comparatively free and the national-bank note at so large expense, why shall we retire the former while we perpetuate and extend the latter? Considering the welfare of the whole people, what man should hesitate to declare his preference for a currency, a hundred dollars of which may be circulated and used without price, over a currency the like amount of which, and being no better, and indeed not as good, costs six dollars a year in coin? The bare statement of the character of the two classes of issues demonstrates the wrong and injustice to the great body of the people of the proposed policy of retiring the legal-tenders at the present time or near future. Far better would it be to retire first, when the day for the retirement of any portion of the currency arrives, the national-bank notes, and thus lift from the shoulders of a tax-burdened people an equal or proportionate amount of the interest-bearing public debt.

But specie payment is the rallying cry of those who are now working in the interest of capital. A specie basis may eventually be reached, but specie payment in reality, or a circulating medium entirely of coin, will never take place. Lycurgus will sleep on in his own chosen temple, and so will sleep the iron money of his institution. Neither will gold or silver become the actual medium of exchange any more than the cast-iron money of the ancient Spartans, though they may become the basis of stability to the currency which takes their place. The nations of modern times, encouraging trade and commerce, and cultivating the arts of peace instead of war, must and will do business upon credit and with currency of some character. The real questions at issue are, What quantity of currency is necessary to the healthy maintenance and growth of business, and when and in what manner shall the specie basis be reached? Specie payment, or a specie basis, at the present time, is an admitted impossibility; a paper currency an absolute necessity. Far more coin is demanded each and every year to pay the interest upon our debt abroad, national, State, and corporate, than the whole amount of specie possessed in the entire country.

That business is greatly depressed no one denies. About the causes of it many differ, and about the remedy there is like disagreement.

That an increase of currency would give temporary relief all seem to agree, but the "contractionists" urge that such course would bring ultimate disaster and ruin. They base their conclusions, however, upon the hypothesis that the currency is to be so largely inflated as to reduce comparatively its value or to render it absolutely worthless. And they liken it to the old Continental money, the French assignats, and Confederate scrip. They assume this state of affairs and assert that such a course will "put off indefinitely" the resumption of specie payments. And they have not only exhausted their sources of reason to impress their theory, but have resorted to casting clouds upon those whom they are pleased to style "inflationists," by stigmatizing their action as fraught with folly, with dishonor to the nation's obligations, with ignorance of the true principles of finance and the science of statesmanship. It is forgotten that but a few short months ago they "were of them." I shall have the charity, however, to believe that this raillery on their part against their brothers who may differ with them in opinion springs not so much from honest, deliberate conviction as from a desire to skillfully wield the arts of disputatious warfare. But their hypothesis is based upon a misapprehension of the real issue. No one proposes to embark upon a wide and wild sea of inflation. In such sense inflation has no advocates on the floor of Congress. In the apt language of Mr. BUCKNER, of Missouri, who now honors this body with his official presence, in a recent letter to his constituents:

> What we demand is, an increase of what is now by law the money of the country, adequate to the wants and demands of its business, and an equal distribution to all sections of what we have, in proportion to our population and wealth. It is this reasonable demand that the advocates of the present status of the currency characterize as "inflation."

While they rely upon the pledge of the act of 1869 for support in favor of resumption, they carefully avoid making known that by the act of 1870 the national-bank issue was extended $56,000,000. And they are forced to admit in argument that the present volume of currency is not too much, though their policy has been to force resumption through further contraction in one form or another. They admitting, however, that the present volume ought not now to be diminished, it follows that in their opinion the seven hundred and odd million dollars of currency now outstanding is not too much to meet the present exigencies. It would not be at all strange, therefore, if they should be slightly mistaken in this nicety of calculation that the demands of business were greater than their estimate, and that a little increase of currency would, contrary to their expectations, prove beneficial rather than detrimental or disastrous.

With our vast enterprises, various productions, wide expanse of territory, the ablest thinkers and best informed financiers may differ as to the amount necessary. Adam Smith, in his admirable treatise entitled "Wealth of Nations," has well observed:

> What is the proportion which the circulating money of any country bears to the whole value of the annual produce circulated by means of it, it is perhaps impossible to determine. It has been computed by different authors at a fifth, at a tenth, at a twentieth, and at a thirtieth part of that value. But how small soever the proportion which the circulating money may bear to the whole value of the annual produce, as but a part and frequently but a small part of that produce is ever destined for the maintenance of industry, it must always bear a very considerable proportion to that part.

When the crisis of last fall came, so urgent was the demand for more currency, and principally by those who now deplore any extension, that the President and Secretary of the Treasury yielded to the pressure, and contrary to the provisions of the law issued $26,000,000 of what is known as the $44,000,000 reserve. It is said this House in voting to extend this issue to the maximum of $400,000,000 approved the course of the Secretary. I do not so interpret its action. It is the province of Congress to make laws and the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury and all others to obey them. In voting for that measure I looked beyond the Secretary and to the people. In my judgment this House by that vote no more approved of that violation of the law than the governor of a State who pardons the felon from the cell approves of the crime for which he was incarcerated.

But to return from this digression. Notwithstanding this $26,000,000 was thus issued, the direst results are now predicted from the slightest additional increase, and the President will not tolerate it even theoretically. Every argument is advanced and every influence organized to prevent. An increase, it is said, will bear especially hard upon the agriculturist, the mechanic, and the day-laborer by inducing undue inflation and thereby enhancing the prices of commodities of living proportionately beyond that of wages and the products of labor. This sympathy for the producing and laboring classes comes from an unexpected quarter, and seems a little remarkable except as a means to an end.

I would not question the motives which prompt it, but it would be well to remember the poetic admonition:

> No vice so simple but assumes
> Some mark of virtue on its outward parts.

These results can flow only from an overissue, from a flood of paper money which has no substantial basis of security. They are not the fruits of that intermediate course, ycleped the "golden mean," which would give sufficient currency to "transact the legitimate business of the country and to keep all industries employed."

Undue contraction, on the other hand, is fraught with like evil to the same classes. I cannot better illustrate this than by quoting from Sir Archibald Alison, in his "England in 1815 and 1845; or, a Sufficient and Contracted Currency," wherein he says:

> The period of a contraction of the currency and consequent fall in the money prices of all the articles of human consumption is one in which great profits are sure to be realized by the larger capitalists, and great losses sustained by the smaller. The former prosper because the magnitude of their transactions enables them to realize a handsome income upon the whole from a declining and at length almost inconceivably small amount of profit from each transaction; and they gradually get the monopoly of the market in their own line of business by the extinction of the lesser capitalists whom the fall in the price of commodities has ruined or the diminished profits have repelled from entering into competition with them.
> * * * Small traders, therefore, and farmers without capital are speedily ruined in such a state of things, and the laboring or destitute condition is only rendered the more distressing by the contrast which it affords to the wealth and splendor with which the holders of large capital in the same line of business are surrounded.
> * * * A period of contracted currency is one of embarrassment, difficulty, and generally in the end of insolvency to the small farmer and moderate land-holder.
> If a supply proportioned to the increase of men and the wants of their commercial intercourse is not afforded, the circulating medium will become scarce; it will rise in price from that scarcity, and become accessible only to the more rich and affluent classes. The industrious poor or those engaged in business but possessed of small capital will be the first to suffer.

These results, sir, are seen and felt to-day. The general depression of business is a fact palpable to all. Manufactories are idle, the mechanic is out of employment or working upon limited time and at reduced wages, the day-laborer is poorly paid, and the farmer finds no ready market for his products at remunerative prices. Not war, drought, or famine is the cause of all this. We are at peace at home and with all the world beside, and the varied productions of the earth were never more abundant. Materials to work upon are plenty; tools to work with ample; hands, ready and eager to catch at the opportunity, numerous; yet the wheels of industry stand still and the hum of business is hushed.

It is fair to presume, therefore, that, in great part, all this is the logical sequence and practical result of a vicious financial policy. Back of the mere question of the volume of currency, however, may, no doubt, be found many, if not the principal, causes of the present business distress.

We have an enormous public debt, with a large part of it held abroad, which consumes our exports to pay the accruing interest, thereby preventing the natural interchange of products, the legitimate operations of international commerce, and the favorable balance of trade to our country. We have a national-bank circulation which costs the country heavily, which is inequitable in its apportionment, which, in short, is a grand monopoly by the force of law and through the action of public officials. According to wealth and population the Eastern and Middle States have an excess of the national banking capital of $80,106,549, and the South and West a deficiency of $72,694,845. This ought not to exist. The same rights and privileges should be accorded to A that are extended to B. Instead of encouraging, I would throw obstructions in the way of monopoly in all its forms. Especially should there be no monopoly in the circulating medium of the country so indispensable to all, and the amount of it should be equal to the wants of business. While a limitation is placed upon the amount of currency, a fair and equitable apportionment of it according to the wealth, population, and business interests of the different sections is imperatively demanded by every consideration of justice. Moreover, equity in the apportionment and quantity sufficient to promote business prosperity are the easiest as well as the surest and safest methods of appreciating the value of the currency and bringing it to the specie standard. This, too, is in strict accordance with every pledge of Congress, of the President, and of party platforms, upon which so much reliance has been placed. A specie basis "at the earliest practicable period" means nothing more or less than a period which may be reached at a time and in a manner consistent with business interest, national prosperity, and individual welfare. Resumption at any earlier day is Shylock's pound of flesh extorted in behalf of capital.

While insisting upon the necessity of a stable circulating medium and the wisdom of returning to a specie basis as early as the interest of the debtor class would permit, the President, in his annual message to Congress in 1869, most truly said:

> Immediate resumption, if practicable, would not be desirable. It would compel the debtor class to pay, beyond their contracts, the premium on gold at the date of their purchase, and would bring bankruptcy and ruin to thousands.

With much more force would this apply at the present time, when all our industries are paralyzed and our indebtedness undiminished. It is estimated that debts, national, State, corporate, and individual, amounting in the aggregate to the enormous and almost incomprehensible sum of eleven to twelve billion dollars are now outstanding. They have been contracted, too, upon a currency basis. To require them to be paid in coin immediately or in the early future would work untold disaster, and, in the language of the President, "would bring bankruptcy and ruin to thousands."

In the present, well-understood condition of things it is plainly apparent the practicable period for resumption is not now upon us. If it did not arrive in the prosperous years of 1870, 1871, and 1872, it may not come for some years hence. However great a desideratum, therefore, a specie basis may be, and I am by no means inclined to ignore its importance or to unnecessarily delay its coming, yet in my judgment it is a question of some considerable time or of unparalleled sacrifice.

Mr. HAVENS. Mr. Speaker, when this Congress assembled in December last the necessity for legislation to improve the financial condition of the country was universally recognized, and the demand for such legislation was urgent and pressing. The West and South, especially, insisted upon an increase of the volume of circulation, and there were few who did not expect that such increase in some form would be authorized. The President in his annual message clearly favored it, while the pressure just previously brought to bear upon him to secure the issue of the forty-four million reserve by the moneyed men of the East gave encouragement to the belief that that powerful influence would not be arrayed against legislation in the direction of reasonable and moderate expansion.

After months of exhaustive debate and of careful and well-considered action, a bill passed both Houses which was far from coming up to what the advocates of expansion believed to be necessary, and in which much—far too much—was yielded to the opinions and interests of the capitalists of the East. The expansion for which it provided was meager in view of the necessities of the country, and of the unquestioned demand of the people.

It was therefore a matter of great surprise that this bill aroused so much determined hostility among the representatives of the capitalists of the country and induced a pressure upon the Executive unprecedented in the history of legislation, to prevail upon him to interpose the veto power between the people and their Representatives. And to me it was a matter of still greater surprise, in view of the recommendations of the annual message, which gave so much satisfaction to the West and South and to the laboring and producing classes everywhere, that the President should have been convinced that adherence to his patriotic purpose to enforce no policy of his own against the will of the people required that he should depart so far from the views of that message as to return the bill with his disapproval.

THE PRESIDENT'S RECOMMENDATIONS.

The majority of this Congress had no reason to suppose that they were placing themselves so eminently in conflict with the views of the President, and of a correct public policy as the veto message may seem to indicate; and in this connection it is instructive to refer to the measures recommended for our adoption in the annual message in December last. In that message the President said:

> In view of the great actual contraction that has taken place in the currency, and the comparative contraction continuously going on, due to the increase of population, increase of manufactories, and all the industries, I do not believe there is too much of it now for the dullest period of the year.
> It is patent to the most casual observer that much more currency or money is required to transact the legitimate trade of the country during the fall and winter months, when the vast crops are being removed, than during the balance of the year.

And after showing that an actual contraction of the currency within the last four years to the extent of $63,000,000 had taken place he presented the following argument showing the necessity for expansion, at least during the fall and winter months when the crops were being moved:

> During the same period there has been a much larger comparative contraction of the currency. The population of the country has largely increased. More than twenty-five thousand miles of railroad have been built, requiring the active use of capital to operate them. Millions of acres of land have been opened to cultivation, requiring capital to move the products. Manufactories have multiplied beyond all precedent in the same period of time, requiring capital weekly for the payment of wages and for the purchase of material; and probably the largest of all comparative contraction arises from the organizing of free labor in the South. Now every laborer there receives his wages, and, for want of savings-banks, the greater part of such wages is carried in the pocket or hoarded until required for use.

So it appears that the President believed, in December last, that the present volume of circulation was "only sufficient for the dullest season of the year," and that "much more currency, or money, was required to transact the legitimate trade of the country during the fall and winter months." And he gave us the soundest of arguments to impress upon us the correctness of this view.

The addition to the volume of circulation so shown to be necessary could only be provided for by legislation, and to effect it the President recommended certain measures for our consideration. Let us examine them. The first is as follows:

> I submit for your consideration whether this difficulty might not be overcome by authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue, at any time, to national banks of issue, any amount of their own notes below a fixed percentage of their issue, say 40 per cent., upon the banks depositing with the Treasurer of the United States an amount of Government bonds equal to the amount of notes demanded, the banks to forfeit to the Government, say, 4 per cent. of the interest accruing on the bonds so pledged during the time they remain with the Treasurer, as security for the increased circulation, the bonds so pledged to be redeemable by the banks at their pleasure, either in whole or in part, by returning their own bills for cancellation to an amount equal to the face of the bonds withdrawn.

Here is a proposition to permit the banks to increase their circulation at pleasure to the extent of 40 per cent. by merely surrendering 4 per cent. of the interest upon their bonds while using the currency. Their aggregate circulation being $354,000,000, the increase of circulation so recommended would amount to a little above $140,000,000, provided the banks should avail themselves of the privilege extended. That they would do so cannot be doubted, in view of the opportunity for increased profits, especially during the busy seasons, and so long as the demand for currency should be great enough to absorb it at fair rates of interest.

This, then, was a proposition, specifically recommended by the President, opening the way to expansion to the extent of $140,000,000.

Again he recommended for our consideration the propriety of making banking free, "retaining all the safeguards now required to secure bill-holders," and coupled with a provision forcing redemption, "though it would only be in legal-tender notes." The extent of expansion involved in this proposition cannot of course be accurately estimated. It would only be limited by the capacity of the capital and business of the country to establish and maintain additional banks.

Again, the President suggested the propriety of exacting from the banks "the retention as a part of their reserve either the whole or a part of the gold interest accruing upon the bonds pledged for their issue." Requiring the reserve to be held in gold would, of course, release the paper reserve, and to the extent that gold should be so held would increase the paper circulation. If the whole of the gold interest were required to be so held it would add about $20,000,000 per annum to the paper circulation, until the whole of the reserve required by law should be converted into gold.

These are the measures recommended by the President for effecting the volume of circulation. And it must be remembered that in connection with these recommendations he did not even suggest any measure requiring contraction of any part of the paper circulation to the extent of a single dollar. We were advised of the importance of an early return to specie payments, and warned against the dangers of "undue inflation;" but these measures did not seem to the President to involve "undue inflation." And having made these recommendations, the President concluded with the assurance that "the decision of Congress upon this subject" would "receive the hearty support of the Executive."

Mr. Speaker, I inquire if these views of the President were not strongly in the direction of what is now termed "inflation," and whether the political supporters of the President, who advocated the bill he has felt called upon to veto, had not a right to believe that in so doing they were still following the lead of their chief, and to expect that the bill would receive his prompt and cordial approval?

PROVISIONS OF THE BILL.

Let us examine that bill and see whether it was in conflict with these views of the President, and whether it involved "inflation" beyond his recommendations.

The bill only permitted an issue of $46,000,000 of bank circulation, and confined the issue of it to those States having less than their proportion under existing laws. It followed the recommendation of the President that all or a part of the gold interest received on bonds deposited as security for circulation should be held as a part of the reserve required by law, by providing that one-fourth of the gold interest should be so held.

Is it not apparent that this bill, limiting the possibility of expansion through an increase of national-bank circulation to $46,000,000, contained far less "inflation" than the recommendation of the President, under which there were to be no limitations as to amount, and which would have opened the way to all the States, East as well as West and South, to increase the circulation to the extent of their capacity to establish and sustain additional banks?

Under the operation of the bill there could have been no inflation beyond the $46,000,000 of national currency provided for and the small amount of the paper reserves released by requiring one-fourth of the reserves to be held in gold. This was the whole of it. The bill contained no other provision requiring the issue of a single dollar of currency of any kind. The provision that the maximum of legal-tenders should be $400,000,000, in effect only authorized by law the issue of the forty-four million reserve. It did not compel its issue, but left it discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury to issue it or not. In this respect it is not certain that the bill would have changed the existing law. Both the President and Secretary hold that that authority now exists, and in pursuance of it $28,000,000 have been issued by the Secretary with the approval of the President since the panic of last fall. The right of the Secretary to issue this so-called reserve had, however, been seriously questioned. The bill did no more in effect than remove all doubt upon this point. It only made certain the authority which the President and Secretary already claim and exercise, and left the propriety or expediency of its exercise to them exactly as they now hold it to exist. It did not require them to issue a dollar of it, and only settled the disputed question as to their right to control its issue, just as they have claimed it and in accordance with the policy they have heretofore pursued with regard to it.

This provision of the bill, therefore, contained no "inflation" whatever; and all the increase of the currency that could have resulted had the bill become a law would have been so much of the $46,000,000 of bank circulation as the States entitled to it might have been able to take up. The President was, therefore, greatly in error when he stated in his veto message that "the fact cannot be concealed that theoretically the bill increases the paper circulation $100,000,000, less only the amount of reserves restrained from circulation by the provision of the second section," unless he meant to admit that existing law does not authorize the issue of the $44,000,000 reserve, and that so much of it as has been issued has been issued in violation of law.

It appears, then, that the annual recommendations of the President's message favored an increase of the paper circulation through an increase of the circulation of the existing banks to the extent of $140,000,000, together with such increase as might result from unlimited free banking and the release of so much of the paper reserves as might be replaced by even all of the gold interest upon the bonds deposited as security for circulation. The bill which failed to receive the President's approval because it involved too much expansion, only provided for such an increase of the currency as might result from the establishment of additional banks in certain States within the limit of $46,000,000, together with the release of paper reserves to the amount of only one-fourth of the gold interest upon the bonds deposited as security for circulation. It is thus seen that the recommendations of the President's message of December last, if they had been strictly followed, would have opened the way to more than three or four times as much "inflation" as would have been possible under the bill he has disapproved.

THE WILL OF THE PEOPLE.

Mr. Speaker, for many months the question of the finances has been the absorbing question everywhere. Not only in the parlors of banks, in counting-rooms, stores, and offices, but in the shop of the mechanic, at the firesides of the farmer, and among unemployed and poorly paid laborers it has been the all-engrossing theme. So universal has been the suffering and distress among the masses of the people occasioned by the want of currency to move the industries upon which they are dependent, that it has forced itself above all other questions. It has risen above the divisions of parties, and party lines have been disregarded and forgotten in its discussion and consideration. And everywhere among the masses of the people the demand for an expansion of the currency has been unmistakable. The press of the great cities, and their followers, may have seemed to indicate otherwise; but such has been the voice of the people as it has been heard by their Representatives upon this floor, to whom they have had a right to appeal.

But loud above the quiet but confident appeals of the common people, whose voice has seldom reached beyond their immediate representatives, has sounded the incessant din and clamor of the money power of the country through all the circles and influences at its great command. It has assumed to speak for the country and to embody all the patriotism and honor in the land. The press of New York has spoken with an air of authority that none should dare to question, and has hurled studied falsehoods and reckless bombast in the face of the country with the wildest desperation, and at least one of its greatest representatives has threatened the destruction of the Union if its ultimatum should be disregarded. To those who may not have had access to the real heart of the people it may have seemed that these overshadowing organs of communication—the loud and boastful assumptions of the money kings of the great cities—have correctly represented the honest wishes and opinions of the great body of the people. And if there are those charged with official responsibility who have been misled in this regard it is deeply to be regretted, but is perhaps not strange that it should be so.

WHY THERE IS CIRCULATION NOT ISSUED.

Mr. Speaker, the concluding paragraph of the veto message seems a little unkind as well as unjust to the people of the West. It is calculated, doubtless unintentionally, to convey a very erroneous and injurious impression. I quote it as follows:

> It is claimed by the advocates of the measure herewith returned that there is an unequal distribution of the banking capital of the country. I was disposed to give great weight to this view of the question at first; but on reflection it will be remembered that there still remains $4,000,000 of authorized bank-note circulation assigned to States having less than their quota not yet taken. In addition to this, the States having less than their quota of bank circulation have the option of twenty-five millions more to be taken from those States having more than their proportion. When this is all taken up, or when specie payments are fully restored, or are in rapid process of restoration, will be the time to consider the question of "more currency."

The President here seems to entertain the opinion that the States now asking for increased banking circulation have been unable to take up the remaining $4,000,000 to which they are entitled or have not desired to do so, and that for the same reason they have not taken the $25,000,000 which the law now provides may be transferred to them from the States having an excess above their proportion. He was evidently not aware of the reason why this circulation has not been taken, or he would not have imputed to us the impropriety of asking for "more currency" when we had failed to take that which had long been waiting for our applications. Sir, for a long period all applications for any part of this $4,000,000 have been steadily and uniformly rejected by the Comptroller. For more than a year not a dollar of it could be obtained for any new bank in the West and South. The alleged reason has been that applications were already on file for the whole of it, and that it was all assigned upon such applications. No circulation has ever been issued upon these assignments, and it would be difficult to satisfy the country that many of the applications were not fraudulent and intended to defeat other applications, made in good faith, the object being to avoid the enforcement of the law requiring the transfer of $25,000,000 from the East to the West as soon as that $4,000,000 should be exhausted. That transfer under the law could not be made until the remaining $4,000,000 of the amount authorized under the act of July 12, 1870, should all be taken. And these neglected and abandoned, if not fraudulent applications, have been permitted for a long period to stand in the way of legitimate applications from parties who have stood ready with their bonds to take the circulation, and have furnished a ready excuse for the refusal to transfer the $25,000,000 from the East to the South and West. A large number of applications, presented by parties who were ready to comply with the law, have been refused, while many other applicants—some I know from the State I in part represent—have been informed that there was no circulation for them, and that it would be useless to file their applications. And it was not until the recent discussion here upon this subject directed public attention to the action of the Comptroller that he consented to permit this $4,000,000 to be taken up. In fact, sir, since the date of the President's message, and in the face of its positive statements to the contrary, applicants from the State of Missouri, have been told that this circulation was not accessible to them, and have been refused a single dollar of it.

But for the determination of the Comptroller to protect the East from the surrender of a portion of its excess of circulation under the act of July 12, 1870, the $4,000,000 would have long since been issued to the West and South, and the greater portion, if not all, of the $25,000,000 would have been transferred there also. That he has deceived and misled the President as to the facts connected with the failure to issue this circulation, the statements of the message scarcely leaves room for doubt.

THE REAL CAUSE OF HOSTILITY TO THE BILL BY EASTERN CAPITALISTS.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the well-known opinions of the capitalists of the country a few months ago when they were beseeching the President, even on the Sabbath day, to expand the currency by the exercise of a doubtful and questioned power, to relieve them from pressure, we did not expect to witness the unprecedented exertion they have made to secure an executive veto of a bill providing for the moderate expansion of that to which I am referring. Why was that exertion made? Was it because they really feared the effects of the bill in the direction of expansion? I do not believe so; for we find many of those very men to-day favoring measures involving even greater expansion. But we find also that their propositions are coupled with conditions designed to preserve the preponderance and control they now have over the finances and business of the country. They are unfriendly to everything which looks to a destruction of those unjust and unnatural influences which practically force money to accumulate in undue quantities in the eastern centers while the agricultural districts of the West and South are denied the ordinary and reasonable advantages which every section may justly claim. And hence their hostility to that bill. That bill, sir, was one to do justice to the West and South rather than to inflate the currency. That was its mistake. Had it been shorn of this feature, their previous action and their present attitude does not permit us to doubt that the little expansion it provided for would have been accepted without a murmur, if not with gladness.

But, sir, undue advantage and power must be perpetuated in the great money centers, as the condition upon which any legislation will be permitted. The power which their wealth naturally gives them must be still further augmented by laws discriminating against the rest of the country. The national banks must be given unlimited opportunity to multiply in number and increase their power. No check or limit must be placed in the way of their advance. On the contrary, every obstacle and hinderance must be removed. The greenback circulation must be retired in order to open the way more completely to their growth—the growth, sir, of a power that may yet become dangerous and troublesome. These are the conditions made precedent to any expansion of the currency. With these conditions all the horrors of expansion disappear.

Mr. Speaker, the cry of "inflation" has from the first been the veriest humbug. It has been made the glib answer to all arguments and facts, and has been expected to silence the timid, alarm the unthinking, and mislead the whole country into the service of the eastern banks and bondholders. It is a deception and a sham. And none know it better than those who have made it.

The Eastern States, having more than double the national-bank circulation of most of the States of the West and South, upon the basis of wealth and population, do not feel the need of expansion so long as they can maintain this advantage through the unjust and unequal laws that now exist. The bill which they opposed so vehemently provided for contracting the circulation in the East and expanding it in the West, so as to secure something like equality; though it would have been far from securing complete equality, and would still have left the East with an advantage of many millions. Contraction, when it was to be applied to them, was a very objectionable measure. And the idea that the West should presume to demand an approach to equality in the amount of its circulating medium seemed to be regarded as sublimely impudent. All the insulting epithets and vulgar ridicule at the command of the facile writers and ingenious cartoonists of the New York press have been hurled in profusion upon all who have dared to support this measure of justice. They have by all the expedients within their reach—by dictatorial assumptions, by threats and blustering braggadocio, by extravagant misrepresentations and falsehoods—sought to enforce a despotism of opinion upon this subject which should silence opposition, and drive or drag not only the representatives of the people, but the people themselves, into submission to the power they serve. One of the greatest of the New York journals even told us that the success of this bill would be a justifiable cause of rebellion, and for the withdrawal of New York and New England from the Union. They have all manifested in an extraordinary degree that peculiar patriotism which would preserve the pledges and the honor of the Government without any sacrifice to themselves, and by the perpetuation of wrong and injustice upon the mass of the people. Contraction, when it threatened to touch the East, was a thing so fearful that they could see in it disastrous inflation, broken pledges, and lost honor; but when a paralyzing contraction is to be perpetuated in the West, leaving the East unmolested in the enjoyment of the opportunities secured by arbitrary law, they see in it only the vindication of national honor and the observance of solemn pledges.

THE SPIRIT OF WALL STREET.

Mr. Speaker, the power of great wealth is not to be despised. It is always arrogant, tyrannical, and merciless. It marshals a host of followers who fawn at its feet or bow at its command, and, caring for no interests but its own, it tramples with ruthless step upon every right of the people that stands in the way of its purposes. The haughty, intolerant tone of the metropolitan press that represents it in this controversy correctly reflects the spirit that animates it. Its desperation when threatened with restraint or the defeat of its schemes was well exemplified a few days ago by a member of the committee who came here from New York to influence the action of the President. While here upon that mission a distinguished member of that committee, whose reputation is not confined to New York nor to this country, boastingly and threateningly declared within the walls of this Capitol that he could raise $100,000 upon Wall street in an hour any time to defeat the re-election of any Senator who might vote for the currency bill passed by this House, then pending in the Senate; and he also declared his desire to share in paying the expenses of shipping this entire House of Representatives to Europe where we might be taught a little financial sense.

Sir, I do not doubt the ability of Wall street to raise the money for both these purposes, nor its disposition to do so, whenever its interests may seem to require it; and I am sure that Europe would furnish suitable schools for the financial education that Wall street would have this House possess. The financial theories of Europe have divided the people into two great classes; the one composed of the mass of the people, ground in hopeless poverty, trampled upon and degraded as if only created for the especial service of the few; the other a small aristocracy, owning everything, controlling everything, and dwelling amid luxury and princely magnificence, gathered from the sweat and toil of the millions who suffer and starve. The spirit of Wall street is the spirit of the European aristocracy; it is neither more generous nor merciful, and I do not question its willingness to pay well for the education of the American Congress in the financial theories of that aristocracy.

Mr. Speaker, we have heard much of theories lately. And those who have presumed to question the applicability of those theories to this country have been ridiculed as unwilling to learn from the great teachers. Let me inquire who those teachers were and for whom they wrote. Were they not of the favored few, and did they not write for the aristocracy. Sir, the theories of the books we are asked to accept were written in the exclusive interests of the European aristocracy—were written to aggregate wealth in their hands and to make their power more impregnable. They were not written for the people; their interests were not studied in their preparation; no thought of lifting the people from poverty to prosperity ever entered the minds of these learned writers, and their books would have been instantly condemned to oblivion if they had written in that direction.

Mr. Speaker, we have cast aside the governmental theories of Europe as utterly unsuited to a free people, and have developed new theories for ourselves. May we not stop to doubt whether the financial theories of Europe—theories written for another age and another civilization, and which have been the strong prop of monarchical and aristocratic rule, may not also be unsuited to a condition where equal privileges and opportunities are the boasted purposes of legislation? Shall those who consider the possibility of improvements to meet an improved and better condition of life among the people be charged with an unwillingness to learn? Rather may not those who refuse to regard the wide differences of purposes and circumstances and cling with blind tenacity to old theories be regarded as neglecting the lessons they should study.

But I can assure the representative of Wall street that he need not send this House abroad to learn European theories of finance. We have teachers here who understand them, and give us daily lessons in their mysteries. And if we do not learn to accept them as readily as Wall street would have us, a practical observation of their results upon the populations of Europe might not increase our admiration for them. From the stand-point of Wall street those theories are unquestionably sound; but looking at them from the fields where the people toil, there is room to doubt the wisdom of their application.

THE INCONSISTENCY OF EASTERN CONTRACTIONISTS.

Mr. Speaker, we have heard much of the solemn pledges of the Government. The opponents of the bill which lately came to an untimely fate were exceedingly active in their efforts to persuade the patriotic people of the country that that bill was a violation of a solemn pledge, and that its authors and supporters were indifferent to the national honor. Sir, the pledge of the Government is that it will redeem its obligations in coin at the "earliest practicable period." Wherein was that bill inconsistent with this pledge? It did not increase the obligations of the Government a single dollar. And it is worthy of remark in this connection that the very men who came here from New York and Boston to influence the President to veto the bill were among those who in September implored the same President to issue the $44,000,000 reserve for their relief, assuring him that the legal volume of greenbacks was just what that bill declares it to be. In now insisting that the bill would have violated pledges by increasing the national obligations, they confess that they were seeking to deceive and mislead the President last fall, and that they did persuade him to issue a part of that reserve in violation of law. This is the humiliating attitude in which they place themselves and the President. The bill indorsed their position and that of the President by confirming it, and for this they turn upon it, and denounce it as an unpatriotic and wicked violation of a solemn pledge.

The New York newspapers that to-day profess so much devotion to the national honor and so much hostility to any expansion, but a short time ago were filled with piteous appeals for "more money," and argued wisely against legislation to effect specie payments. Harper's "Journal of Civilization" told us last fall that the idea of bringing about specie payments by legislation was an utter delusion, and is to-day pursuing distinguished citizens, whose ability and patriotic services to the country should at least secure them decent respect, with coarse and brutal caricatures on account of their support of the defeated bill. The panic was upon New York then, and her capitalists were pinched. They appealed to the President for relief, and he responded. But with characteristic selfishness the currency so obtained was hoarded in their own vaults; while they proceeded to contract their credits everywhere, and especially to call in from the West every dollar that was due them, jealously hoarding it away, and producing thereby severe contraction in the West, and leaving the ultimate consequences of the panic to be suffered there. And now, with their plethoric vaults filled to overflowing by this operation, utterly regardless of the suffering of others, and with their fingers clutched tightly upon the business of the country, they send here a committee representing several hundred millions of capital, supported by another from the city of Boston scarcely less formidable, to tell the President that money is abundant, and that his approval of the bill legalizing what he did for their relief would be a violation of a solemn pledge for that very reason.

The cry of violated pledges coming from this source is the merest sham—a deceptive pretext to conceal what I have already shown to be the real cause of their opposition to the bill.

HOW TO RESUME.

The Government is pledged to redeem its obligations in coin at the "earliest practicable period." When will that period arrive? In his annual message the President told us that a specie basis could not be reached "until our exports, exclusive of gold, pay for our imports, interest due abroad, and others specie obligations, or so nearly so as to leave an appreciable accumulation of the precious metals in the country from the product of our mines." These are the President's words; and they express a truth which no one has successfully questioned.

And, now, when will this result be accomplished? We are paying in interest alone about $65,000,000 in gold per annum to Europe upon our obligations held there. We pay this interest in specie, and not a dollar of it in other exports. What are the steps necessary to be taken to enable us to pay these obligations otherwise than in gold? Is it not clearly to reduce the amount of our indebtedness in Europe and to increase our exports, other than specie? And does any one suppose that this can be most speedily effected by a financial policy which destroys the capacity of the people to pay taxes, depreciates their property, paralyzes their industries, and blights their prosperity?

The volume of money in the country when the rebellion began was found utterly insufficient to pay and supply the vast armies called into existence. The emergency demanded a great increase of currency. With that increase the war was carried on, the people sustained unparalleled taxation, and at the same time increased the national wealth to an amount almost equal to the growth of the previous century. The emergency which called into life the financial measures by which all this was accomplished has not yet entirely passed away. The war has indeed ceased, but much of the debt remains. And the policy which gave the country so great financial strength in the midst of the war should not be altogether abandoned in the effort to meet the indebtedness which the war has left us. That debt to-day stands between the country and specie payments, and nothing but its removal, or the ability to meet the interest upon it otherwise than by exporting specie to pay it, will enable us to return to a specie basis.

And this, sir, can only be done by a policy that will develop the resources of the country, and secure general prosperity among the people. During the eleven years from 1863 to 1873, inclusive, the people paid into the national Treasury an amount of taxes largely in excess of the present amount of the national debt. If 50 per cent. were added to that debt to-day it would still not equal by more than $200,000,000 the amount of taxes drawn from the people within the brief period I have named. Does any one suppose that this extraordinary achievement could have been accomplished with the volume of money that existed when the war began, or under the policy now urged upon the country by the contractionists? No sane man will pretend that it could. But, sir, with the same opportunities enjoyed during that period, and with no greater rates of taxation than they then sustained, the people could pay the current expenses of the Government and every dollar of the national debt in a period of ten years, and suffer far less while doing it than they would under the policy of contraction without paying a dollar of the debt.

But this is of course not desired. It is desirable, however, that there should be some reduction of the debt, and that all of it should be held by our own citizens. Provide the people with fair opportunities, and, without paying the debt, it can be funded in a new bond which they can take. We should thereby be relieved of our foreign obligations which drain us of our gold and prevent a return to specie payments.

INCREASED TAXATION.

The President accompanies his veto message with a recommendation for increased taxation, which he says is necessary to prepare the way for specie payments. This recommendation is of course consistent with the theory upon which the message is based. But, sir, the country is in no condition to endure increased taxation. The thumb-screw policy of squeezing the life out of the people for the benefit of the bondholders has already blighted their prosperity, and is threatening all who are in debt with inevitable bankruptcy. The policy of contraction has depreciated their property and rendered it unsalable, and has correspondingly increased the value of every obligation held against them either by the bondholders or their private creditors, and they are now almost at the mercy of those to whom they are indebted. Contraction has benefited nobody but the lenders of money; and to add to its evils the burden of increased taxation would complete the folly of bending every interest to the will and greed of the money power. A short time ago the people were prosperous and able to pay heavy taxes, but the facilities which made them so have been deliberately taken from them; and until money sufficient for the easy and natural transaction of business is restored, increased taxation is neither wise nor just.

Mr. Speaker, the most effective enemies of a return to a specie basis are those who through the policy of contraction would retard the development of the country, paralyze the industries of the people, repress their energies, and destroy their prosperity, so that they cannot pay taxes with which to reduce the debt, or produce exports with which to meet the interest abroad. They would prolong unnecessarily the day when pledges shall be redeemed and the national honor vindicated, and would, if successful in enforcing their policy, bring upon the people great suffering and disaster. Neither the shortest nor the smoothest road to resumption lies in the direction they are traveling. Assuming to be the especial and only friends of specie payments, and reproaching all who differ from them with disregard for the pledges of the Government and the honor of the country, they are the determined foes of the very policy which would make the redemption of pledges most speedily possible and least oppress and burden the people.

HOW FARMERS SHOULD GET MONEY.

Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose now to enter upon any general examination of the many sophistries with which it has been attempted to mislead the people of the West; but there are one or two to which I wish to refer. It has been continually insisted that an expansion of the currency would do the West no good; and farmers especially have been told that they can only get money by producing something to sell for it in the eastern markets, where money is plenty. Plausible as this may seem to the unthinking, it is full of untruth and deception. The farmer can no more conduct his business without the use of money than the New York merchant or those who purchase the farmer's products to speculate upon. The latter classes get their money from the banks. The great commercial transactions of the country are largely carried on with money borrowed from these sources. It is the business of the banks in the cities to supply money for such uses, and it is now accessible in New York to responsible business men in ample quantities and at fair rates of interest. Is there any reason why farmers should be denied equal opportunities for obtaining the use of money; that they should be told that they can have no credit, and shall only have money when they have something to sell for it? Shall the farmer who needs a horse or a plow with which to cultivate a crop, or who may wish to purchase stock or to enlarge and extend his operations, be told that there is no money accessible to him for such uses?—that loans are exclusively for the accommodation of the commercial classes? Besides, sir, it must be remembered that the business transactions of the farmer are not confined to the sale of his products for eastern markets. There is a large local and home traffic carried on by farmers, upon which their prosperity largely depends. They do not always sell their horses, sheep, mules, corn, oats, and many other products to eastern purchasers nor for eastern markets; and to carry on this trade, to give activity and vitality to this important home traffic, they need the use of money just as much as the merchant, the manufacturer, or the speculator, and there is no reason why they should not be able to obtain accommodations in the same way.

But it is not always necessary that they should borrow what they need. A hundred dollars borrowed by one man will pass through the hands of scores of others, paying debts, purchasing the necessaries of life, employing labor, and so giving relief to the wants of many and activity and life to the business of all. Sir, to insist that farmers shall only obtain the use of money when they have something to sell to the favored centers of the East, and to tell them that they can only so obtain it, is an insult to their intelligence and an outrage upon their rights. It is utterly untrue that farmers are not benefited when money is abundant, and when it can be obtained to meet the varying demands of business, just as much as any other class. During the six years immediately following the war, when money was abundant, they were unusually prosperous. They extended their improvements, expanded their operations, increased their flocks and herds, produced more to sell, and shared equally in the unexampled prosperity of that period. And no other portion of our people are suffering more to-day from the pinching policy of contraction than the agricultural classes.

THE WEST NEEDS MONEY AND NOT CAPITAL.

Again, Mr. Speaker, we are told that the West and South are poor and ought not to expect money to be plentiful. I answer that money is essential to the production of wealth; it is the agency with which wealth is developed, and if the West and South are poor they have greater need of that agency. Wealth can no more be produced without the use of money than houses can be built without the use of the tools of the mechanic. It is, sir, the indispensable agent of all business and without which business must die and the people lapse into barbarism.

But, sir, it is utterly false that the West is poor. There is an abundance of capital there. Examine the census reports of 1870 and compare the wealth of the Western States with that of the States of New England, and it will be found that the West is not afflicted with poverty. Why, sir, the single State of Illinois paid into the national Treasury last year taxes amounting to more than three times the sum that was paid by all the six New England States together. And yet, sir, the Government supplies Illinois with a bank-note circulation of only $17,824,209, while the New England States are supplied with $110,489,966. Missouri, too poor to need or expect much money, as we are told, paid taxes to the Government last year amounting to over $4,000,000, while the six New England States only paid a little over $5,000,000. And yet Missouri receives only $6,000,000 of the bank-note circulation against the $110,000,000 of New England.

Sir, it is not capital but money that the West needs—money with which to handle her property and conduct her business. I know that the taxation I have referred to does not correctly represent the relative wealth of the States. This taxation is unequal and is the result of an unjust system as indefensible as the distribution of the currency circulation. But it is still true that the West has an abundance of capital, and only needs currency with which to handle that capital and give activity to business in order to make her people again prosperous.

THE POWER OF CAPITAL.

Mr. Speaker, I know that the power of vast wealth combined in the hands of the few is almost irresistible. Public men too often seem to stand in awe of it and to fear its frown. Its threats and its blandishments are too often effectual in silencing the tongue of opposition. Controlling the great metropolitan press, which reaches the whole country, disseminating opinions which too many of the less prominent newspapers are prone to accept and follow as their guide, and which the people do not always stop to question, it has seldom failed to lead the country captive and to make its will the law of the land. Bringing into its service all the agencies which give direction to public thought and mold and shape the public judgment, and concealing its artful purposes beneath plausible sophistries and false assumptions, the people are scarcely informed of their rights, nor the wrongs sought to be imposed upon them, until they feel the weight of the heavy hand upon them. Sir, since this discussion began we have seen men in high places and in low bowing at the command of this power. The arrogance of the New York press, its assumptions of superior wisdom and virtue, its frantic pretensions of regard for the national honor, its impetuous assaults and boastful threats, sustained as it has been by the loud chorus of the power behind it, have seemed to sweep away the self-confidence and independence of men; and we have seen newspapers, and men of intelligence and integrity, beginning to doubt their own judgments, and, finally, yielding up their oft-expressed opinions, gliding meekly into the crooked and contradictory tracks of the selfish and unscrupulous power that has beguiled their judgment.

But, sir, when injustice and wrong are carried to the degree of oppression, when the people begin to feel the weight of the shackles that bind them, they will open their eyes to the source from whence that wrong proceeds. And I predict now that the victory over which Wall street gloats to-day will prove to be a costly one in the end. The struggle which her greed has provoked will not cease where it now rests; and when it shall have ended it may be found that her pride and power have been humbled, and that the people are yet sovereign. Leaders of parties, newspapers, and politicians may bow to the decision of the moment and accept it with assumed grace, but adherence to the oppressive policy it indicates will drive the people to resistance and bring into power men from whom the banks and bondholders of Wall street will not hope to exact more than "the pound of flesh nominated in the bond."

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, when I came here in November last to attend the present session of Congress I had no intention of occupying the time of the House with any views of my own upon the financial question.

I had views, satisfactory at least to myself, as to what was demanded of us by the peculiar condition and necessities of the country; but I did not feel that the views I entertained were so essentially different from those of a majority of the House as to require that I should to any extent antagonize my own to theirs. But, more than that, the industries of this great nation were then, as now, stretched and bound upon the iron bed of our Procrustean system of finance, and I felt that the case was too urgent for words, and that the country desired and expected of us immediate action. I considered the matter to be so urgent, that I was unwilling to defer the action of Congress for a single hour by prolonging the discussion. But others thought or at least acted differently, and a financial discussion took place which was interjected between all the pauses of business and continued through the first four months of the session.

Able as that discussion has been, I doubt whether it has changed a single vote or the opinion of any member of this House; and if this is so, I certainly cannot hope that any effort of my own will do so.

Why, then, do I speak? I speak, sir, because the just demands of the people I represent, and whose interests in this respect are identical with those of the whole West and South, have been denied, and their appeals for relief from the effects of a rigid, unyielding system of finance, as well as their claims for justice and equality under that system, have been disregarded. I speak because the events of the past few weeks have demonstrated that the money-rings of Wall street, their aiders and hirelings—the wreckers of finance who plunder the unfortunate tradesman and farmer as the wreckers of the sea plunder the shipwrecked mariner—the Shylocks intent upon cutting their pound of flesh though they spill the life-blood of the nation in taking it, are all united by the instinct of rapacity and the hope of plunder, intent upon maintaining the monopoly which they hold of the currency of the nation; a monopoly by which they are becoming rich and powerful at the expense of the industry and labor of the country.

I speak, sir, for a people who have cheerfully borne their full share of the heavy burden which was necessarily imposed in the act and as a consequence of maintaining the life and honor of the nation; a people who live by honest industry; who earn their bread as God commanded, "in the sweat of their faces," by hard, unremitting labor; a people who are, and ever will be, ready to bear their share of the necessary public burdens, but who refuse now and henceforth to be plundered to satisfy the rapacity—if indeed it were possible—of those who have obtained a monopoly of the money of the country.

The subject which has been so long discussed in the country and in Congress, and which has now been referred back for our consideration by the veto of the President, involves two questions.

The first is as to a proper, fair, and equal distribution of the banking currency among the different States and sections of the country.

The second is in regard to the wisdom and necessity of providing for an increase in the amount of the circulation commensurate with the growth and development of the nation.

I shall discuss these questions in the order named.

First, as to the distribution of the banking currency among the several States.

The sentiment of fairness and equality is predominant in the American mind; it is the foundation of our political institutions. That sense of justice and equality makes the American hate special privileges and monopoly in any form, whether for the benefit of individuals or sections of the country. And what can be more odious to the people or more destructive to their industry and prosperity than a monopoly of the money or of the power of issuing it?

Money is the very life-blood of industry, and without it there can be no prosperity. Take it away, and the busy hum of industry ceases, the workshop is silent, and the plow rusts in the furrow. Put it under the control of the money-lenders, and it enables them to chain and enslave our industries, to wring from the toiling millions every dollar of their profit.

The privilege of issuing bank-notes should either be free to all upon the same terms so that every State may share equally in its benefits, and the people of every State, through the competition which would thus be created, may reap all its advantages in having money abundant at low rates of interest, or else the privilege of issuing money should be denied to all and the necessary circulation supplied by the Government. I do not propose on this occasion to discuss the relative advantages of these two modes of supplying money, or to attempt to demonstrate which would be cheapest and best for the Government and people. However important that question may be, I know that practically it will be useless to discuss it at this time. But certainly we should have free banking or no banking at all.

I trust no one will misunderstand me. I would not return to the era of shin-plasters. I would not return to the old system of State banks. I would have every dollar of bank circulation secured, as now, by a United States bond deposited in the Treasury of the United States, so that the bank-notes of Missouri would be as good in Maine or California as at home. But I would take away the monopoly of the present system by which the rate of interest is kept up to an exorbitant figure at the expense of the people and to the ruin of their industries, and nearly all the benefits of banking are confined to a few States and money centers to the exclusion and at the expense of all other States and sections.

To show in the plainest manner the gross inequality and monopoly of the present system, and the outrageous injustice which is being done to the South and West, I desire to call attention to a table which I take from the last annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency, which shows the apportionment according to population and wealth of the authorized banking circulation of $354,000,000, and its actual distribution, together with the amount of the excess or deficiency in each State.

Here is the table:

The lesson which a comparison of these two tables teaches is instructive, and I wish it could be read by every honest voter in the United States. I think it would convince them that right and justice in this contest are on the side of those who are contending for a change in our financial policy.

And yet we who have only asked for justice and equality toward the people we represent have been constantly denounced as inflationists and repudiators by certain leading newspapers, the subsidized organs of monopoly, because we are striving to break up these money-rings and give to the people of the West and South an equal share in the benefits of the national-bank circulation; striving to emancipate the industrial classes everywhere from the extortion which has reduced many to poverty and some to starvation; striving to restore prosperity on the farm and in the workshop.

For one, I care nothing for the slander and misrepresentations which a venal press may publish, for I know that the people are not idle spectators; I know that when they learn the truth, as they certainly will learn it, they will rally to the support of their own cause in such a manner as will give a fitting rebuke to these corrupt rings and their purchased organs.

And now, sir, let us look at the table first referred to and see what it discloses. We see first that the Eastern States, according to the table prepared by the Comptroller of the Currency, are entitled to a bank circulation of $39,799,920, and that they actually have $110,489,966, or $70,690,046 more than their share; that the Middle States have $9,416,503 more than their share, while, on the other hand, the Southern States (and Missouri is in this list) have $51,271,034 less than their share; the Western States $21,423,811 less than their share, and the Pacific States and the Territories $7,926,648 less than their share.

In view of these facts, is it any wonder that money is scarce in the South and West, and that the people complain of high rates of interest? Is it any wonder that those entire sections begin to feel the drain upon their resources caused by the payment of exorbitant interest, which does not remain at home but goes to swell the enormous wealth of the Wall street speculator? And I might add, is it any wonder that the rings which control this vast money monopoly can afford to buy up newspapers to misrepresent the facts and slander the representatives of the people who are trying to break it up?

Again, to go a little further into details, this table shows that the little State of Rhode Island, which has a population according to the census of 1870, of only 217,353, has a national-bank circulation of $13,385,840; while the great State of Missouri, the fifth State in importance in the Union, with a population of 1,721,295, has a national-bank circulation of only $6,476,193.

If $13,385,840 of bank circulation is necessary for the people of Rhode Island, the people of Missouri are entitled to have, if they choose to take it, a sum as much greater as the ratio of the population of Missouri is greater than the population of Rhode Island, which would give Missouri a bank circulation of $105,748,136, or $99,271,943 more money than Missouri now has. Massachusetts, on an apportionment of population and wealth, is entitled to a circulation of $19,239,189, and Missouri on a like apportionment is entitled to $15,459,409. Taking the difference between them, we find that Massachusetts is entitled to $3,779,780 more than Missouri; but Massachusetts actually has $59,523,671, or $53,047,478 more than Missouri. And when we complain of this inequality and demand simple justice toward the people of the South and West, the demand is received with derision, and we are tauntingly told that we are not bankers, have not been educated in Wall street, and are too ignorant to understand the complex subject of finance.

The six New England States, with a national-bank circulation of $110,489,966, or $70,690,046 more than they are entitled to under existing laws, blandly inform us that money is plenty and that no more circulation is needed; and New York, with a circulation of $60,976,000 or not far from twice as much as all of the fourteen Southern States put together, joins New England in the assertion that money is plenty, and loads the columns of a venal press with abuse of those who demand justice and equality for the South and West.

I now desire to call attention to some instructive facts which are disclosed by a comparison of these two tables. I desire to show who pay the taxes as compared with those who are favored with an undue share of the bank circulation.

Referring to the second table before given, we find that the six New England States paid the following amounts of internal taxes to the national Government in the year 1873:

Maine	$212,893
New Hampshire	324,089
Vermont	67,475
Massachusetts	3,669,950
Rhode Island	322,701
Connecticut	871,871
Total	5,468,979

By the same table we ascertain that the State of Virginia alone paid $7,331,833, or $1,862,854 more than all of the six New England States. Yet the six New England States have a banking circulation of $110,489,966, while the State of Virginia has only $3,902,342; and upon these facts New England says that money is plenty, and that Virginia does not want any more and that her people are inflationists to desire it.

Sir, we have recently heard a great outcry against the sin and folly of "inflation." It is held up to us as the sum of all financial villainies and errors. Whence does this holy outcry proceed? It comes from New England and from Wall street. It comes from States that are themselves inflated with upwards of $80,000,000 more than their share of the money.

Is it surprising that we of the West and South are not able to apprehend the danger or to have much confidence in the sincerity or honesty of those who raise the outcry. Is it surprising that when the people of Rhode Island, who have $61.59 of national-bank notes to each inhabitant, and who memorialize Congress against depriving them of a single dollar of it—is it surprising, I say, that when such a people, so situated, raise the cry against "inflation" that the people of Arkansas, who have only forty cents of national-bank notes to each inhabitant, are not able to apprehend that the sin or danger of inflation, if there be any, lies at their doors?

Notwithstanding the old adage that comparisons are odious I propose to make another. By the second table it appears that in the year 1873 Massachusetts paid taxes to the national Government to the amount of $3,669,950, and that the same year Missouri paid $4,240,089, or upward of half a million dollars more than Massachusetts. And yet Massachusetts has $59,523,671 of the circulation, while Missouri has only $6,476,193; and on these facts Massachusetts says that money is plenty; that Missouri does not need any more, would not take it if it was offered to her; and that it would spoil a very nice system of finance to disturb the present arrangement.

Doubtless we of the West are very stupid and ignorant in the opinion of the money-lenders; but surely it is not surprising that we are not able to look at this question from their stand-point or to have a very high opinion of the sincerity or disinterestedness of their motives.

But it has been said that the West is not herself united upon this question. I affirm that all the industrial classes of the West, her farmers, manufacturers, professional men, merchants, miners, and laborers, are almost unanimous.

But of course those individuals who have secured what little bank circulation the West has been able to obtain are some of them, like their Wall street prototypes, anxious to maintain the monopoly which they now enjoy, anxious to avoid that competition which free banking would establish and by which the rate of interest would be greatly reduced.

I now propose to examine some of the so-called reasoning by which gentlemen who are benefited by this monopoly of money seek to justify it. They tell us, first, that money will flow where it is most needed, and that therefore the place of the fountain, the locality of the bank, is a matter of no importance. Unfortunately, sir, we know from painful experience that it does not flow where it is most needed, but often quite the reverse.

But the argument is not true in any point of view in which it may be regarded. Banks loan to their immediate customers, and the greater part of their money circulates in the vicinity of the bank. They all loan upon short time of thirty, sixty, or ninety days, so that their money is being constantly returned, and the greater part of it cannot circulate at any great distance from the fountain-head. The fact that bank-bills are often found at a great distance from the institution by which they are issued proves nothing against this theory, because their place is supplied by the bills of other banks or by legal-tenders.

Again, we are told that we of the West and South have not the capital and could not organize banks for circulation if we had the chance. If we could not it would certainly do no harm to give us an opportunity. But it is worthy of notice that the persons who made this assertion were the ones who made the greatest outcry against the bill which permitted it. It is by no means true that we have not the capital. The assessed value of the wealth of Missouri, according to the census of 1870 was $556,129,969, while that of Vermont was only $102,548,528, the wealth of Missouri being more than five times greater than that of Vermont; yet Vermont has more national-bank circulation than Missouri. The State of Connecticut with only $429,433,237 of wealth has nearly three times more bank circulation than Missouri.

Sir, we have frequently been told by those who assert that the South and West do not need more national-bank circulation, that those sections have failed to take up the amount to which they are entitled under existing laws, and that currency for new banks for the South and West can be obtained by applying to the Comptroller of the Currency. This statement has probably deceived no Representative from those sections, because most if not all of them know from actual trial that it is false. But I am sorry to say that it has deceived the President of the United States, and that he has given it currency and the sanction of his authority. In his message of April 22, 1874, vetoing the Senate currency bill, in the last paragraph, he says:

> It is claimed by the advocates of the measure herewith returned that there is an unequal distribution of the banking capital of the country. I was disposed to give great weight to this view of the question at first, but on reflection it will be remembered that there still remain $4,000,000 of authorized bank-note circulation, assigned to States having less than their quota not yet taken.
> In addition to this the States having less than their quota of bank circulation have the option of twenty-five millions more, to be taken from those States having more than their proportion.

Now, sir, although I knew from actual previous inquiry and investigation that the President was entirely mistaken, yet as his statement was well calculated to mislead the country upon this matter, I deemed it advisable to obtain a written statement from the Comptroller of the Currency of the facts, and with that view I immediately addressed to him written inquiries upon the subject.

The following is the correspondence in full between myself and the Comptroller. It shows conclusively how utterly baseless is the assertion that there is any currency available for the establishment of new banks in Missouri or in any other State:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 22, 1874.

DEAR SIR: The President in his veto message to-day states that there is still $4,000,000 of national-bank currency remaining in the Treasury subject to the demand of sections desiring it that have secured less than their quota.

I do not pretend to give his exact language, not having seen the message, but I think the above is the substance.

Missouri has received far less than her quota of such currency. Why is she not entitled to a part of this $4,000,000? There is a demand for it from the section I represent, but no effort was made because it was understood that none could be had.

Will you please inform me at your earliest convenience whether any part of this currency can be had to establish national banks in Missouri, and oblige your obedient servant,

IRA B. HYDE.

Hon. JOHN JAY KNOX,
Comptroller of the Currency.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY,
Washington, April 24, 1874.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 22d instant.

The $4,200,000 of circulation referred to in the President's message was long since assigned to applicants in the States which were deficient, in accordance with the act of July 12, 1870, and all applications from Missouri with proper indorsements have been granted whenever there was any circulation at my disposal.

During the month of March letters were addressed to all applicants, requiring that the necessary amount of bonds to secure circulation should be deposited within thirty days or circulation would be distributed to other applicants, and, as far as practicable, such currency has been redistributed to the States to which it was originally allotted. Four small banks in your State have been recently authorized, circulation to be supplied from circulation previously assigned to parties who had failed to perfect their organizations, and no applications with the proper indorsements are now on file in this office from your State.

Very respectfully,

JOHN JAY KNOX,
Comptroller.

Hon. IRA B. HYDE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 25, 1874.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 24th instant in reply to mine of the 22d.

I am not quite sure that I understand your answer to the main point of my inquiry, which is this, have you now at your disposal any national-bank circulation which you could grant for a new bank in the State of Missouri, provided the application, properly indorsed, was to be immediately made?

Very respectfully, yours,

IRA B. HYDE.

Hon. JOHN JAY KNOX,
Comptroller of the Currency.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY,
Washington, April 27, 1874.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 25th instant.

There is no currency at this date at my disposal for the organization of additional national banks. I write to-day to a national bank in the city of Saint Louis who are entitled to $100,000 of additional circulation. If they are not prepared to deposit the necessary amount of bonds, I can then organize the national bank proposd by you.

Very respectfully,

JOHN JAY KNOX,
Comptroller.

Hon. IRA B. HYDE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Again, to show in the most striking manner the inequality of the national bank circulation according to population, I submit the following facts and figures: The bank-note circulation of Rhode Island to each inhabitant is $61.59; that of Arkansas is forty cents. Massachusetts has $40.84 to each inhabitant, while Missouri has only $3.76. Connecticut has $33.48 per capita, and Iowa has $4.75.

Comparing the present national-bank circulation with the circulation of the State banks in 1862, we find that the bank-note circulation of Massachusetts has increased $17.32, to each inhabitant since 1862, while that of Missouri has increased only thirty-four cents in the same period.

These comparisons might be extended almost indefinitely, but it would only be piling Pelion upon Ossa.

Certainly, the facts already adduced make the monopoly and inequality of the present system sufficiently manifest, and call loudly for a change in favor of the industrial classes of the West and South.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what remedy do the gentlemen who represent this monopoly propose?

Do they propose to give the West and South a proportion of currency equal to that of New England and New York? No; they are determined that not an additional dollar of circulation shall be authorized.

Do they propose to give up their enormous excess of the present currency in favor of the States which are deficient?

By no means.

Rhode Island, with a circulation of $61.59 per capita, says through her governor and Senators, and by memorials presented in this House by her entire delegation, that she has none to spare, and that it would greatly embarrass her industries to deprive her of any part of the currency which she now has, and yet according to population she has fifteen times more than Missouri; but, nevertheless, one of her Senators and all of her Representatives voted against a bill which would have deprived them of no part of the currency which they hold, and would have supplied to Missouri and other States only a small part of their deficiency.

Both New York and Boston have a large excess, and both sent delegations of capitalists to the White House to urge the President to veto a bill which granted to the West and South only a small part of the currency to which they are entitled; yet from New York and Boston there comes no offer to surrender any part of the enormous excess of circulation which they hold. I warn these gentlemen that they cannot afford to go before the country upon such an issue. Surely they underrate the intelligence of the people if they suppose that any amount of newspaper misrepresentation can prevent them from seeing and comprehending the real issue.

Sir, I have noticed with regret that New York and New England, so far as they voted, (General BUTLER only excepted,) were solid against the currency bill. It is true that the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] proposes that the States having an excess of the currency give up twenty-five millions of that excess in favor of States having the greatest deficiency. This is already the law, but it has never been complied with and perhaps never will be.

But why not give up the whole excess of over eighty millions? The principle of the expedient proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, though applied in a different way, has been found effective under certain circumstances, but I hardly think it will meet the present case. An infuriated whale might be induced to exhaust his strength in lashing a tub while the ship sailed majestically out of the way; but an intelligent people are not generally presumed to be as easily deceived. The States having a deficiency are clearly entitled to their entire quota of the currency if they can use it; and for one I will never consent to anything short of absolute justice and equality toward the people I represent.

Far be it from me to excite or keep alive sectional strife or prejudice, and if it is to arise out of the discussion of this question the responsibility shall not be mine. It must rest upon the shoulders of those who are bent upon maintaining a most burdensome and intolerable monopoly.

Second. The other branch of the question which I propose to consider is in regard to the wisdom or necessity of providing for an increase of the amount of currency in circulation.

The finances of this country are now in a most unusual, if not absolutely unprecedented condition. The iron grasp of contraction during a series of years has compressed the authorized circulation to a fixed amount which no advancement in wealth and population and no necessities of business are allowed to increase to the amount of a single dollar.

At what other period in the history of the world has the industry, enterprise, and development of a great people been so fettered, bound, and confined by laws which absolutely prohibit any increase of the means of development?

I say prohibit any increase of the means of development, for you cannot find a beggar upon your streets so ignorant as not to know that money is a necessary means for material progress and development. It is money which builds our railroads and canals, our ships and locomotives; money which develops our farms, mines, and manufactures. Without it individual as well as corporate enterprise would cease, and a nation become like the savages upon our western borders.

This nation is now in a condition as unparalleled as it is unnatural. Never until the year succeeding the late war was the iron, unyielding, unbending rule of contraction applied to our finances.

Prior to 1860 gold and silver were in circulation, and the amount was constantly increasing or decreasing according to the varying necessities, wants, or vicissitudes of business. Prior, also, to 1863 the bank-note circulation was unrestricted and was permitted to adjust itself to the increasing development of the country. And from 1863 to 1865 the Government supplied a circulating medium in amounts constantly increasing. That, notwithstanding the enormous taxation required to carry on the war, was the period of our greatest prosperity. The statistics abundantly prove it.

But if further proof is needed, I appeal to the farmer, the merchant, the professional man, the mechanic, and the laborer, to every man, in short, who earns his bread by labor either mental or manual, to say if in 1865 his circumstances were not in every respect better than they are to-day; and I appeal to them further to say if they have not been on the downward road ever since 1866, when the contraction of the currency commenced.

What, sir, has been the effect of contraction upon the western farmer? His land has greatly diminished in value, and in many parts of the West cannot be sold at all; the profits upon the products of his farm have been constantly diminishing, while the interest upon money has as constantly increased. This contraction of the currency has not only depreciated the value of all tangible property, real and personal, but has at last most seriously checked all material development, stopped our manufactures, deprived hundreds of thousands of our people of employment, and arrested on every side the progress of the nation.

With the currency rigidly fixed at an amount which cannot be increased, the development of new industries and the increase of population, which are ordinarily the greatest blessings, are almost turned to curses by creating new demands for money which cannot be supplied, and thus contributing to greater stringency and increasing the rate of interest.

If this policy is long continued, the rate of interest, which now averages three times higher than the average profits of any legitimate industry, must continue to increase until the money-lenders own the entire country.

When I consider the amount of contraction which has taken place since 1865 I am not surprised at the present deplorable condition of our industries. The only wonder is that they were not sooner destroyed.

The following tables show the amount of money in circulation in the years 1865 and 1873:

Legal-tenders and currency	$709,334,421
National-bank notes	236,636,098
Total non-interest bearing	945,970,519
Add seven-thirty notes of 1864 and 1865	830,000,000
Total	1,775,970,519

1873.
Legal-tenders and currency	$427,607,706
3 per cent. certificates	5,000
National-bank notes	348,516,478
Total	776,129,184

RECAPITULATION
Amount of note circulation in 1865	$945,970,519
Amount of note circulation in 1873	776,129,184
Difference	169,841,335
Add the seven-thirties	830,000,000
Total contraction	999,841,335

I estimate the seven-thirties as a part of the contraction because they were generally used to supply the place of money. When it is remembered that before the close of the war in 1865 this vast amount of money was circulating only in the Northern States, and that since then it has not only had to do service for the whole country but for a greatly increased population, we can better appreciate the effect and force of the enormous contraction which has taken place. By many it is supposed that contraction has been the sole agency by which greenbacks have been appreciated and the price of gold decreased. There never was a greater error, as the statistics abundantly prove. The greater part of the contraction took place between May, 1865, and May, 1869, and yet the price of gold actually increased during that period. In May, 1865, gold stood at 128½, and in May, 1869, at 144¾. In 1869 Congress stopped the policy of contraction as inaugurated by Secretary McCulloch, and yet gold has steadily declined. The effect of contraction upon the business of the country has been slower but no less certain. The question whether we have enough money in circulation may be fairly tested by a comparison with the circulation of other countries.

The following table from the Bureau of Statistics shows the amount of money on a gold basis in circulation in the countries named, deducting the bank reserves in each case, together with the population and the amount of circulation to each inhabitant:

Countries.	Circulation.	Population.	Per capita.
Great Britain	$683,000,000	32,000,000	$21 34
France	1,509,000,000	36,000,000	41 91
United States	587,700,000	41,000,000	14 33

Now, sir, the facts disclosed by an examination of this table are, to say the least, suggestive. Although the United States has as yet but few of the paupers and poor, destitute laborers who are found by the million in the other countries named, and although our population are scattered over a vast extent of territory and are engaged in building up and improving a new country, a work which requires tenfold more capital than is required in a country where these improvements have already been made, yet we see that the United States has much less money to each inhabitant than either of the countries referred to, and but little over one-third the amount in France. And when we consider the unequal distribution of this currency in the United States, is it any wonder that money is scarce in the West and that western industries are suffering? The effects of a contraction of the currency are too well known and have been too severely felt by the debtor and industrial classes of other countries as well as our own to require any illustration.

If we had been disposed to avail ourselves of the light of experience and to take warning from the misfortunes of other nations in like circumstances, we might have avoided the evils from which we now suffer.

The following extract from Alison's History of Europe, cited on a former occasion by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] shows that this ruinous policy of contraction has obtained in other countries besides our own, and that the effect was then as now to fill the coffers of the rich money-lenders at the expense of all other classes:

The evils complained of arose from the unavoidable result of a stationary currency, coexisting with a rapid increase in the numbers and transactions of mankind, and these were only aggravated by every addition made to the energies and productive powers of society. * * * But if an increase in the numbers and industry of men coexists with a diminution in the circulating medium by which their transactions are carried on, the most serious evils await society, and the whole relations of its different classes to each other will be speedily changed; and it is in that state of things that the saying proves true, that "the rich are every day growing richer and the poor poorer."

It is truly said that "history repeats itself," and if the policy of the American contractionists prevail we shall soon be launched into the universal ruin which prostrated England in 1823, when her political economists, theorists, and fools were trying, as our so-called statesmen now are, to reach specie payments by contraction of the paper circulation.

It will be remembered that England had suspended specie payments during the war with Napoleon, as every nation must in an emergency. And immediately after the close of the war in 1815 the work of contraction commenced, and by act of Parliament the 1st day of May, 1823, was the day fixed for the resumption of specie payments.

The following short extract from Doubleday's Financial History of England will give an idea of some of the consequences of that act of folly:

As the memorable 1st of May, 1823, drew near, the country bankers, as well as the Bank of England, naturally prepared themselves, by a gradual narrowing of their circulation, for the dreaded hour of gold and silver payments "on demand," and the withdrawal of the small notes. We have already seen the fall in prices produced by this universal narrowing of the paper circulation. The effects of the distress produced all over the country, the consequence of this fall, we have yet to see.

The distress, ruin, and bankruptcy which now took place were universal, affecting both the great interests of land and trade; but among the landlords whose estates were burdened by mortgages, jointures, settlements, legacies, &c., the effects were most marked and out of the ordinary course. In hundreds of cases, from the tremendous reduction in the price of land which now took place, the estates barely sold for as much as would pay off the mortgages; and hence the owners were stripped of all and made beggars. I was myself personally acquainted with one of the victims of this terrible measure. He was a school-fellow, and inherited a good fortune, made principally in the West Indies. On coming of age and settling with his guardians, he found himself possessed of fully £40,000; and with this he resolved to purchase an estate, to marry, and settle for life. He was a young man addicted to no vice, of a fair understanding and most excellent heart, and was connected with friends high in rank and likely to afford him every proper assistance and advice. The estate was purchased, I believe, about the year 1812 or 1813, for £80,000, one moiety of the purchase-money being borrowed on mortgage of the land bought. In 1822-'23 he was compelled to part with the estate in order to pay off his mortgage and some arrears of interest; and when this was done he was left without a shilling, the estate bringing only half of its cost in 1812! Thus, without imprudence or fault of any kind, was this amiable man, together with his family, plunged in irretrievable and inevitable ruin, by the act of a legislature which ought to have protected both, and which was fully warned of the consequences of what it was about to do; but which, in requital, chose to laugh those who warned to utter scorn. My readers must not suppose that this was either an exaggerated or uncommon case. On the contrary, the country teemed with similar examples, and on the commencement of the session of 1823 the tables of both Houses were loaded with petitions, detailing scenes of hardship and destitution appalling in the extreme.

This is the policy and these are the results which the money-lenders of Wall street are trying to precipitate upon this country. Contraction has ever been the rich money-hoarders' policy to legalize their wholesale robbery of all the industrial classes. It is a general confiscation of the property of all of the toiling millions to add to the overflowing treasuries of the rich; it is indeed the policy which "makes the rich richer and the poor poorer."

We have had a taste of contraction, and we are now asked to complete our imitation of the folly and crime of England by fixing a day when we will resume specie payments.

Sir, there are two roads to resumption of specie payments.

One is by the capitalist's road of contraction which would reduce our paper circulation down to nearly $140,000,000, (for that is all the specie there is in the United States;) depreciate our property to absolutely nothing; prostrate every kind of industry; deprive millions of our people of the means of living, and end in enabling the capitalists to own all the valuable property in the country.

The other road to resumption is by giving the people the means with which to improve their farms, build up our manufactories, and develop our mines, and with the surplus products of our industries pay off a portion of the national debt, and create a balance of trade in our favor so that money will flow into and not out of the country.

The former is the road which leads through stagnation of business and wide-spread bankruptcy and ruin; the latter is the road, no less certain, of attaining specie payments, which leads to it through remunerative industry and universal prosperity. The former is the capitalists' policy; the later is the people's policy. "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve."

How are we to accumulate specie with which to resume so long as we are buying more than we sell, and are besides sending $72,000,000 in gold and silver annually out of the country to pay the interest on the national debt and railroad bonds held abroad?

Some say by increased taxation. "Taxation and contraction!" A fine policy indeed! Loading a mill-wheel with weights and attempting to run it without water.

The impossibility of reaching a specie basis except by such national prosperity as will put the balance of trade largely in our favor is clearly stated by President Grant in his last annual message, in which he says:

A specie basis cannot be reached and maintained until our exports, exclusive of gold, pay for our imports, interest due abroad, and other specie obligations, or so nearly so as to leave an appreciable accumulation of the precious metals in the country from the products of our mines.

Let us now look a little further to the effects which contraction has already produced upon the western farmer.

Contraction, by making money scarce necessarily made it dear, just as a scarcity of wheat or corn will enhance the price. It therefore increased the rate of interest. Of course, the scarcer and dearer money became, the more land, cattle, and grain it bought. In other words, all kinds of tangible property depreciated in value; but the debt did not depreciate and the rate of interest increased. The farm worth $4,000 depreciated to $2,000, or $1,500, and could not be sold even for that; but the debt of $2,000 hanging over it did not diminish, but really increased 50 per cent. compared with other property, while the creditor, as soon as it was due, put up the rate of interest until it reached 15, 20, and even 30 per cent.

No wonder the New York and Boston capitalists, who hold mortgages upon western farms to the amount of $300,000,000, unite in praying for the veto of the currency bill and for more contraction. Contraction will increase the relative value as well as the demand for their money and raise the rate of interest. Contraction will depreciate the property of their debtors, and enable them to buy it in at a nominal sum. Contraction, if continuously persisted in, will confiscate and throw into the hands of a few thousand capitalists a very great part of the most valuable property of this country.

Sir, this is no idle or extravagant statement. History as well as reason supports it; for the same result has been too often attained in other countries.

Almost the entire landed estate of England is owned by one hundred families. The greater part of her wealth is in the hands of a few thousand persons.

From the quotations already made we have seen how a part of these results was accomplished.

And these are the precedents which the advocates of contraction point out to us as examples which should be followed in America. We are told that any expansion or increase of the amount of money, however moderate, to keep pace in part with the growth and development of the country, is a departure from the true principles of finance. Those true principles of finance, I suppose, have been elucidated by the examples referred to, and by which the wealth has all been centered in a few; principles of finance which have enabled the few to live in magnificence and to amass almost countless wealth without even performing a day's labor, while the millions toil and die in poverty and rags.

If we are to imitate the financial policy of those countries which have aggrandized wealth at the expense of industry we shall reach the same results which they have; and that is exactly what our great capitalists desire, and they will surely obtain it unless the people of this country think for themselves, discard the teachings of subsidized organs, and stand firmly and intelligently for their rights and interests.

Financial legislation the world over has always been for the capitalists—almost never for the poor and industrial classes. I fear that our officials and legislators are falling into the same error.

When our Secretary of the Treasury desires any information in regard to the wisdom of certain financial measures, with whom does he advise? Wall street capitalists. When a legislative committee contemplates any financial legislation, with whom do they counsel, and who suggests the policy which should be adopted? Wall street capitalists. When the President is considering whether he will approve a financial bill which has passed both branches of Congress, who send committees to counsel him? Wall street capitalists. In short, sir, from first to last, throughout every stage of our financial legislation, capitalists are chiefly consulted, and, as a natural consequence, the interests of all other classes are sacrificed that the wealth of the capitalists may be increased.

In my judgment, sir, the capitalists are the very last persons who should be consulted upon financial measures. When shall we learn that our legislation should be shaped to encourage and foster industry and not to aggrandize capital? But to do this we must break away from those precedents of the Old World which our so-called political economists would have us blindly follow.

That profound thinker, John C. Calhoun, stated his opinion of those precedents, as follows:

The subtle and artful contrivances of modern times have been substituted for the brute force and gross superstition of ancient as a means of allotting so small a share of the wealth of civilized communities to those by whose labor it was produced, and so large a share to the non-producing class.

Sir, I thank God that there is a hope that the true policy of humanity and justice, the policy of the people, the policy of equality, the policy which elevates and rewards industry, is yet to be worked out in this country. It has never had a chance in the Old World, because it was opposed to the interests of kings and aristocracies of rank and wealth. But this is a "Government of the people, by the people, and for the people," and here, if anywhere on the face of the globe, the cause of equality and humanity must be vindicated.

The people of the West, who now desire a moderate increase in the amount of the circulating medium to meet the demands of their rapidly increasing population and industries, are denounced by the organs of the capitalists as inflationists and repudiators.

But, sir, when only a few months ago the capitalists of Wall street were in such a condition as to require more money, they did not fail to advocate an increase, and they found plenty of newspapers to advocate it for them. Never was the selfishness, the insincerity, and the meanness of human nature in its worst forms more conspicuously exhibited than in the conduct of these "money-changers" and their organs. In September, 1873, these same men who now so bitterly denounce any increase of currency were howling for more money as loudly as they are now howling against it. So great was their anxiety and haste to have more of what they now call "irredeemable paper" issued, that even the Sabbath day was not respected; and on Sunday, September 21, 1873, the leading capitalists of New York City thronged the rooms of President Grant and Secretary Richardson at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, demanding that without authority of law they should issue or loan to the banks the $44,000,000 of greenback reserve. And on Monday, September 22, 1873, the New York Herald, in a leading editorial, used the following language:

There was a persistent effort made yesterday by bankers and capitalists to induce the President to throw into the market some $30,000,000 of the $44,000,000 of greenbacks; but from the restrictions of the law the President and Secretary held to it that they had no alternative but the rejection of the proposition. We are informed, however, that if after a day or two there shall be no improvement in the situation, the President in deference to the public necessity will assume the responsibility of drawing upon his reserve of greenbacks for the general relief, trusting to an approval of his course by Congress. * * * From all sides, however, we hear the complaint that the paper circulation of the country is not equal to the business wants of the country.

In any event, if an additional issue of twenty, thirty, or fifty millions will relieve our banks and merchants from the embarrassment which otherwise threatens them, the President will be indorsed by Congress and the country in this timely measure of relief.

It is a part of the history of this matter that they obtained the relief which they sought and that $26,000,000 of the greenback reserve were issued. Now, in the name of fairness and sincerity, contrast the foregoing with the utterance of this same New York Herald on April 13, 1874, from a leading editorial:

At the beginning of this inflation monstrosity we denounced it as leading inevitably toward ruin, repudiation, and dishonor.

The intimation contained in the above is true in one particular, namely, that almost every issue of that paper for the last three months has been overflowing with abuse of western men who ask for a moderate increase of money to relieve the legitimate industry of the country which has been prostrated by contraction. But the capitalists having obtained the necessary relief for themselves, now demand that the screws of contraction shall be put with increased force upon our struggling industries.

I quote the foregoing extracts from the Herald only as samples. If space permitted I might make a hundred of similar import from the organs of the capitalists.

It all amounts to this, that inflation was all right and just the thing to be done when "our banks and merchants" wanted relief from the effects of their reckless speculation; but that the slightest increase is a crime when it is for the relief of the industrial interests of the country—the farmers, the manufacturers, the merchants, and honorable business men of all classes. In order that industry may prosper the earnings of capital invested in productive industry should be at least equal to the interest upon money. Is such the case? Far from it.

It is estimated that the average profit upon capital invested in industry is only about 3 per cent., while the average net increase of money loaned or employed in banking in many of the Western States is over 18 per cent.; to which add salaries, rents, and other expenses of banking, and the increase will be over 20 per cent.

Could anything more plainly show that money is too dear; in other words, that it is too scarce?

But lest some may cavil and say that I have estimated the interest upon money too high, I will reduce it one-half. We will have then 10 per cent. as the average interest on money, and 3 per cent. as the average profit upon capital invested in industry. With 3 per cent. earnings and 10 per cent. cost, it is evident that some one sinks 7 per cent. annually. The gain all goes into the pockets of the money-lenders, while the loss is borne by the farmers, manufacturers, merchants, and all other industrial classes.

In view of these facts is it any wonder that the money-lenders of New York and Boston are growing rich very fast and that they are struggling to keep up this nice arrangement? What the capitalists gain the industrial classes lose, if my theory is correct, and that it is correct is proved by the rapidly increasing list of failures.

Here is a list of the number of failures in the United States for the years named, with the amount of their liabilities:

Year.	No. of failures.	Aggregate liabilities.
1871	2,917	$85,252,000
1872	5,069	121,056,000

It is fair to presume that the list for 1873, which I am not now able to give, will be at least twice as large as that for the preceding year.

The number of failures in the Northern States, according to Hunt's Magazine and Year Book, from 1865 to 1867 were as follows:

Year.	No. of failures.	Aggregate liabilities.
1865	530	$17,625,000
1866	632	47,333,000
1867	2,386	86,218,000

It will be seen that the number is rapidly increasing. The years 1866 and 1867 being the years of greatest contraction, plainly exhibit the necessary effects of that measure.

But this list only comprises the failures in the cities. No report is made of the thousands of smaller failures throughout the country, and none of the tens of thousands of farmers who see their debts yearly increasing with no prospect of paying them.

How can the farmer with an average profit of not more than 3 per cent. upon the capital invested in his farm and stock, afford to pay from 10 to 20 per cent. interest upon his debts? It is evident that he who does it labors not so much for himself and family as for the capitalist.

And this is not all nor is it one-half of the picture. The shippers or middle-men who handle the stock or grain all the way from the farm to the market in New York or Europe, as the case may be, must pay the same exorbitant rates for the use of money, all of which, together with their risk and labor, must come out of the profits, or the difference between the price on the farm and in the market. The manufacturer and the merchant pay the same exorbitant interest, and must add it to the price of their goods.

There ought to be no conflict of interest between the manufacturer, the merchant, and the farmer. They are all equally bled by the capitalist, and can never enjoy their rightful share of prosperity until they understand their interests, and by their united action secure the adoption of a policy which will make the use of money as cheap as the profits of industry.

The railroads are justly blamed for their high rates of freight; but still it is well to remember that they could reduce their frieght charges one-half and yet make more money, if the capital with which they build their roads could be obtained at reasonable rates of interest.

Why cannot the American compete with the English manufacturer? Because the latter borrows his capital at 3 per cent. while the former pays from 10 to 20. And how can the American farmers who pay from 10 to 20 per cent. for the capital invested in farming compete in the markets of the world with the farmers of Europe and British India, who pay only 3 or 4 per cent.

Our ship-building was once the pride of the nation; the snowy sails of our commerce whitened every sea, and our flag was seen in every port of the world. But monopoly, not in foreign lands but in our own, is now helping to drive our flag from the ocean. How can the American ship-builder borrow money at 10 per cent. to build ships and compete in the carrying trade with the Englishman who pays only 3?

It has long been a matter of wonder to American farmers that, possessing as they do the finest and cheapest agricultural lands on the globe, they are unable to compete at a profit in the markets of the world with other less favored countries.

And it has been a matter of equal wonder to the American manufacturers that, with cheap timber and with coal and iron at their very doors, and with natural advantages in other respects unequaled in any other part of the world, they are often unable to compete, even in our own markets, with the English manufacturers who are three thousand miles away. We have always been told that the cheap labor of Europe made all the difference. Although I freely admit that there is some truth in that argument, I do not regard it as the sole or the real cause, for the difference is not enough in many cases to overcome the natural advantages possessed by the American farmer and manufacturer; and many of our American farmers, who with their sons do their own work and make no profit at all, certainly work as cheaply as any one in Europe.

The true cause of our inability to compete with Europe in these respects is found in the fact that the European farmer and manufacturer operate upon capital borrowed at 3 per cent. interest, while the American farmer and manufacturer must pay from 10 to 20; the difference between the rates of interest there and here is itself ample profit for the former.

The evils of contraction which now so greatly oppress the industries of this country are certain to continue and to increase so long as the volume of the currency remains fixed and unchangeable.

There is also another evil attendant upon a fixed volume of currency which should not be lost sight of. I refer to the scarcity arising from the great demand for money in the fall and winter, when such vast sums are required to pay taxes and move crops. This demand precipitated the panic of 1873, and has caused great stringency in the money market every fall since contraction began. At the very time when the tax-collector in most of the Western States is gathering and locking up in county and State treasuries a great part of the money in circulation among the people, this demand for money with which to buy and move the products of western farms is greatest, and results in great scarcity of money and exorbitant rates of interest. Thus the people sow and reap, but the capitalists in reality gather in the harvest in the shape of enormous interest; and this is the system which the capitalists of Wall street are so anxious to perpetuate.

It only requires a little combination among capitalists at the money centers in shutting up or withholding money to precipitate a panic, depreciate the value of produce as well as stocks, when they can buy up both at low rates, thus releasing the money and then sell again on a rising market. This is no idle speculation. It is too well known that one of the most damaging and exciting panics ever known in New York was caused by locking up ten millions of money.

The only remedy for this evil and abuse is to give elasticity to our currency by free banking or interchangeable bonds, so that the volume of the currency can be increased or decreased according to the demands of business, and the people can get money when they need it without paying exorbitant rates of interest.

The selfishness and rapacity of Wall street make it necessary that the industries of the country should be independent of it. The most bitter opposition to the currency bill arose from the fact that it withdrew a considerable part of the bank reserves from New York. It gave contraction to those who had been clamoring for it, and Wall street capitalists soon showed that they wanted contraction applied to the West but not to New York.

It has been frequently and falsely asserted that the Government is pledged against any increase of the paper circulation. The pledge referred to, if pledge it can be called, applies only to the legal-tenders, and has no application to the national-bank notes, which are not legal-tenders. And I think it quite evident that an increase of the national-bank circulation could not depreciate the legal-tenders so long as the volume of the latter remained unchanged, nor could it postpone the day of specie resumption.

The late currency bill did not in any manner violate this pledge. It fixed the legal-tenders at $400,000,000, the exact amount at which they have been fixed by all previous laws upon the subject.

As is well known, the Secretary of the Treasury has heretofore claimed the right of retiring the legal-tenders down to $356,000,000, or increasing them to $400,000,000 at his pleasure. A power which many have doubted, and many more have believed, should not depend upon the will and caprice of one man.

The currency bill therefore took away the power of the Secretary to retire legal-tenders, but did not provide for the issue of a single dollar beyond the amount authorized by previous laws. But it gave to the West and South $46,000,000 of additional bank circulation, a little over one-half the additional amount to which these sections are entitled under the existing apportionments, but which they cannot get because it has been taken and is held by other States—States that have placed themselves in the attitude of holding $80,000,000 more than their share of the circulation, and of denying to the West and South the privilege of taking only a small part of the share to which they are entitled.

Great efforts are now being made in certain quarters not only to criticise and denounce the action of the majority of Congress upon this question, but also to have it believed that our action has been contrary to both the general sentiment of the country and the recommendations of the President. I shall undertake briefly to show that our action has been in harmony with both.

When Congress met in December the country was almost unanimous in the demand for more currency. The Wall street brokers had not then fully recovered from the effects of their reckless speculations.

The New York Herald in the editorial before quoted spoke the exact truth when it said—

> From all sides, however, we hear the complaint that the paper circulation of the country is not equal to the business wants of the country.

If any voice was then raised in opposition to an increase of the paper circulation it was so feeble as not to be noticed by the conductors of a newspaper whose means of information are unequaled on this continent.

I think, sir, I am justified in saying that it is not the people nor the majority of their representatives who have changed upon this question, but the capitalists and their organs. And I think, notwithstanding all that may be represented to the contrary, that it is equally susceptible of proof that the action of the majority of Congress has been in accordance with the recommendations of the President.

In proof of this position I quote the following passages from the last annual message of the President transmitted to Congress at the commencement of the present session. After stating in the passage already quoted that we could never reach and maintain specie payments until the balance of trade was so largely in our favor as to pay without the products of our mines the interest due abroad on our national debt and other obligations, he further says:

> To increase our exports sufficient currency is required to keep all the industries of the country employed. Without this, individual as well as national bankruptcy must ensue.

Again, the President further says:

> During the last four years the currency has been contracted, directly, by the withdrawal of 3 per cent. certificates, compound-interest notes, and seven-thirty bonds outstanding on the 4th of March, 1869, all of which took the place of legal-tenders in the bank reserves to the extent of $63,000,000.
> During the same period there has been a much larger comparative contraction of the currency. The population of the country has largely increased. More than twenty-five thousand miles of railroad have been built, requiring the active use of capital to operate them. Millions of acres of land have been opened to cultivation, requiring capital to move the products. Manufactories have multiplied beyond all precedent in the same period of time, requiring capital weekly for the payment of wages and for the purchase of material; and probably the largest of all comparative contraction arises from the organizing of free labor in the South. Now every laborer there receives his wages, and for want of savings-banks the greater part of such wages is carried in the pocket or hoarded until required for use. * * *
> It is patent to the most casual observer that much more currency, or money, is required to transact the legitimate trade of the country during the fall and winter months, when the vast crops are being removed, than during the balance of the year. With our present system the amount in the country remains the same throughout the entire year, resulting in an accumulation of all the surplus capital of the country in a few centers when not employed in the moving of crops, tempted there by the offer of interest on call loans. * * * *
> In view of the great actual contraction that has taken place in the currency, and the comparative contraction continuously going on, due to the increase of population, increase of manufactories, and all the industries, I do not believe there is too much of it now for the dullest period of the year.

The President clearly saw the necessity of giving elasticity to the currency, as well as of providing for a considerable increase in the volume of paper circulation, and in his message of December last, from which I have before quoted, he makes the following recommendation to Congress:

> I submit for your consideration whether this difficulty might not be overcome by authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue at any time to national banks of issue any amount of their own notes below a fixed percentage of their issue, say 40 per cent., upon the banks depositing with the Treasurer of the United States an amount of Government bonds equal to the amount of notes demanded, the banks to forfeit to the Government say 4 per cent. of the interest accruing on the bonds so pledged during the time they remain with the Treasurer, as security for the increased circulation, the bonds so pledged to be redeemable by the banks at their pleasure, either in whole or in part, by returning their own bills for cancellation to an amount equal to the face of the bonds withdrawn.

As the present national-bank circulation is $354,000,000, and the recommendation of the President is for an increase of 40 per cent. upon the present circulation, it would involve a total increase of $141,600,000, an amount very greatly in excess of the increase provided for by the vetoed bill, but not in my judgment more than could be profitably employed by the legitimate business of the country.

These views of the President, so plainly and forcibly expressed only six months ago, met the unqualified approbation of the entire country; and I see no reason for believing that the people have changed their opinions since that time. On the other hand, I believe that their convictions have become more settled and fixed upon this subject.

I shall not upon this occasion enter into any defense of the legal-tenders—the money of the nation—the only money we have or are likely to have in circulation for some time to come. That money has been tried in war and in peace, and saved us in an emergency when a currency based upon gold utterly failed to meet our wants and necessities.

True, the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] says it is based upon "moonshine," and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] calls it a "rag," while other friends of contraction echo and re-echo the words "irredeemable currency."

Sir, if I was disposed to enter into details, I might perhaps show those gentlemen that this money, based as it is upon the credit of the nation, which is received for taxes to the amount of several hundred millions annually, which pays all private debts, and is daily redeemed in exchange for every article whether of luxury or necessity to be found in the whole country, is neither a "rag" nor yet as unsubstantial as "moonshine."

President Grant has a higher opinion of this money. In his message, from which I have just quoted, he says:

> The experience of the present panic has proven that the currency of the country, based as it is upon the credit of the country, is the best that has ever been devised. Usually in times of such trials currency has become worthless, or so much depreciated in value as to inflate the values of all the necessaries of life as compared with the currency. Every one holding it has been anxious to dispose of it on any terms. Now we witness the reverse. Holders of currency hoard it as they did gold in former experiences of a like nature.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have already extended these remarks far beyond the limits which I intended. The subject is so vast, the interests which it involves are so numerous and complicated, the proper solution of this question is so important to the welfare and prosperity of the people in every branch of their numerous and varied industries, that I have been unable to dismiss it as briefly as I proposed. Whatever may be the final solution of this question, there is one thing that may be considered as settled, and that is that the gross inequality and monopoly of the present distribution of national-bank circulation cannot be maintained.

The West has heretofore humbly petitioned for her rights. I warn gentlemen that when she speaks again it will be with a voice not only earnest and loud, but potent to command the changes which she demands.

If certain interests and certain sections want contraction they can have it, but it shall be applied to them and not to the West. And when those who have raised a hypocritical cry for contraction are compelled to give up the $80,000,000 of circulation which they hold in excess of the amount to which they are entitled, and when a large part of the reserves are removed from Wall street banks, they will enjoy in some degree the benefits of that contraction which they now so falsely and cunningly advocate.

RECIPROCITY AND THE TARIFF.

[Mr. CROSSLAND addressed the House in favor of the restoration of a reciprocity treaty with Canada and Great Britain, and on the operation of the tariff. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

THE EAST AND THE WEST.

Mr. CRITTENDEN Mr. Speaker, almost one hundred years have elapsed since we became a free and independent people. If events measure the age of our people—States and Federal Government—measure the epoch of our existence, then we have lived not one, but many centuries; and we can safely say that no subsequent centuries will be as fruitful of national greatness and national sorrow as the passing one has been to us. The sacred historian tells us that only two men survived the passage of the children of Israel from Egypt to the promised land, and those two had seen the departing glory of one kingdom and the inaugurated perpetuity of the other. More than two men live to-day in our land who sat by the cradle of our existence, and who still survive to see us a greater and mightier people than ever Israel was, even though her children were as the sands of the sea, as the stars of the heavens. How long is our greatness and our unity as a people to last? This is a question of great moment not only to us as a people, but also to other nations struggling to be free, and he who stands idly by and sees our Republic receiving the stings of death without interposing in its defense is a common foe to the best interests of his own people and to those aspiring to be free in foreign lands. The East and the West have alike and in common the highest motives for preserving the liberties of our people and the sacred unity of the States.

In order to do this, absolute fairness should obtain in the legislation in this Hall, giving unto each section those laws best adapted to its interests and least inimical to the interests of the whole. Our fathers did their work well in laying the foundations of our form of government deep and well, and erecting thereon, in symmetry and beauty, a superstructure of many in parts but one in the whole. From the solidity given it in its inauguration it has withstood the shocks of three foreign wars and one domestic war. From the foreign wars it came forth with victorious arms, thoroughly demonstrating the wisdom of those who had said that man was capable of self-government and that America was an exhibition of that fact. In all earnestness I say, let the mantle of oblivion fall over those four years of our internecine war. Its battle-fields were our own States, its leaders were our great men, its soldiers our own brethren, its dead upon both sides our own children, its victories our own victories, its deeds of daring our own heroism, and its heroes—Jackson and McPherson, Albert Sidney Johnston and Sedgwick—are the dead ornaments of our own race, and over their graves we should scatter the immortelles of a generous love. May the dews of heaven ever fall lightly upon their graves:

> As they await the judgment day;
> Under the one the blue, under the other the gray.

We cannot exist in parts, in sections in this land; it must be as a whole or not at all. The very formation of our country indicates its essential unity, and whatever may have occurred in the past to separate that unity should be at once forgotten and all sectional legislation ignored by the populous East as well as the West. It should be remembered now that the legislation that was done during and subsequent to the war was greatly at the expense of the West and directly in antagonism to the South, and as the West was as loyal to the Government as the East, as prodigal of its blood and its money in defense of the Union and the Constitution, it now calls a halt in these Halls to such inequalities, and demands that it shall be heard in defense of its own rights. It wants nothing from the East that rightfully belongs there. rather in her conscious greatness conceding a part that should be hers than extorting the least that is not. Yet it is but right that we of the West, without regard to party, should say to you gentlemen of the East that we will hereafter only ask for and only receive such legislation as will be just to you and just to us.

The war was a blessing to the East in a monetary point of view; and to the extent that it enriched that great hive of intelligence and industry it impoverished the agricultural part of our land. To-day the West is poorer in all the elements of happiness, in all the common necessities of life, than she was at the end of the war. Why is this? Our people have labored hard from morning until night, from January until January, possessing the fewest imaginable luxuries, in many instances the fewest of the ordinary wants of a frugal class, striving as no people have scarcely striven under the sun, to accumulate a few hundred dollars for the comfort of old age or the dowery of departing children. It is because they are taxed by everybody for everything they eat, wear, use, or consume—for every moment they live, for every moment they are dying, for every moment that their spirits are preparing to rest in heaven or dwell in misery.

You people of the East may say that you are not responsible for this; I hold that you are wholly and entirely responsible for it all. When we were weak in this Hall in Representatives; when the war had lashed the passions of our people into such a fury that they contemplated nothing but its issue; when our whole people were engaged in the common effort to serve the Union of these States, with no regard to self, with no "well-laid" schemes for the future, then during those bloody days the East, "with its eyes on the main chance," its hand upon the lever of war, and its voice shouting "on to Richmond," with wonderful ingenuity passed those iniquitous enactments, under the disguise of "revenue laws," which have from that time to this drawn the very life-blood from our people.

Money was so plenteous immediately after the war that the people did not feel the burden of taxation. It was like drawing a few ounces of blood from a strong, healthy man, leaving him none the less bouyant after the depletion. But let that depletion of blood continue day after day, and soon you will see the physical wreck of a once splendid manhood. This depletion has been constantly enforced since the war by those in authority in the unwise management of the currency of our country; and that, too, when from the cessation of arms the country would necessarily demand an increasing instead of decreasing medium of exchange. As evidence of the above fact, I call your attention to the following tables showing the large contraction made during the past eight years in the volume of circulation.

On the 1st of September, 1865, the circulating medium consisted, in part, as follows:

United States notes	$433,160,569
Fractional currency	26,344,742
National-bank notes	300,000,000
Compound-interest legal-tender notes	217,024,160
Temporary-loan certificates, 10 d-d	107,148,713
Certificates of indebtedness	85,093,000
Treasury 5 per cent. legal-tenders	32,536,901
Treasury notes, legal-tenders past due and not presented	1,503,020
State-bank notes	78,867,577
Three-year Treasury notes	830,000,000
Total	2,111,678,680

On the 1st of December, 1873, the circulating medium consisted in part as follows:

United States notes	$367,001,685
Fractional currency	48,000,000
Certificates of indebtedness	678,000
National-bank notes	350,000,000
Total	765,679,685

It will be perceived by the exhibit here made that the currency has been reduced $1,345,998,995 since September 1, 1865.

Was such a rapid contraction, in so short a time, judicious? The war had closed; millions of men were returning to their different pursuits; enterprises of all kinds were springing into existence in all the States, upon the very battle-fields where shot and shell had done their deadliest work; unborn Territories were seeking organic existence by legislative action of Congress; millions of negroes were just entering, as producers as well as consumers, upon a new career in life; a large foreign population, stimulated by our generous invitations, were crowding our shores; rehabilitation in every branch of trade and pursuit was required in the Southern States; a wonderful energy in the construction of cities, towns, churches and school-buildings, colleges, railways, and steamboats, was invoking into active exercise a much larger sum of currency than now is permitted to all the States and Territories. And the whole country was careering into a new life pregnant with the bounding energies of a hopeful people, everything, everybody demanding money to consummate the work of individual reconstruction, and yet, in the face of all this, contraction of the currency was the policy of the Government. It was a most foolish policy, working only in the interest of the bondholders and the money-lenders of the country. It in due season produced its fruit, and bitter indeed has that fruit been to the agricultural and laboring classes of the West and South. Let the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States say what this policy has done for our people.

Referring to the existing panic, he says:

This could not have happened had there been an elastic and flexible instead of our present rigid and unyielding currency. There is scarce a doubt but this financial revulsion has cost the people in the aggregate hundreds of millions of dollars, to say nothing of the loss of revenue to the Government.

Ours is the only Government under the sun, at any period of history, that has suffered or caused such an immediate and rapid contraction of its currency, after an exhaustive war. I do not say, Mr. Speaker, that it would have been wise to have permitted the maximum of the currency to have remained until now what it was at the close of the war. Nor would I say it was wise to medicate a man to the same extent upon medicines and stimulants, when recovering from prolonged disease, that was necessary in his prostrated condition. Common sense would dictate to the physician not to withhold his prescriptions until nature had assumed its abnormal condition. The South and West being agricultural regions suffered more in their internal affairs by the war and by the contraction of the currency than did the Eastern States, and yet they have been made to bear by unequal legislation a greater portion of the burdens of the Government than the New England States.

As an illustration of such unjust legislation I call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the following tables. In 1873 the six New England States paid into the Treasury of the United States the annexed sums:

Connecticut	$873,985 00
Maine	214,696 00
Massachusetts	3,761,005 00
New Hampshire	325,455 00
Rhode Island	324,552 00
Vermont	75,861 00
Making	5,575,554 00

Missouri alone paid $4,259,320, only $316,234 less than the six New England States. In order that the inequality may be more apparent, I refer you to this table. In 1870 the real and personal estate was valued in—

Connecticut	$774,631,524 00
Maine	348,155,671 00
Massachusetts	2,132,148,741 00
New Hampshire	252,624,112 00
Rhode Island	296,965,646 00
Vermont	235,340,553 00
Making	4,039,866,247 00
Missouri	1,284,922,897 00

Thus, you will at once see that Missouri, with a property value of little more than one-fourth of the above-named States, pays four-fifths as much internal revenue as the whole of New England. The State of Missouri is only used as an illustration, as it is my home and the home of the people I in part represent. Illinois, Iowa, Indiana, and Ohio are in the same condition; in fact, more strikingly showing the unfairness of the taxation and the injustice of the legislation. The tobacco of the farmer of the West is taxed from 50 to 75 per cent. of its value to raise revenue to pay gold interest to the eastern capitalist on his untaxed bonds. It is not my purpose at this time, Mr. Speaker, to discuss at length the tariff question. Its enormities are so great, that I leave it for a separate discussion.

I now propose entering upon in a manner worthy of this Hall, I hope, the great subject of the East and the West, in the discussion of which I will endeavor to show more elaborately than heretofore done the reasons why the loud complaints and murmurings have been heard coming from the agricultural and laboring classes of the West, and why the West and the South, without regard to political divisions, will unite against the East in asserting their rights and vindicating their wrongs. For fear that I may be misunderstood by some one, I desire to say that the vindication sought will only be that of commanding majorities in these Halls by Representatives true and to the "manner born," who will legislate for the whole country in the spirit of equity and in the light of justice. If an unjust weight is an abomination to the Giver of all things, what must unjust legislation be? The one concerns the small commercial transactions; the other life, death, misery, happiness. It is conceded by all that agriculture is the basis of national wealth, and whatever promotes its interests to that extent promotes the general good of all. Our own land is distinguished by the fact that a larger proportion of our people are engaged in an intelligent cultivation of the soil than any other nation, cultivating larger farms, possessed of richer soil; and I can also say from that special legislation of which I have spoken those farms are unavoidably cultivated at a heavier cost than should be in this land of professed freedom.

In an address of much thought, Charles W. Green, secretary of the national agricultural congress held at Bloomington, Illinois, said:

But we are not yet free. Human government has not yet attained perfection. Scarce have we overcome one stupendous evil ere another has reared its hydra head—one of a more threatening aspect than its predecessor, one which pervades every locality. The aristocracy of concentrated wealth, which quietly assumes to usurp the prerogatives of government, and stealthily undermines the virtue of the public servants, is more to be feared than the slaveocracy of the South. It is far more threatening to the integrity of our free Government. Its deeds are of darkness. Its works are secret, and because they are so, that multiplies their power for evil a hundred fold.

It is this "aristocracy of concentrated wealth," situate in the East, fed and pampered by tariff laws at the expense of the toiling millions, that "is to be feared more than the slaveocracy of the South." That power in the South asked and received no special legislation to enhance the value of its products at the expense of the other agricultural or manufacturing interests of our land, fully knowing that any legislation that added a burden to those other interests, so greatly akin to its own, would necessarily be inimical to its success. It was independent and generous in its power. Not so with this other "aristocracy of concentrated wealth." Its mills grind not more constantly than do its lords and owners "lobby" around these Halls for protection, and every cent of protection given them is base favoritism, impoverishing the laboring classes of the West and the South.

The agricultural States lying west and south of the Alleghany Mountains pay a much larger proportion of the current expenses of the Government than do the Middle and Eastern States. And it must be remembered that it is in those last-mentioned States that the great bulk of untaxed property is to be found, and it is also in such States that fostered productions pay such enormous percentages. It is in fact establishing by law two classes of States in our Union: one the protected and favored, the other the laboring and unprocted class; thete former class paying less and securing more benefits from the Government, and the latter paying more, and securing fewer blessings, from the same common source. In verification of this point, I call the careful attention of this House to the following tables. The wealth and population of the States were taken from the census of 1870, and the amount of revenue paid by each State is taken from the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for 1873:

States.	Wealth.	Population.	Revenue paid to United States in 1873.

By these tables it will be seen that the Western and Southern States—the overloaded and debtor States—paid to the Government through its internal-revenue offices $67,769,590, and the New England and Middle States only paid $35,618,167. Though flooded with money, and with all the comforts incidental to a "chosen people," those creditor States paid less revenue to the support of the Government than the others by $32,151,423. Have they not the serene right to say, "This is the best Government under the sun; there is no God but God, and Mohammed is his prophet?" I again call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to these other important facts. I have only given a part of the story, and that the least offensive; now I will give the balance. It is a truism in political economy that all exported commodities is so much surplus labor, and that surplus labor, if utilized, is the wealth of a nation. The ninth census shows that the total production of manufactures in 1870 was nearly twice as much as the total production of agriculture; and yet according to this table, carefully prepared by a gentleman skilled in the business, the industries of the South and West saved this country from bankruptcy:

Total value of production of manufactures in 1870	$4,232,325,442
Total estimated value of all farm productions, including betterments and additions to stock	2,447,538,658

With these facts before us, let us see how much each of these two great industries of the country contributed to the export value:

Export of agricultural products in 1872-'73.

Thus it will be seen that the manufacturing industry, which is protected and pampered and is made to produce over $4,232,000,000, contributed only a little over $61,250,000 toward the $649,000,000 exports of 1872 and 1872-'73; while the agricultural industry, which is just beginning to protest against protection and which produced a total of only $2,447,000,000 annually, found over $453,000,000 surplus for export, and thereby kept the nation from going into bankruptcy. Or, in other words, the proportion of productions and exports of these two classes has been as follows:

Manufactures	$4,232,325,442	$61,307,125	1.45
Agriculture	2,447,538,658	453,588,604	18.52

This of course shows that the agriculturist has in the first place to buy the home manufacturer's industry and secondly he has to find enough of surplus to provide the manufacturer with the raw material that the latter gets from abroad, and of course pay the interest on the debt. Is it not time for the agriculturist to remind the manufacturer to put his shoulder to the wheel and also seek a foreign market?

In order to complete the picture of the advantages enjoyed by the East over the West by reason of the tariff legislation, I again call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the last census. As shown by that work, there were engaged in agricultural pursuits 5,922,471 persons, with a total capital invested in land, stock, and implements of industry of $11,124,858,765. There were, as shown by that same work, 2,053,996 persons engaged in manufactures, with a capital of $2,118,208,796. If I were to ask any man of ordinary business capacity which of the pursuits should yield the larger income, he would at once answer, considering the persons engaged and the amount of capital invested, that the former should pay fourfold the percentage of the latter. Let us test it by the light of facts. Almost three times as many persons are engaged in agriculture as in manufactures—5,922,471 to 2,053,996; with over five times as much capital—$11,124,858,765 in the former to $2,118,208,796 in the latter. That remarkable book, again, shows us that the entire value of all farm productions, with increase of stock, for the year 1870 was $2,447,538,658, and that the value of the manufactured productions was $4,232,325,442; the latter and "smaller interests" yielding almost twice as much as the former, although the former, as above shown, had three times as many persons and five times as much capital engaged in its vocation as in the latter pursuit. Pursuing the line of argument of one of the most enlightened and popular newspapers of the age, the Saint Louis Republican, we repeat:

> If we divide the whole amount of agricultural capital by the total number of persons engaged in agriculture, we have an average of $1,878 to each, and if we divide the value of the gross product of agriculture by the total number of persons engaged in that business, we find that each person thus engaged, on an average of $1,878 capital, produced $412 of gross values. By a similar computation we find that the average capital to each person engaged in manufacturing was $1,211, and that each person thus engaged on this average amount of capital produced $848. The labor and capital of a farmer therefore yielded less than half as much as the labor and capital of a manufacturer. The census figures do not tell us what the net profits of agriculture were, but it will not be claimed that they were over 10 per cent. on the capital involved. Indeed, if we estimate a farm-hand's labor at fifteen dollars per month and his board at ten dollars per month, both together costing $300 a year, and deduct this from the average annual product ($412) of each person engaged in agriculture, we have $112 as the farmer's average net profit on the labor of his hired hands—or only a little over 6 per cent. on his average capital of $1,878. The profits of the manufacturing capitalist are more easily and more accurately determined. Adding together the total amount paid for raw materials ($2,488,427,242) and the total amount paid in wages ($775,584,343), and deducting the sum ($3,264,011,585) from the gross manufacturing product ($4,232,325,442), we have $968,313,857 as the net profit on a total manufacturing capital of $2,118,208,796—or over 45 per cent. And it is this business, paying an average of 45 per cent. per annum, that is "protected" by the Government at the expense of another business that pays only 6 per cent.

I may be asked at this point, in view of what I have stated in regard to the excess of agricultural exports over the manufactured, "What becomes of the immense quantities of articles manufactured in this country, as but a tithe of them are exported?" They are used and consumed in this country by our people from compulsion. Under our infamous protection laws the foreign articles—superior in every respect—are excluded, and the people are thus compelled to purchase our inferior home-manufactured articles at three or four times their value. This enormous profit is taken from the pockets of the laboring classes, the unprotected many, and put by a parental Government into the treasuries of the protected few. Have not our people been thus plundered long enough? Have not their groanings yet been heard in the East? The political revolution now going on in the West is in consequence of such a system of robbery. The West sorely feels the weight of the heavy hand resting on her, and if it is not soon raised she will send to these Halls a delegation, many in number but one in sentiment, who "will strike for God and their native land." You men of the East claim to be fair and moderate in legislation. Is it so? When Lord Clive was before a committee of the House of Commons on the charge of having enriched himself by plundering India, he justified the act, and in the language of Macaulay he "described in vivid language the situation in which victory had placed him: a great prince dependent on his pleasure; an opulent city afraid of being given up to reprisal; wealthy bankers bidding against each other for his smiles; vaults piled with gold and jewels, thrown open to him alone, and exclaimed in conclusion, "By G—d, Mr. Chairman, at this moment I stand astonished at my own moderation!" Well could he say that, after having accumulated millions wrongfully from those people. Considering how suppliant the western republicans have been for the last twelve years to the eastern monopolists, it may be that they could exclaim that they are astonished at their moderation! Lord Clive plundered a base foreign people, between whom no bond of blood or sympathy existed; the monopolists of the East have and are still plundering their own blood, their own countrymen, who stood, when danger was thickest, when hardened soldiers under matchless leaders were pressing hardest, as a living wall between a desolating army and the East. The West guarded the East, and the East, by cunning laws, has brought the West to desolation. I truly hope that the East will desist from such oppression, for if she does not, that unfortunate state of affairs will be produced that is described in the Saint Louis Democrat, a leading western republican paper, loyal to the core and "above suspicion." Hear it:

> Unless the East shall soon begin to understand what the West is, the future will teach them a fearful lesson. The sectional prejudice in the West now is stronger against the East than the feeling in the South was against the North forty or fifty years ago; and it will develop faster into a fixed and determined hostility, intensified from year to year by increased consciousness of power.

Is not that plain talk from one of the chosen to the great elect? No cry of rebel can be raised against that paper. It speaks the growing sentiment of a populous empire, which loves Cæsar, but Rome more!

Believing that I have shown by invincible facts and figures that the West and South have been made for the last thirteen years by a species of vicious legislation "hewers of wood and drawers of water" for the East, although incalculably larger and more prolific in soil and other material resources, I now propose showing that the day of bondage is about over, that the hour of deliverance has about come if the people of the great Mississippi Valley will learn the lesson from our oppressors of making the imaginary importance of partyism with its small local benefits subordinate to the greater and more important interests of that valley. The East manages by great ingenuity to keep the "apple of discord" in our midst, to keep our people, as democrats and republicans, fiercely wrestling with each other for a bauble, while it bears off the prize of empire, richer by far than the "wealth of Ormus or of Ind."

An eastern politician in power never forgets his own section of country. His very nature and locality impress him with the lesson, "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning." Her party feeling never extends beyond her limits. She uses party with all of its shibboleths as but the means of power and unity at home, and the instrument of weakness and strife with us. Touch the East, in whatever name, under whatever banner, you may choose, and you unite her people into one solid mass. Home is everything to them; party only as a means of power is nothing. Its philosophy is power, its economy is unity, and its unity is economy. It is governed in all of its departments by great wisdom, frugality, and singleness of purpose. Should we not learn the same lesson? I would not have it, Mr. Speaker, suspected for one moment that I desire to teach a sectional sentiment, or enunciate one possessed of malevolence against any part of our country. I have a profound love for every part of it. It is the priceless heritage from our fathers, and should be perpetuated by us as unclouded from sectional animosities as it was handed to us.

A dark day dawned upon us as a people a few short years ago, and its sorrow still lingers in our midst as the terrible rebuke which Heaven has visited upon us in consequence of our departure from the broad path of light which the anxious eyes of Washington had chosen for us as a people. That luminous path led to national unity, dignity, and power, but we, unpossessed by the same stern virtue and deep, broad love of country, unappreciative of what it cost, have been led away from the great memories of the past, the obligations of the present, and the wise counsels of the inspired founders of the nation. We must speedily return to that path if we would survive the short period of the present, deeply repenting the errors of the past, and by a more elevated statesmanship plant deeper the foundations of our great Republic.

It were better, far better, that the Republic had never had a being than that now, after having been mankind's admiration and worship for nearly a century, it should go down in blood and gloom and horror, a warning to all generations not to repeat the same fatal experiment. I would have the States and Territories to the farthest verge of the oceans washing our shores bound and cemented together under one federal head, all moving in obedience to its general laws as the lesser stars and planets move in obedience to the great eternal laws of the sun. Yet, Mr. Speaker, I would also have separate and distinct States and Territories, each moving in its own legislative orbit, managing and directing its own "domestic affairs," preserving with manly tenacity all of those "powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States." I would also have a North, South, East, and West as geographical and civil divisions in our Republic, each having its peculiar laws and climate, as well as its social characteristics, material interests, and political preferences.

A perfect identity of interests or sentiment would become an element of weakness instead of strength. Unity in diversity is the grand principle of strength and bounty, perfect identity not existing anywhere in the moral or material universe. The divisional lines on the laws of temperature and production are as immutable as the laws themselves, and no orator, no poet, can erase them by swelling sentences or glowing words. Up to a certain point our great diversity of interests has been the strongest band of our Union as a people. This led to a mutual dependence of one State or section upon all the others, and thus self-interest strengthened the ties of social and political fraternity, and became a powerful agent in maintaining the integrity of the American Union. It was only when self-interest degenerated into selfishness, that simple diversity grew into open antagonism, and honest patriots became plotting politicians, that this "more perfect Union was threatened by the dangers of dissolution."

It is my present purpose to allude briefly to two of the grand divisions of our country, showing what each has done in the past and what both must do in the future to preserve the harmony of the whole and maintain the integrity of the States. By the East will be embraced not only New England, but the Middle States, a division of great wealth, population, and power, where the commercial interests and mechanical industries of the country are mainly concentrated. The West will embrace that vast region lying between the Alleghany and the Rocky Mountains, popularly called the valley of the Mississippi. This is the great food-producing region, the great Egypt to which nations of the earth must annually go for the cereals. Although the Southern States proper and the gold-producing States beyond the Sierra Nevadas are not producers of grain, yet they belong to that section usually denominated the West, being of their bone and their flesh.

Although, Mr. Speaker, the Mississippi Valley has been called "that semi-barbarous empire" by the New York Herald, I propose showing that it has been the real saviour of the country in the past, is the great conservator of equal rights in the present, and will be the great glory of the American Republic in the future. In doing this, far be it from me, if I could, to abate one tithe or tittle from the just meed of honor due to any other section of our common country. Each has borne its part nobly, grandly, in the past, either for good or evil, and with a patriot's love, I say let the evil rest in silence while we speak earnestly only of the good.

The East with a portion of the South constituted the original thirteen States that first planted this Republic on primal soil, and then won its independence from the first military power of the earth. These events cannot be forgotten by the American people. They are the rich legacy left us by a joint ancestry whose benefits should ever impress our minds with the cost of the struggle and the value of the result. Men who could conquer in such a struggle were equal to any future emergencies demanded in the colonization and cultivation of the great area of territory lying beyond the limits of the victorious States. Such men were grand instruments in the hand of God to accomplish a manifest destiny. "To do or die" was their motto in civil as well as military life, and in their dying was planted the seed of free empire which to-day sheds its lustrous light over every inch of American soil. The eighteenth century consummated the great work, and the eyes of the Father of his Country when they were turned for the last time to behold the elevated flag of his country beheld it the powerful symbol of a glorious confederation of free and independent republics joined together by his counsels and defended by his arms.

At that time nearly all the population and wealth of our country were concentrated in ten States along the Atlantic sea-board from Massachusetts to the Carolinas. The West was little better than a howling wilderness, and all that portion of it beyond the Mississippi River belonged to a foreign power. But while the East made headway against the encroachments of kingly power the hardy pioneers of the West were contending for religious and civil liberty in the wide domain of an uncivilized country, laying the foundations of that power which to-day appears here, in the panoply of conscious intelligence, strength, and numbers, representing a vast region extending from the semi-arctic snows of Itasca down to the shores of a tropical sea, embracing within its limits one hundred million square miles, already carved into twenty great States and Territories, and possessing a population of twenty millions of people.

Those so-called semi-barbarians inhabit the grandest industrial empire in the world, constituting the very heart and center of the American Republic; and holding the balance of power, it has been in the past, and will continue to be in the future, its mission to maintain liberty and mete out equal justice to all. What has the West already done to defend the honor and maintain the integrity of the nation? In our second revolutionary war our soldiers were found upon every battle-field from the bloody Thames to that of New Orleans, which gave to us a permanent independence, and to the country a resolute President. Where were these western "barbarians" in our contest with Mexico? Let the answer come from Monterey, Buena Vista, and Chapultapec! Look at the rich and powerful States added to our country by that war, with all of their untold billions of wealth, that have borne our Government through so many financial distresses, and which would still be sleeping in the mines and placers but for the presence of western soldiers in that war. The soldiers of the West have always been in the front ranks of battle, whether threatened by foreign foes or domestic strife; and when the war was over they had a courage no less renowned that led them, without the faults incident to a military life, into the private walks of civil society. And in our own great war, when Greek met Greek, who fought more bravely, or forgave more nobly in peace, than the regiments from the Great West? In that sad contest, where victory was won in a brother's blood, the East and the West joined hands in a common cause. That unhappy strife is past, and let the curtain fall upon its gloomy pictures. The West has been the unquailing ally of the East in all the great events of the past.

But another contest is rapidly rising in our country between the impoverished millions and the protected few, in which the West will contend with the East for the mastery. In this contest the South will be the friend of the West, and what a brotherhood it will make! It will not be a war of bullets and blood, but of ballots and brains. On one side are a hundred thousand capitalists, bankers, and millionaires—the creditors of the people; on the other side twenty million workers, ranging from the plodding farmer and the thrifty mechanic down to the 'prentice boy and the sewing-girl. The East is rolling in wealth, "faring sumptuously every day;" has so many greenbacks that her leading men call them "moonshine" or irredeemable rags," as was done by Mr. TREMAIN, of New York, and she of course protests against any increase or equalization of the currency. War is threatened by the New York Herald if such increase is had.

The West and the South, the great producing regions, with equal earnestness demand an equitable distribution of the money issued, to give them the means of transporting their products to market, and of building up home industries, and securing to them financial and industrial independence. The East has a per capita distribution of thirty-five dollars, the West and South not one-fifth of the amount. They only ask for an equality. Is this wrong? Against this policy the capitalists and bankers of the East demur, protesting that the whole country is to be ruined. Ruined with what? With the money that has been as good as gold for all commercial transactions, and which is secured by the faith of the Government and by thirty thousand millions worth of property. Sir, the East appealed to the President of the United States in September, 1873, to reissue $44,000,000 of this same currency to save her from sinking; and when the West appeals for the same sum to save her twenty million people, it is pronounced "filthy rags" and bad faith.

O, wad some power the giftie gie us,
To see oursels as ithers see us.

This is the most extraordinary piece of selfishness and bald inconsistency in the legislative annals of our country. The President without law or authority did issue $26,000,000 to the East, and he now vetoes a bill passed by both Houses of Congress, for the relief of the West and South, and says it is bad faith. Bad faith to whom? To the bondholders of the East, to whom he had virtually loaned but eight months before $26,000,000 of the retired $44,000,000. His last message and his veto stand in bold opposition; as much so as if one were written in the West and the other in the East.

In order to see it more strikingly, let me call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to this picture of the country that he so graphically described in his last annual message, and the remedy he then recommended, kindly furnished me by my colleague, Mr. HYDE.

The President says:

During the last four years the currency has been contracted, directly, by the withdrawal of 3 per cent. certificates, compound-interest notes, and seven-thirty bonds outstanding on the 4th of March, 1869, all of which took the place of a legal-tenders in the bank reserves to the extent of $63,000,000.

During the same period there has been a much larger comparative contraction of the currency. The population of the country has largely increased. More than twenty-five thousand miles of railroad have been built, requiring the active use of capital to operate them. Millions of acres of land have been opened to cultivation, requiring capital to move the products. Manufactories have multiplied beyond all precedent in the same period of time, requiring capital weekly for the payment of wages and for the purchase of material; and probably the largest of all comparative contraction arises from the organizing of free labor in the South. Now every laborer there receives his wages, and for want of savings-banks the greater part of such wages is carried in the pocket or hoarded until required for use. * * *

It is patent to the most casual observer that much more currency or money is required to transact the legitimate trade of the country during the fall and winter months, when the vast crops are being removed, than during the balance of the year. With our present system the amount in the country remains the same throughout the entire year, resulting in an accumulation of all the surplus capital of the country in a few centers when not employed in the moving of crops, tempted there by the offer of interest on call loans. * * * * * *

In view of the great actual contraction that has taken place in the currency and the comparative contraction continuously going on, due to the increase of population, increase of manufactories, and all the industries, I do not believe there is too much of it now for the dullest period of the year.

The President clearly saw the necessity of giving elasticity to the currency, as well as of providing for a considerable increase in the volume of paper circulation, and in his message of December last, from which I have before quoted, he makes the following recommendation to Congress:

I submit for your consideration whether this difficulty might not be overcome by authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue at any time to national banks of issue any amount of their own notes below a fixed percentage of their issue, say 40 per cent., upon the banks depositing with the Treasurer of the United States an amount of Government bonds equal to the amount of notes demanded, the banks to forfeit to the Government say 4 per cent. of the interest accruing on the bonds so pledged during the time they remain with the Treasurer, as security for the increased circulation, the bonds so pledged to be redeemable by the banks at their pleasure, either in whole or in part, by returning their own bills for cancellation to an amount equal to the face of the bonds withdrawn.

As the present national-bank circulation is $354,000,000, and the recommendation of the President is for an increase of 40 per cent. upon the present circulation, it would involve a total increase of $141,600,000, an amount very greatly in excess of the increase provided for by the vetoed bill, but not in my judgment more than could be profitably employed by the legitimate business of the country.

Now look upon this other picture drawn by the same hand only a few months after that message was delivered to Congress, and after Congress had enacted a law in conformity to the message, and after he had made a solemn obligation to the people that "the decisions of Congress on this subject (currency) will have the hearty support of the Executive:"

To the Senate of the United States:

Herwith I return Senate bill No. 617, entitled "An act to fix the amount of United States notes and the circulation of national banks and for other purposes," without my approval. In doing so I must express my regret at not being able to give my assent to a measure which has received the sanction of a majority of the legislators chosen by the people to make laws for their guidance, and I have studiously sought to find sufficient arguments to justify such assent, but unsuccessfully. Practically, it is a question whether the measure under discussion would give an additional dollar to the irredeemable paper currency of the country or not, and whether, by requiring three-fourths of the reserves to be retained by the banks, and prohibiting interest to be received on the balance, it might not prove a contraction. But the fact cannot be concealed that, theoretically, the bill increases the paper circulation $100,000,000, less only the amount of reserves restrained from circulation by the provisions of the second section. The measure has been supported on the theory that it would give increased circulation. It is a fair inference, therefore, that if, in practice, the measure should fail to create the abundance of circulation expected of it, the friends of the measure, particularly those out of Congress, would clamor for such inflation as would give the expected relief. The theory in my belief is a departure from the true principles of finance, national interest, national obligation to creditors, congressional promises, party pledges on the part of both political parties, and of the personal views and promises made by me in every annual message sent to Congress, and in each inaugural address.

Have the decisions of Congress coming fresh from the people received that promised executive support? Let the veto answer. The people, the laboring toiling people of this whole country from Maine to California, excepting a few thousand bondholders and pampered bankers, have asked for an increase of that currency that the President in his last annual message pronounced "the currency of the country, based as it is upon the credit of the country, the best tha thas ever been devised; and that same President, with wonderful forgetfulness of his promises, rendered sacred by the office he holds, "forbids" the increase, and in that bond-begotten and bank-born veto pronounces that same currency "irredeemable paper currency."

O consistency, thou art a jewel!

In December, 1873, he advised an increase of that currency $141,600,000; in April, 1874, he says: No, don't do so; it is "irredeemable," moonshine, and an exercise of "bad faith."

To complete the picture of extreme selfishness and inconsistency, look at what the New York Herald said when the East was in distress and wanted relief. September 23, 1873, the New York Herald, in a leading editorial, used the following language:

There was a persistent effort made yesterday by bankers and capitalists to induce the President to throw into the market some $30,000,000 of the $44,000,000 of greenbacks; but from the restrictions of the law the President and Secretary held to it that they had no alternative but the rejection of the proposition. We are informed, however, that if after a day or two there shall be no improvement in the situation, the President in deference to the public necessity will assume the responsibility of drawing upon his reserve of greenbacks for the general relief, trusting to an approval of his course by Congress. * * * From all sides, however, we hear the complaint that the paper circulation of the country is not equal to the business wants of the country.

In any event, if an additional issue of twenty, thirty, or fifty millions will relieve our banks and merchants from the embarrassment which otherwise threatens them, the President will be indorsed by Congress and the country in this timely measure of relief.

After the crisis had passed from the East to the West, and that grand empire made its appeal for relief to Congress, this same great organ of the bondholder said in a menacing article:

Inflation means war—civil war pressed upon the Atlantic States by the West and Southwest. We have heard a great deal lately from these sections about asserting their power in the legislation of the country. If the West has votes enough to rule Congress and the country we are satisfied to be ruled by the West. But the wildest statesmen of that incipient empire must remember that it is one thing to rule, but quite another thing to ruin. Inflation is ruin, dishonor, disgrace. The West shall not rule us in this thing, making us beggars at home and disreputable abroad.

Shall every American who dares to show his face in England or France or Germany, or in Spain or Italy, ever be dishonored because a few western demagogues have made it discreditable to be an American? Shall the commerce of our great sea-ports be stricken down and destroyed by a method that no country can practice with impunity?

Inflation means war just as slavery meant war all the time from 1840 till 1860. New England, the Middle States, Virginia, and the Carolinas do not mean that after laying the foundations of the Republic the West and Southwest shall ruin and discredit them and the Republic together. The Herald's prediction of the tread of armed men in 1861 was not more certain than a repetition of that prediction now, unless the newly fledged States, which think themselves wiser than the "original thirteen," learn wisdom from the danger of the hour.

With some people how different the law is between "mine and thine," your wants and my wants.

That veto sent a thrill of joy through the whole of New England to old England; through the heart of every bondholder in the world, and the tongues that were denouncing the President in Boston before the veto was known were attuned to a different melody after its delivery.

But, sir, what was the feeling in the West and South among the millions of farmers, laborers, operatives, and manufacturers? Their cry of despair was loud and deep, and before it is mellowed into soft cadences a revolution in politics will occur in those two sections without parallel in this country, transferring the power of this land into the valley of the Mississippi, that "semi-barbarous region" that dares to think and act for itself. As this financial question has been the means of precipitating the determination of the West and South, let us look at it one moment for the purpose of gathering fresh strength and courage from our defeat. Whence came the votes by which the financial relief measures passed this House and the Senate?

Not from Wall street or any other great money center, but from that grand realm of agricultural wealth from which so many of us have come, and to which we have all sworn "by her to live, for her to die."

An analysis of the vote by which the Senate currency bill passed both Houses will show that the Mississippi Valley had the controlling power, and for the first time in the history of the Republic carried a great measure in both Houses by commanding and indicative majorities. During the last twelve years we have had little except class legislation, and that, as before said, has favored capital with its thousand heads more than labor with its million hands. This legislation has been thoroughly sectional. The heads of all important committees were from the East and Middle States. The West was almost completely ignored in this distribution of political power. If it did have men in power in these Halls, they were suppliant tools in the hands of the East. Individual applause was more to them than the progress of their States. The legislation of Congress is done in committee-rooms; and as the East had charge of the committees, she did the work with a graceful hand in her own interest.

As evidence of my allegations, let me call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the following extract from the Chicago Daily Inter-Ocean, a leading western republican paper:

Few people are aware of the great advantages which long experience confers upon a representative in either branch of Congress, but more especially upon members of the popular branch. It compensates, in a great degree, for superior ability. In fact, a man with fair capacity in the business affairs of life becomes in the course of eight or ten years of continuous service in Congress efficient and influential. No matter what his rank, position, or talent, as recognized at home, he is able during his first term to exercise but a very moderate influence. It is of little avail to carry a great name from his State, and seek upon the strength of that to become a leader in that body. He soon learns that the Cæsar of an Alpine village lacks very much of being the dictator of the House. He must begin at the foot of the ladder and come up slowly, and will be tolerated in no other course. More than one worthy, but too ambitious gentleman, has learned the truth of these statements during the present session, and in a way in which he had much rather not have been instructed. Every new member realizes that a species of tyranny exists in the House, which circumscribes his efforts and keeps him under. The first event which brings him anything like a cordial recognition is a re-election. A third election places him in a fair position, and a further continuance of popular confidence renders him influential, and gives his voice its weight in the councils of the nation. How wise, then, the course of the East in returning its old and faithful servants, and how short-sighted in the West to discard them at such short intervals as to send them back into private life having accomplished comparatively nothing. The great element of usefulness is knowledge in detail of all the minutiæ of legislation. To acquire this here is the work of years, no matter what the member's talent or previous culture may have been.

How the East has profited through her sensible course in this matter is best shown in the reduction of her taxation during the past few years, while with us it has in most cases increased, and in others but slowly reduced. In 1867 Massachusetts paid in internal-revenue taxes $28,088,078. In 1868 they were reduced to $17,751,223, and in 1873 they had them down to $3,761,005. In the manufacturing State of Rhode Island they went down from $5,049,974 in 1867, to $324,552 in 1873. In Connecticut during the same period they were reduced from $7,582,971 to $873,985. In Illinois they rose during the same time from $12,112,986 to $16,493,169. In Iowa and Wisconsin there was indeed a reduction during this period, but it was slight and insignificant compared with that of these wealthy manufacturing States. These three estimated States paid over $2,500,000 in income taxes during the fiscal year 1872, all of which has been repealed. These figures show that the burden of taxation has been lifted from the East, now so wealthy and easy in regard to money matters that she resists any scheme of relief for the West. But where have we seen any reduction of the prices of manufactured articles at all commensurate with this relief from taxation? On the contrary, have we not seen the productions of the West declining in purchasing power at the same time that taxation is constantly piled upon us?

Under the dictation, and for the exclusive interest of the East, the West has seen one by one of the Southern States dismantled and placed under control of the most godless set of scamps that were ever vomited from the North. She has seen that great and beautiful country placed by what is called "reconstruction," "civil governments," in a far worse condition than by the devastations of ruthless men; and has seen it without the power to restrain such enormous oppression. But, thank God, the day has at last come when the West will throw its mighty arm around and over those desolated States and will protect them from the vampires now fixed upon them, as virtue is against vice and law against disorder in her own limits. The West fully comprehends that the South is her national ally in productions, tastes, and situation; and to further permit the East to subjugate her and hold her as one of its provinces, its Botany Bay, in which to send its scoundrels, would be courting the invasion of her States by the same power.

The East has accomplished, through its Representatives and its minions in other States, all that species of class legislation that has placed the South under the heel of the robber, the West under the heel of the monopolist, and the Government under its arbitrary dictation. The West has seen this and has become a unit in opposition to its continuance. What, Mr. Speaker, is to be the result of this initiated antagonism between the East and the West? Does it portend another sectional war, as predicted by the New York Herald? By no means. The West wants no more war. She wants peace, and will have it. She has at last awakened from the lethargy of years and finds that she has passed from the feebleness of childhood to the power of a great giant, and by that power she will have peace. Her voice is now the voice of twenty million earnest, energetic people. The vote of her farmer is as good as the vote of the Boston banker, and it must have its weight in the councils of this Government. Had her voice been heard then there would not have been that aggregation of the agricultural interests all over the West and South, whose wave is sensibly felt in these Halls at this early day, and who will elevate the banner of universal freedom to sections, trades, professions, and States.

This fight may not be made as republicans or democrats, but certainly will be as an injured and wronged people. Injury and despair invite all classes, all parties, into one harmonious whole. In the years that are past we have borne the heavy burdens imposed upon us without a murmur, even when opening and improving our new western homes. The mothers of the West but five years ago nursed their children within the sounds of the savage war-whoop in front and the coming locomotive in the rear, and the sons of these brave mothers grew into heroes, and though their deeds have never been written on the gilded page of history and recorded on imperishable monuments of brass and marble, they have left by their wonderful achievement in causing the West "to bloom and blossom as the rose," a monument in cultivated acres, in humble homes, in splendid cities, and in treading millions of coming generations that will rise up and call their names blessed! The love of the human heart is the best monument after all.

During the last twelve years the West has paid in tariff duties and taxes to the East more than it took to support the Government during the first fifty years of its existence. This enormous sum has been paid, year after year, under the excited cry of loyalty and protection to our own home manufactures; and year after year have our people seen, without complaint, the assessor of the Government listing their property for other and greater taxation, when the wealth of the East was not paying one dollar. As long as our people had the money the taxes were paid without threats, without murmurings; but when the East absorbed the money for stock-gambling, leaving nothing with which to pay their taxes, only their homes and household gods, then a voice of wrath was heard above the shout of the gambler and the cry of the bondholder. As the cry of the mother for her children was heard above the shout of the excited soldiery and the burning castle in Victor Hugo's '93, so is the cry of our people now heard here above the shouting lobbyist and the sycophantic pæans of praise to the President.

The West asks only for its share of the currency to aid in carrying our produce to market, and in building up domestic industries, and you call us "ignorant barbarians" moved by "Punic faith," with no regard for "extorted obligations" and the pledges of the Government. Is such treatment right, is it Christian, is it brotherly, after our long years of toil and heroic endurance? Such treatment has driven the iron into our souls. That great country will be a unit henceforth and forever, and it having the numerical power, will hereafter dictate the policy of this Government with a broad and enlightened statesmanship, giving to the East such laws as will move her looms and machinery; giving to the North laws that will generously govern her wonderful trade; giving to the South—that poor, oppressed handmaiden—a warm, life-giving sympathy, a full restoration of free government, and giving to her own sons equal laws and an equal chance in the race of life. Then we will all be happy once more; then America will be—

The land of the free, the home of the brave.

CHEAP TRANSPORTATION.

[Mr. HENDEE addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

EDUCATION.

Mr. DARRALL. Mr. Speaker, the bill reported from the Committee on Education and Labor, to set aside forever, for educational purposes, the proceeds of the sale of the public lands, has not been as yet discussed fully by this Congress, and for the reason that many who favored the bill in the Forty-second Congress, and would favor it now if our financial condition were not so deplorable as they consider it, desire that the subject should not be acted on at the present, as they think it is not wise to divert any of the revenues of the country from the paying of current expenses and the public debt. To me this is not a good reason or a wise policy. The revenue derived from the sale of lands is not large enough to greatly aid in reducing the public debt or defraying current expenses; but it is large enough if applied according to the provisions of this bill, to stimulate and very materially aid the educational interests of the whole country, and more especially of the South where it is so much needed.

There has been, as I said, no full discussion of this bill in the present Congress, but it was most fully discussed in all its bearings by the Forty-second Congress, in the House of Representatives. The opponents of the bill urged every conceivable constitutional and other argument, and it was ably defended by its friends. The debate occupied a number of days, and the bill was finally passed the 8th of February, 1872, by a very considerable majority. But it failed in the Senate from want of action by that body. I had hoped before this, Mr. Speaker, that action could be had by this Congress, and feel assured that on a full hearing the bill could be passed. And I for one deprecate the course some gentlemen have marked out for themselves in legislating for the country, as if we were indeed bankrupt. I admit that there is financial distress, and even suffering, in some parts of the country, but this is not, in my opinion, sufficient reason for delaying action on this measure. And I trust action may be had, now that the session is so near to a close.

Mr. Speaker, it hardly seems necessary at this time to speak of the benefits of education, of the advantages to be derived from a complete education of all the people of a country or nation. All admit that these advantages are beyond calculation; but unless we come to a consideration of the influences of education on the whole physical and moral well-being of a people, unless we take the evidence that the statistics give us, of its effect in elevating and ennobling a people, of its effect in suppressing vice and crime, we can never fully appreciate its benefits.

All experience in the past teaches us that as a people or nation advance in education they become better citizens in every respect in peace and more terrible in war. A government republican in form is entirely different from a government based on the mere will of the people governed. The latter mode of government may be in the form of a monarchy or an empire, based on the suffrages of the people, as the late empire of France was. But the American idea of a government republican in form contemplates an original constitutional charter, dividing the powers into executive, legislative, and judicial branches, each independent of and distinct from the other, elected by the people or chosen as they may direct, at stated intervals, out of and by the body of the people, every citizen enjoying absolute equality in the expression of his right to make this choice. Such a republic could not have been founded and cannot exist without the education of all its children—I say all of its children, because the nearer we get to educating every child born in our limits the safer will be the perpetuity and glory of our country.

I do not suppose any one will assert that a republic such as ours could be maintained by a people ignorant entirely, or even a majority of them ignorant. Thus it will be admitted that even the maintenance of our Government does and will depend on the education of our children.

But, aside from this, education adds to the wealth, the power, and usefulness of a man, a people, or a nation. The simple capacity to read and write adds 25 per cent. to the wages of the working classes of a state, while any one with a finished education is considered to be possessed of a fortune, and it is such if properly used. As the advantage derived by a young man thoroughly educated over one entirely or partly ignorant in the race of life, so is the advantage of a state or nation whose people are all educated and enlightened over that whose people are in whole or in part steeped in ignorance.

Education stimulates military power. The best-educated nations are the strongest in war; better versed in all the arts of war. It also teaches the power of diplomacy, rendering the nation able to defend and protect itself in time of peace. In this country especially education gives to the individual political power over other men. Education adds to the usefulness of the nation in every respect. It is not necessary to enumerate how in the last few hundred years education, the common and the higher education of the sciences and arts, has steadily stimulated all the industries of the world. And history in all cases teaches us that as a nation progresses in education and knowledge, so does it progress in power and material greatness; that when a nation neglects to educate its people, it is sure to tend downward in all that constitutes true power and greatness. In our day, if one is asked to point to the greatest nations of the earth, and especially in the light of late events, the reply is at once Germany and England. The one with its system of education made compulsory, and where it is estimated that fully 96 per cent. of all the youth of a school age attend the elementary schools; the other with its comprehensive system of public schools and its higher schools richly endowed, and with their histories of hundreds of years of usefulness, in producing the best scholars and greatest men of the world. Thus it is shown that education increases the power, the wealth, and greatness of any nation. And more than all this, in a nation and a Government such as ours the very life of the nation itself depends on the education, the intelligence of its people. In a Republic such as ours, where each citizen is absolutely the equal of all others, all must be educated.

But if the possession of education adds so much to a people or an individual, the want of it is shown even more plainly in the tendency to degradation and vice; and here we have some most suggestive data from the census, and from statistics compiled in our own and other countries. If we compare education and pauperism, we find that almost one-half of the paupers of the country are entirely uneducated and illiterate, while less than one-seventieth part of them have had a liberal education. If we compare education and crime, the statistics are indeed suggestive. According to our last census, of the total population 5,660,074 report themselves illiterate; of these 1,356,302 were residents of the Northern States, and the statistics of crime in those States show only one homicide to every 56,000 inhabitants, while in the Southern States, with their illiterate population of 4,189,972, the same statistics show one homicide for every 10,000 inhabitants.

The general statistics on this subject of the comparison of ignorance to crime are very imperfectly kept; but in the report of the Commissioner of Education there is a collection of facts in regard to prison life in New England, gathered from personal visitation and observation, that is more satisfactory in its showing of actual results than anything in the general census. I will, with the consent of the House, briefly state these facts: Eighty per cent. of the crime of New England is committed by persons who have no education, or none sufficient to serve any useful or valuable purpose in life; 28 per cent. of all the prisoners are unable to read or write; from 10 to 20 per cent. of the population commit all the crime, and less than ⅛ of 1 per cent. is committed by those who are educated; from 80 to 90 per cent. of all the criminals there have never learned any trade or mastered any skilled labor; from 80 to 90 per cent. connect their crime with intemperance. And more suggestive even than this is the information gleaned from the juvenile reformatories and reform schools. Ninety-five per cent., almost all, of the offenders in these institutions come from idle, ignorant, and vicious homes; while about the same per cent. of juvenile offenders did not attend school, or committed the crime for which they were imprisoned while playing truant from school.

But it is not necessary to dilate further on the necessity of education to the individual or to the nation. This is admitted by all, that our endeavor should be to give every child the opportunity to acquire at least an elementary education, and it is fast coming to be the opinion of the best educators of the country that every child should be compelled to attend the public schools for a certain minimum length of time, sufficient to acquire a knowledge of the elementary branches, this compulsory system to be inaugurated by State laws. The idea of a system of compulsory education in the various States and by State laws has been much discussed of late years, and many object to it on the ground that it is an infringement on the natural right of parents to compel them to allow their children to be educated; that it arrogates new power to the Government, is un-American, and not adapted to our free institutions. Those who oppose this are in favor of such a law on general principles, admit the necessity in a Government such as ours that all should be educated, but they do not like the enforcement of it, do not like the idea of compelling a child to learn to read and write; this to their mind is tyrannical. But they shut their eyes to the fact that the country swarms with vast numbers of children, the heirs of ignorance, penury, and vice, whose parents refuse to give them the chance of an education such as the public schools furnish, but who nevertheless as soon as of age will have all the rights of citizenship granted by our laws to the oldest and wisest men among us, and who in time go to swell our already crowded prisons and penitentiaries, and thus necessitating the State and community to pay for their neglect to compel such a knowledge to be acquired by the child as will cause him to avoid and shrink from crime and vice when a man. But the answer to all this is, that the State, in justice to itself, should demand of every person claiming citizenship at least an elementary knowledge of his duties, and as this knowledge must come from the volition of the parent and not of the child, the State should enforce the rights of the child from the parent.

Schools free to all should be provided by the State, and such a law should be placed in all the statute-books as would compel the attendance of all its children. This question is one that affects our national life; for, besides the children growing up in ignorance of our own, this country is becoming the receptacle of the poor and ignorant from many lands, and the sooner we decide that their children shall be compelled to accept the aid furnished them by the State to acquire a knowledge of their duties as citizens, the better it will be. As I said, this is fast becoming the opinion of our best educators and is recommended by many of the superintendents of education in the various States; and it is a matter of note that only a few days ago the governor of the Empire State of New York signed a law providing for compulsory education, passed at the last session of the Legislature of that State.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it will be well to consider, and briefly, the necessity for increased educational facilities, and the benefits likely to accrue by the General Government aiding the States in the manner proposed by this bill. In considering the necessity of increased educational advantages, it is only by looking at the exact condition of some parts of the country as shown by the late census that this can be fully understood. In eight States of the Union, that is, Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia, over 50 per cent. of the inhabitants ten years of age and over are reported as illiterate; while in four more, that is, Arkansas, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Texas, over 35 per cent. of the inhabitants of ten years and over are illiterate. These are the southern and border States. And the large percentage of illiteracy is greatly owing to the liberated colored people. Still it must be borne in mind that those States never had any system of free schools, properly so-called, and that in some of them a very large percentage of the white population are as ignorant as the colored.

Following these States in the line of illiteracy come other border States, so called; West Virginia, with over 26 per cent. of same ages; Delaware, with over 24 per cent.; Maryland, with over 23 per cent.; and Missouri, with over 18 per cent., reported uneducated.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the darkest side of the picture; and surely such a showing of misfortune and ignorance appeals to our every sentiment of patriotism. In other sections of the Union, notably in some of the extreme Eastern States, all this is happily reversed in the showing made by the census. But in several of the Western States, with their population made up so largely of foreigners, a considerable percentage of ignorance prevails, giving room even there for renewed energy on the part of those States in the cause of education to provide for the ever-increasing tide of ignorant children whose parents are emigrants from the Old World.

It will thus be seen that the great necessity for education exists in the southern portion of the Union; that in eight of these States over one-half of the inhabitants ten years of age and over are ignorant.

Such a condition, Mr. Speaker, cannot exist in so large a portion of our common country without danger to the whole country. No one will deny this; and if we would act the part of wise and far-seeing statesmen we would apply the remedy at once. Even while we are delaying, year after year, the children of that section are growing up beyond the reach of education. No time should be lost, for a generation of youth soon passes the school age. If we are going to act we should act at once. This measure has been prepared after long and thorough debate and review of the whole situation. It has been discussed, as I said, by the last House of Representatives, and by them passed; it has been discussed generally by the press of the country, and by it indorsed; and it has the indorsement of our most eminent educators, and the school officers of most of the States—this especially being the case in the Southern States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to look at the features of the bill itself. They are briefly this: That the net proceeds of the sale of the public lands hereafter shall be set aside for educational purposes; one-half of the amount to be invested by the Secretary of the Treasury in bonds of the United States bearing interest at 5 per cent.; this investment to constitute a permanent fund in the Treasury of the United States, to be known as the national educational fund; and the interest of which is to be distributed annually, with the other half of the net proceeds of the sales, among the various States and Territories upon the basis of population in each between the ages of four and twenty-one. The apportionment for the first five years is to be made according to the number of population of ten years old and upward who cannot write. To avail themselves of the benefits of this act each of the States and Territories are required to provide by law for the free education of all its children between the ages of six and sixteen years; to apply all moneys received in accordance with the provisions of this act; and to report in full the number of free schools, teachers employed, and other school statistics yearly; and also the amounts appropriated by the Legislature of the State or Territory for the maintenance of free public schools. Further, the act provides that any State receiving its proportion of this fund may devote 50 per cent. of such amount received the first year to establish and maintain a school or schools for the education of teachers of common schools, or what is known as a normal school or schools; and 10 per cent. of the amount each year after the first to be applied to the payment of teachers in such schools. And it further provides that this fund shall be paid to the superintendent of education or such officer as may be designated by law in each State to receive it, and shall be apportioned by him among the various school districts in the State on the basis of the population in such districts between the ages of six and sixteen years, the whole amount so apportioned among the school districts to be applied to the payment of teachers' wages. There are further provisions against misapplying any of this fund, but those above stated are the main features of the bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it will be seen that we do not propose in any way to interfere with the control of the States as entirely and completely as now over the education of their children. If the bill did I should not favor it, for I would be the last one to interfere with our American system of public schools which has accomplished so much. On the contrary this amount will go to each State to aid and encourage the cause of education there. It will be distributed by State officers entirely, by the school directors and commissioners in their various school districts; and the only restrictions whatever placed upon this free gift is that it shall go to all the children of a State, and shall be for the payment of teachers alone and for the founding of teachers' schools. Could any fund be more wisely distributed, and in a way to do more good? This, too, is only following a precedent from the foundation of the Government, of aiding educational enterprises by the grant of portions of the public lands. The grant to the various States of lands to found agricultural colleges was of this nature, only in my opinion not near so worthy. And this proposes to go further in this, that it sets aside all the public domain for free-school purposes, and distributes the proceeds of it among the States in proportion to where it is most needed. It is in other words taking our mighty domain of public lands, great in extent even now after the millions of acres that have been granted to railroads and other enterprises of internal improvement, out of the reach of further grants to less deserving purposes, and setting it aside for the education of the children of the poor and laboring classes in the public schools of the States. It is giving to the toiling masses of the country the benefit of this their great inheritance for the education of their children. The poor people, the laboring people of this country, claim, and justly, that the public lands of the nation are their inheritance. They have spoken, and in tones not to be misunderstood, their disapproval of the indiscriminate grant of hundreds of millions of acres of these lands, of empires in extent, to single railroad corporations; and in my opinion nothing we can do with our public lands will be more gratefully and thankfully received by the people than this. Much the largest and best portion of this great inheritance that comes to us from our fathers is gone, and no one will deny that some of it was not applied in the best and wisest manner. It remains for us to consecrate the balance to the benefit of those who need it, of the poor and ignorant; to the benefit of the young who are fast growing up to take our places, and whom it should be our chief aim to qualify to perform their duties as citizens of our great country. And we should do this now, for these lands are fast being bought up. Each year lessens the amount we retain; each year thousands of emigrants from other shores, with the sons and daughters of our own people in the older States who go to the West to found themselves homes, are filling up these broad and boundless prairies, penetrating across what was the great American desert, and into the valleys of the great mountains to the west, following the streams and water-courses. Where yesterday was a desert or waste prairie, to-day is a thriving farm or growing village. Year by year more and more is gone, and in a very few years little or no good public land will remain. May that day, Mr. Speaker, hasten and come, and happy American homes be dotted over all those vast wastes. It is for us to wisely apply the proceeds from all these lands, and we should begin doing so now; too much has already been squandered.

It will be noticed that only one-half of the amount realized from the sale of land is to be distributed yearly, the other half being allowed to remain in the Treasury of the United States as a permanent educational fund, the interest of which only is distributed annually. This is thought to be a better plan than to use up the whole amount each year, as we thus have a permanent fund which will be steadily increasing, and which no doubt will in time be added to in other ways, as from unexpended balances of appropriations for other purposes, educational or scientific, and from money which comes into the Treasury from special sources and ought not to be used for general purposes. It is also believed that such a fund once established will attract large annual increase from individuals and charitable organizations. When it is known that this is to be a permanent fund, the interest of which will be applied to the education of all the children of the country, it will no doubt become the recipient of large benefactions. To illustrate this fact, it is shown by the Commissioner of Education from such imperfect statistics as he could gather that during the last year the large amount of $8,533,760 has been contributed by private persons to the cause of education. And this includes only such large sums as would attract notice in the newspapers, and of money alone. Much more was contributed in lands and other valuables. Beside this, it has been thought that it would not be right to use all the public lands for the education of one or two generations, for by that time they will be all sold, but to set aside one-half as a permanent fund for future years, or to be drawn on at any time the necessities of education will demand.

The amount to be distributed to the States under the provisions of this bill will not be large, not enough to cause the localities where it may be received to cease their own efforts and depend on this for the support of their schools, but it will be enough to stimulate these localities to increase the funds they raise themselves—enough to give encouragement to many localities in the Southern States where the people are struggling for education with so many disadvantages against them. As an illustration of what a fund of this kind will do we have only to look at the Peabody fund, the amount of which, distributed yearly, is only about $100,000, but which it is estimated now causes the expenditure for education in the localities where it reaches of at least five times that amount, or $500,000. The total net amount realized from the sale of public lands it is estimated will reach the sum of $2,000,000 annually. It has not been quite that large in former years, but from the best authority on the subject it is estimated that this amount will be realized hereafter. Assuming it to be, and we have the one-half, or $1,000,000, to distribute among the various States and Territories, on the basis of illiteracy, as reported in the late census, of those ten years of age and over who could not write. I give the amount that would be received in a portion of the States and Territories as an illustration, and to show that it would be received where most needed. They would be entitled to the following amounts:

Alabama	$67,678 22	Kentucky	$58,695 50
Arkansas	23,561 00	Tennessee	64,441 96
Florida	12,687 59	Texas	39,174 92
Delaware	4,081 77	Illinois	23,004 29
Georgia	82,800 38	Idaho	598 66
Louisiana	48,797 12	Ohio	30,599 49
Mississippi	55,361 88	Rhode Island	3,873 44
Missouri	39,300 02	Virginia	78,789 29
Maryland	23,942 67	West Virginia	14,397 28
Massachusetts	17,271 01	South Carolina	51,508 96
Maine	3,366 49	District of Columbia	5,074 65
North Carolina	70,271 82	New Mexico	9,227 27

It will be seen by the above that by far the greater proportion, indeed very nearly four-fifths of the total sum, will go to the Southern States, where it is shown that over 50 per cent. of the people are illiterate; that is, this would be the case for the first five years, under the provisions of the bill distributing according to the illiteracy in the various States. Afterward different provisions could be made, or the distribution could continue the same, which in my opinion would give the most satisfactory results.

Mr. Speaker, this act will be giving the greater part of the revenue derived from the sale of public lands to one section of the country for at least the first five years. It will be taking what is the common inheritance of the whole country and giving it to a portion of the country for the education of the children of that portion. This is a kind of legislation that should not be had unless it can be shown that it will do more good than if it were to be distributed pro rata among all the States, be of more benefit to the whole country in the end, and unless it can be also shown that the States to be aided are in absolute need of such help, have done their part, all they can do, to provide for the education of their children, but are not able to do so. The first of the above propositions is easy to demonstrate. In a government such as ours it is unsafe to the whole for one portion of the country to remain in ignorance. That portion under our system may often have the deciding of what the policy of the whole country may be, and may through ignorance decide wrong, may decide in a way to do irreparable harm to all. Nothing is clearer than that it is unsafe to the North so long as the South, or a great portion of it, remains with over 50 per cent. of its people in ignorance. And if those States are unable to help themselves, it is the part of wisdom to help and encourage them by aid from the General Government either in this or some other manner. And, further than this, the colored people in the South, made free by the war, were given the full rights of citizenship long after the war by the people of the North through their Congress, a just and righteous measure, and the only way in which that people could have retained the liberty granted to them. Being given these rights of citizenship, they have some claim on the people of the North for a knowledge of how to properly exercise them. The colored people of the South, ground down by slavery before the war, and the poor white people, in a condition next to slavery in every respect, with no schools, no opportunities of education, appeal to a generous and wealthy North, to a section where every child has facilities for education, to aid them in getting a start; and they make this appeal in confidence that aid will be granted. And it is also easy to show that the Southern States have done their part in the cause of the education of their children; that they have inaugurated in every one a system of free schools; that they are taxing themselves as heavily in proportion to their means as any of the other States, but that still they are unable to provide schools for even half of their children.

I only need to cite one authority in proof that the above assertions are facts; and this is Dr. Sears, agent of the Peabody fund. He says:

> The greatest obstacle is in the inability, not merely the unwillingness, of the Southern States to tax themselves heavily enough to educate the colored people.

He further says:

> With such a bill as this, and with the aid from the Peabody fund, small though it is, the people would feel encouraged to take hold. My knowledge on this subject is positive and definite. I have seen the leading friends of education in twelve States.

This comes from the highest authority on the subject in the country, and is conclusive. But aside from this, the financial distress existing in the South at the close of the war, and which still exists in many portions, is known to all. Then the fact that so large a proportion of the population there have just emerged from slavery, and have everything else to provide for themselves besides education for their children, is sufficient to convince us that, without outside help and encouragement, it will be many years before they can provide education also. If we look to the foundation and growth of the free-school system in the Northern States we will see that, with encouragements that do not and never will exist in the South, it was only after thirty and forty years of effort in some of the older States, and by large grants of lands in the newer States, that they have attained their present efficiency, and in most or all of these States they have a large fund from sale of lands or from other sources, while no such fund exists in the South, all their revenues for schools being raised by taxation.

The following table is appended, taken from the report of the Commissioner of Education, to show the amount expended in the different States and Territories per capita of the population of legal school age:

It will be seen by this exhibit that with the exception of Texas the amount per capita for school purposes in Southern States is entirely insufficient. It is in the recollection of all of us how the free-school system was inaugurated in the Northern States and what it had to contend with from prejudice and want of interest on the part of the people; but it has demonstrated its benefits long ago in the increased wealth and prosperity of that part of the country. And the South, with this example before them, are willing and anxious under the new order of things there since the war, to adopt and carry out the same system for the education of their children. They enter on this for the most part now, without prejudice and with hearty interest in its success, the only drawback being their poverty and want of means to educate their immense number of ignorant children. They are now where the North was years ago, in this: that they have no school funds, no school property either in lands or houses, have no competent teachers or few of them, have all the experience in conducting and applying a system of free schools to learn; and, further, are worse off than the North ever was on account of their poverty. To gentlemen who come here from the North and East, where in all their towns and villages they have their expensive academies and school buildings, with all the most recent improvements in school facilities for teaching and school-house furniture, and where at every cross-road, in every neighborhood, however small, they have convenient school-houses, it will be perhaps a surprise to learn that in the whole district of fourteen parishes or counties that I have the honor to represent on this floor there is not one school-house really suitable according to advanced ideas for the purpose for which it is used. On this subject Hon. W. G. Brown, superintendent of education of Louisiana, says:

> With the exception of New Orleans and one or two older towns in the interior of the State, we have no school buildings worthy the name. In the country, scholars are taught under the trees and in buildings (sheds, rather) that have no windows or doors.

And this condition exists to greater or less degree in all the Southern States. With your experience in the North you can imagine, even with the aid we will get from the Government should this bill become a law, the length of time it will take us to build houses, to educate teachers, and to even approximate the success in education achieved with you.

Mr. Speaker, should this bill become a law, the benefits derived from it will be for at least the first five years derived mostly by the Southern States, and mostly by the colored people, the late slaves in those States. I am aware, sir, that much has been done for the colored people in the last few years, since the beginning of the late war. And there are some who think enough has already been done for this people. But all that has been done has been but justice to them, and a long-delayed justice at that for the generations that lived and passed away in a cruel bondage. All that has been done has simply been giving this people their natural and inalienable rights that were withheld for long weary years. They have been made free, have been given the rights of citizenship in the land, that thousands of them gave up their lives to save. All this, Mr. Speaker, has been but granting them justice, has been but giving them what they were entitled to from the first. And one other right we still deny them, and that is equality in their civil rights. The colored people of the South are grateful to the North, grateful to Congress, for all they have had, for freedom, for the rights of citizenship. They have suffered in patience, much and long; but they ask of this Congress the passage of such a civil-rights bill as will protect them in almost all that to a sensitive mind renders life valuable. And this will only be an act of justice, only be placing this class of our citizens on an equality with all other citizens of the country. When this the last act of justice is accomplished, we will have done our duty, and only our duty, by these people. We will then have been just, and, sir, I appeal to gentlemen on this floor, let us also be generous; let us aid them by the passage of this bill to educate their children, to make them worthy of position as citizens of such a country as ours.

Such generosity as this will not be misplaced. It is known to all the wonderful thirst of these people for an education and the progress they have made. Only a few years ago and it was doubted by some unprejudiced people if they had the capacity to acquire an education. And though in those days in the South—days that happily are past and gone—their school-houses were burned and their little ones driven to their homes, still they have persevered, till now their children have not only shown an aptitude remarkable in the elementary branches, but are crowding the higher schools and colleges and entering the learned professions. I doubt very much if any people ever showed greater progress in so short a time than they have. It is not only generous, but the part of wisdom to aid these States in educating their children. I trust Congress will be both generous and wise, and pass this bill.

Mr. STORM. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at eight o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BROMBERG: The petition of the Mobile Board of Trade, for the repeal of the tax of 10 per cent. on the circulating notes of national banks, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee: The petition of a large number of citizens of Tennessee, that a pension be granted to James Cox, late private Company C, First Regiment East Tennessee Cavalry, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CONGER: The memorial of the common council of the city of Port Huron, Michigan, in relation to the boundary line of Pine Grove Park, in said city, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, the petition of J. T. S. Minne, William Gowan, and 150 other citizens of Brockway, Michigan, for a pension to Mrs. Catharina McGrattan, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CROUNSE: Petitions from Grange organizations in Cuming, Johnson, Hall, and Saunders Counties, Nebraska, for the construction of the Continental Railway, and the passage of the House bill therefor, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. DUNNELL: Petitions of Patrons of Husbandry in Banks, Faribault, and Watonwan Counties, Minnesota, of similar import, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. HAGANS: The petition of James Cummings, of Washington, District of Columbia, for payment for lumber and cord-wood used by the Army in West Virginia in 1862, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. LUTTLELL: Several petitions of citizens of California, for a post-route from Truckee to Downieville, California, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. McCRARY: The petition of John W. Walton, administrator of the estate of Henry Bascus, for the payment of bounty-money due said Bascus, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petitions from citizens and grange organizations of Jefferson, Washington, and Van Buren Counties, Iowa, for the construction of the Continental Railway and passage of the House bill therefor, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. O'BRIEN: Additional evidence relative to application of Magdalena Bodine for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of Charles T. Holloway, of Baltimore, Maryland, for payment for hay taken for barricading purposes in June, 1863, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. ORR: Petitions from grange organizations of Calhoun County, Iowa, of similar import, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. SMART: The petition of Emily McClure, widowed mother of Thomas J. McClure, late lieutenant Seventh New York Artillery, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. STRAIT: Petitions from grange organizations of Renville and Rice Counties, Minnesota, for the construction of the Continental Railway and passage of the House bill therefor, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. WILSON, of Iowa: Petitions from citizens of Linn and Marshall Counties, Iowa, for the construction of the Continental Railway and passage of the House bill therefor, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. ———: Copies of papers in the cotton claim of Anderson & White, to the Committee on War Claims.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 20, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a petition of citizens of Detroit, Michigan, praying for the passage of a law defining a gross of matches, and to provide for uniform packages; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I present the memorial of a number of citizens of this city, property-holders, remonstrating against so much of Senate bill No. 265 as provides for a railroad along C street between Second and Seventh streets northwest. The memorialists object on the ground that the carriage-way of that street is only thirty feet wide from curb to curb, and the location of a railroad track in the center of it would destroy the use of the street. They further state that the property along that street consists principally of private residences which are valuable, and would be seriously and permanently injured by the construction of the proposed railroad, and that being in the immediate vicinity of Pennsylvania avenue and F street they now have abundant railroad facilities. As this bill has already been reported, I move that the memorial lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM presented the petition of William Webster, praying additional compensation to that already allowed him for damage to his property at Newport News, Virginia, during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LEWIS presented a petition of physicians of Rockingham County, Virginia, praying the establishment of a marine and military hospital at Massanetta Springs in that county; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Committee on Pensions some time since, to whom was referred the petition of Captain Jacob Nix, praying to be allowed a pension, reported it back and asked to be discharged from its further consideration. Since then some papers have been received changing the aspect of the case; and I now move that the petition be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions with the additional papers which I now present.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. KELLY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 730) to provide for ascertaining the amount of damage sustained by citizens of Texas from marauding bands of Indians and Mexicans upon the frontiers of Texas, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; which was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 761) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to pay $100,000 out of the proceeds of the sale of lands known as the Cherokee strip to the Cherokee nation, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3350) for the relief of Norman Wiard, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Patents; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 551) to provide for the settlement of claims of loyal persons against the United States occurring during the late rebellion, and for other purposes, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SCOTT. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims to report back the joint resolution (H. R. No. 94) directing the commissioners of claims to send to Congress without delay the claims decided prior to April 1, 1874, which a few days since was recommitted to the Committee on Claims, with an adverse recommendation; and in making that adverse recommendation I beg leave to say that the resolution itself recites a memorial which was presented to the commissioners of claims requesting them to make a supplementary report, and alleging that no report had been made, and therefore calling for this supplemental report. That memorial was signed by a number of Senators and Representatives, some of whom have stated that they did it on the request of their constituents, claimants, and was signed by some members of the Committee on Claims; but after hearing representatives of the claimants and the commissioners of claims themselves, it is due to all the parties to state that it is deemed inexpedient that this resolution should be passed.

The joint resolution was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. LOGAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3166) to correct the date of commission of certain officers of the Army, to report the same back with an amendment to the preamble; and I ask for action at this time, as a similar Senate bill has already been passed here and gone to the House.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objection carries the bill over.

Mr. LOGAN. I give notice that I will call it up to-morrow morning.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 652) conferring exclusive jurisdiction over Indian reservations upon the United States courts and for the punishment of crimes by and against Indians, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 546) for the relief of William B. Morgan, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 671) for the relief of Alexander Minor, of West Virginia, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 833) granting a pension to Josefa Pares; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAGER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 834) for the relief of the settlers on the Soscol tract of land in Solano County, California; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO AN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SAULSBURY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 3030) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1873 and 1874, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

EXPORTATION OF DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. WRIGHT submitted the following report, which was read:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 2081) to facilitate the exportation of distilled spirits, and amendatory of the acts in relation thereto, having met, after a full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their first amendment.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the second, third, and fourth amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same.

The committee further recommend the following as a substitute for the bill: strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

That whenever the owner or owners of distilled spirits shall desire to withdraw the same from any distillery bonded warehouse for exportation under existing law, such owner or owners may at their option, in lieu of executing an export bond as now provided by law, give a transportation bond with sureties satisfactory to the collector of internal revenue and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, conditioned for the due delivery thereof on board ship at a port of exportation to be named therein; and in such case, on arrival of the spirits at the port of export, the exporter or owner at that port shall immediately notify the collector of the port of the fact, setting forth his intention to export the same, and the name of the vessel upon which the same are to be laden, and the port to which they are intended to be exported. He shall, after the quantity of spirits has been determined by the gauger and inspector, file with the collector of the port an export entry verified by his oath or affirmation. He shall also give bond to the United States, with at least two sureties, satisfactory to the collector of customs, conditioned that the principal named in said bond will export the spirits as specified in said entry to the port designated in said entry, or to some other port without the jurisdiction of the United States. And upon the lading of such spirits, the collector of the port, after proper bonds for the exportation of the same have been completed by the exporter or owner at the port of shipment thereof, shall transmit to the collector of internal revenue of the district from which the said spirits were withdrawn for exportation, a clearance certificate and a detailed report of the gauger, which report shall show the capacity of each cask in wine gallons and the contents thereof in wine gallons, proof gallons, and taxable gallons. Upon receipt of the certificate and report, and upon payment of tax on deficiency, if any, the collector of internal revenue shall cancel the transportation bond. The bonds required to be given for the landing at a foreign port of distilled spirits shall be canceled upon the presentation of satisfactory proof and certificates that said distilled spirits have been landed at the port of destination named in the bill of lading or any other port without the jurisdiction of the United States, or upon satisfactory proof that after shipment the same were lost at sea without fault or neglect of the owner or shipper thereof.

SEC. 2. That on and after the 1st day of July, 1874, for the expense of providing and affixing the stamps to each cask containing distilled spirits for exportation, there shall be charged ten cents for each stamp instead of twenty-five cents as now required by law.

GEORGE G. WRIGHT,
JOHN P. STOCKTON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
H. C. BURCHARD,
JOHN A. KASSON,
JAMES B. BECK,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is a very important report. It embraces questions that affect the revenue to a very large extent. I think the report had better be printed before we act upon it.

Mr. WRIGHT. This bill was passed by the House and came to the Senate and we agreed to the House bill with certain amendments in which the House refused to concur. The matter was then referred to a committee of conference; and largely from the fact that the bill was in such a form that it would be difficult to understand it, inasmuch as it proposed to amend an existing statute by striking out certain words and inserting others, it was proposed that it should be sent to the committee with the understanding that they were to put the bill in proper form. The bill is now precisely in the form contemplated by the Senate and is exactly as the Senate passed it in spirit, except that the committee recommend the use of language which carries out the design of the bill exactly as it passed the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. If it be precisely what has passed the Senate, I have no objection; but if it has been put into a new form, it is too important a question for us to pass upon the mere reading of the manuscript.

Mr. WRIGHT. It is precisely as it was passed by the Senate, except that the form is changed for the purpose of having it more easily understood.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg to make a suggestion to the Senator from Iowa in addition to that made by the Senator from Maine. This legislation relates to a very dangerous topic to touch by legislation, as the Senator from Iowa knows quite as well as I do; and although I have no reason to doubt that the committee has been successful, as I know it tried to be, in making the bill as it should be, with all the safeguards it should contain, if there is no special haste in respect of it, I think it would be well to let it be printed and lie over. I have one Senator in my mind who is not in his seat who knows a great deal on this subject necessarily, and with whom I had a conference the other day in regard to it, and I am pretty sure that he would be glad to know what this is; and if there be no special haste about it, as it is a brief report and can readily be printed, I think it had better lie until to-morrow morning.

Mr. WRIGHT. I know of no special haste, except that we have been appealed to by those engaged in shipping distilled spirits to have the bill passed as soon as possible, inasmuch as they are waiting for shipment. If it be understood that I can call it up to-morrow morning I will let the report go over.

Mr. CONKLING. There will be no objection to that.

Mr. WRIGHT. Let the report be printed and go over until to-morrow morning. I shall call it up then for the purpose of having definite action.

The report was ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS OF NORMAN WIARD.

Mr. WADLEIGH submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish copies of all documents on file in the War Department concerning the claims of Norman Wiard against the United States for expenditures upon the steamers Augusta, Savannah, Foster, Burnside, Reno, and Parker.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAILROAD.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 571) to authorize the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company to construct a branch and to change the location of its road within the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company to construct a lateral road, from any point on its Washington branch, (into the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia,) to intersect the Metropolitan branch thereof at any point in that county; and also, with both branch roads, to enter the city of Washington at a point on its northeastern boundary, between the points where the two roads now enter the city, and to locate and construct the roads upon such new route and with such number of tracks in the city as may be agreed upon between the company and the board of public works of the District of Columbia to its present passenger depot or such other as may be constructed on square 681, if such work shall be completed within five years after the passage of the act.

The bill also declares all the provisions of the several acts of Congress relating to the lateral road authorized to be built into and within the District of Columbia by an act passed March 2, 1831, entitled "An act to authorize the extension, construction, and use of a lateral branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Road into and within the District of Columbia," and the supplements thereto, shall apply, as far as they are applicable, to the location, construction, and use by the company of the roads hereby authorized to be constructed, or "to enter said city of Washington on its northeastern boundary, at Delaware avenue, and to construct said road along Delaware avenue, with as many tracks as may be necessary to connect with that portion of said Washington branch now located on said avenue."

Mr. WEST. Is that bill liable to objection?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate proceed to its consideration. If there is objection, the Chair will submit the question to the Senate.

Mr. WEST. I shall object to its consideration.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I hope there will be no objection. This is a bill that we ought to pass, and a moment's explanation I think will satisfy any Senator of the propriety of the bill. It is a bill that the railroad company and the citizens of Washington are interested in.

Mr. PRATT. It is a very ungracious business certainly to interpose any objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia; but I am very anxious indeed that the Senate should proceed to the consideration of unobjected cases on the Calendar. There are thirty private pension bills here upon the Calendar that I am very anxious to have considered, and a great many claims that have been reported upon from the Committee on Claims, and there is no earthly prospect of reaching them unless we go on with the Calendar every morning. In the interest of the Calendar, therefore, I am forced to make this objection.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It seems to me when there are so many applications for horse railroads and for steam railroads in this city, it would be very desirable indeed to have a commission appointed of competent engineers to see where they should and where they should not be located. I am averse to passing any kind of a railroad bill, either steam or horse, until——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate on the merits of the bill is not in order on a motion to proceed to its consideration.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I merely desire to say that this bill will consume a considerable amount of time if it shall be taken up this morning.

Mr. BOREMAN. I wish to say to the Senator from Vermont that this bill is merely to get the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad depot one square farther out of town.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate on the merits of the bill is out of order upon this motion.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I make the motion to bring up the bill, as I am satisfied every Senator on hearing an explanation will assent to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Virginia to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him, and which has been read.

The question being put, there were on division—ayes 24, noes 14.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I desire to make a very brief explanation of the bill. Senators all know that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad enters the city by two different routes, the branch from Baltimore by the northeast and the Metropolitan branch by the northwest. These two roads come into the city by different routes and come together on Delaware avenue near the Capitol. They approach the city passing along several streets and making several short turns. The object of the bill is to bring those two roads together outside of the city limits within the District and to let them come into the city through a common stem passing along one straight wide street, Delaware avenue. Then, instead of having two crooked lines of railroad occupying considerable space in the city, we shall have one single straight line.

In addition to that advantage, the object is to remove the depot which is now situated between North Capitol street and New Jersey avenue back and locate it between North Capitol street and Delaware avenue, which will throw it a square farther from the city and open North Capitol street, removing the railroad tracks altogether from that street and allowing its grading to be completed.

I have had an interview with the governor of the District, the president of the board of public works, and he assures me that this is very much desired by the city authorities and will be of great advantage to the city. I went over the ground myself and satisfied myself that this was an improvement not only desirable to the railroad but very desirable to the city and its people.

Mr. STEWART. I have just come in, the Senator from Louisiana having kindly sent for me.

Mr, DAVIS. If the Senator will allow me, I will explain. There are two bills pending looking to removing the tracks of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad and other railroads. This one, however, is simply to remove the depot on New Jersey avenue one square back, and make the roads come in as the Senator from Virginia says on one common line down Delaware avenue. It is now known to all Senators from the West that in coming in from the West on the Metropolitan branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad the train has to run out north and back into the depot. The intention of this bill is simply to remove the depot and let the two tracks come in on one common street, which will throw out of use the depot near the Capitol and remove it one square back toward the Government Printing Office.

Mr. STEWART. Does the road still cross Massachusetts avenue?

Mr. JOHNSTON. No, sir; it goes down Delaware avenue now.

Mr. CONKLING. It runs across Massachusetts avenue now.

Mr. STEWART. It has been suggested to me by a gentleman who has given this subject some investigation that if this bill shall become a law it ought to be so arranged that the depot should be north of or on the north side of Massachusetts avenue. There is no need of crossing that avenue.

Mr. JOHNSTON. It is not near Massachusetts avenue that I know of.

Mr. STEWART. It crosses Massachusetts avenue now. I think that piecemeal legislation in regard to these railroads has already worked sufficient injury. I would say with regard to the Baltimore and Potomac that I voted for the bill that located the terminus of that road, but I think that was a mistake. I think we shall make further mistakes if we legislate by piecemeal.

I wish to suggest, for the benefit of all concerned in these railroads, that there ought to be a commission, or some engineer, who should ascertain a plan for the railroads where they could be located, where they could have their depots and locations in such way as to interfere with the city as little as possible. Running railroads on top of the ground through cities must at some time be abandoned. It cannot be permitted to continue in this city. They will either have to be elevated or to run underground. I think from the formation of the city it will be very easy to bring the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad in so as not to interfere with the city. If they had proper means of engineering, that railroad might be run underground and not disturb the city at all. It has been suggested by persons, friends of both these railroads, desirous that they should have ample accommodations, that there is a large piece of ground near the mouth of Rock Creek, and between that and the Washington monument, submerged ground, which would make a good place for the depots of all the railroads that might come in, and that the land reclaimed would more than pay the cost, and bring them to deep water where they could get coal. It could be arranged so that the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad could go around by the monument and get out of the heart of the city, and the Baltimore and Ohio select a proper route to come in and avoid the necessity of running over the streets, endangering life and expending money on tracks that must be taken up in the future. If we pass this bill and allow this road to go to further expense, crossing the main avenues as it does on the top of the ground, it will give us trouble hereafter.

I do not believe in the present condition of things any of these bills ought to pass until there is a general investigation of the subject. I do not think it is proper to pass them, because I am perfectly satisfied that however many bills we pass allowing these roads to be on top of the ground, running on the surface across the streets, we shall in a very short time be under the necessity of causing them to be taken up, involving great expense. There is ample room for accommodations for all the railroads entering the city if the thing is done with any system.

It seems to me that the first thing to do is to perfect a system for the railways and retrace all the steps wherein we have made mistakes, so as not to injure any of them. They ought to come where they can have ample accommodations. It is for the interest of the people, as well as the railroads, that they shall be located at convenient points; but it is not for the interest of the railroads to be located in places where they will have to be removed again soon; it is not for the interest of the Government because heavy damages may be claimed; it is the interest of nobody; but it is the interest of all concerned that whatever is done shall be done in pursuance of a system that will be satisfactory for all time. This road crosses Massachusetts avenue. I do not believe that will be tolerated for five years if this bill passes.

Mr. JOHNSTON. It does not cross Massachusetts avenue at all.

Mr. STEWART. I think it does, and it creates great inconvenience. Everybody objects to the present location, and it has to be removed; it is only temporary. What I say is, when we do move it, when the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company goes to the expense of doing it, let it be done on a plan that will be satisfactory to all, and not in such a way that it will have to be moved again next year or the year after. They do not want to throw away their money in that way.

Mr. JOHNSTON. This line is satisfactory.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will say that for some time I have been trying through an amicable arrangement to bring about some plan by which all the steam railroads in this city should be fully and fairly accommodated, and I do not yet surrender all hope of being successful in doing that. There is no doubt that the Baltimore and Potomac depot and its crossing across the Mall will at a very early day be removed at whatever cost, and I think that company should have ample accommodations elsewhere as well as the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company. But I am not prepared this morning to assent to the passage of this bill until I can have an opportunity to examine it in its details and see precisely what it does and whether it accomplishes the purposes designed. I therefore ask the Senator from Virginia who has charge of the bill to allow it to go over until the morning hour to-morrow, when it can be called up; and in the mean time I will examine it on a larger map than is afforded by our Congressional Directory and see precisely what the effect of the bill will be.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I will agree to that if the Senator will call up the bill in the morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will aid in doing it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside informally, if there be no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 1995) to amend the act approved June 18, 1838, entitled "An act to require the judge of the district courts of East and West Tennessee to hold a court at Jackson, in said State;"

A bill (H. R. No. 3171) to amend the customs-revenue laws and to repeal moieties; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3417) to relieve Thomas Claiborne, of Tennessee, of political disabilities imposed upon him by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to some and disagreed to other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1013) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, asked a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. EUGENE HALE of Maine, Mr. GLENNI W. SCOFIELD of Pennsylvania, and Mr. JOHN HANCOCK of Texas, managers at the conference on its part.

The message further announced that the House had passed a resolution for the adjournment of the two Houses of Congress on the 22d day of June next, without day; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message likewise announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 253) to authorize the county commissioners of Thurston County, in Washington Territory, to issue bonds for the purpose of constructing a railroad from Budd's Inlet, Puget Sound, to intersect the Northern Pacific Railroad at or near Tenino; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

POTTAWATOMIE INDIANS.

Mr. INGALLS. A few mornings since I moved the consideration of Senate bill No. 218; but the bill was laid aside upon the request of the Senator from Texas [Mr. HAMILTON] who is now in his seat. I understand that he is satisfied with the provisions of the bill, and as I suppose objection will come probably from no other source and the matter has already received full investigation at two Congresses and reports have been made by the committees in both Houses, I ask that the bill may be now considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. KELLY. I object. I want to go on with the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 218) to enable the Secretary of the Interior to make final settlement with the Pottawatomie Indians of Michigan and Indiana under treaty stipulations existing with them.

The bill proposes to appropriate $155,447.83, for the purpose of fulfilling treaty stipulations with the Pottawatomie Indians, known as such, residing in the counties of Cass, Van Buren, and Berrien, in the State of Michigan, and Saint Joseph County, in the State of Indiana; but those Indians, being recognized and declared to be citizens of the United States, are to accept such sum in full of all demands whatsoever for all past, present, and perpetual annuities, and all claims whatsoever for lands, and trust, school, and educational funds, and all other moneyed provisions in any matter whatsoever arising from or growing out of any and all treaties or agreements to which they are parties. The Secretary of the Interior is directed to make the payment herein provided for per capita, after the manner of the payment of Indian annuities, taking their receipts therefor in accordance with the provisions of this act.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to hear the amount proposed to be appropriated by the bill read again.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is $155,447.83.

Mr. DAVIS. What committee does the bill come from?

Mr. INGALLS. From the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not know that this bill is not right; I know nothing about it; but I wish some Senator who does know about it would explain it.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. This bill came from the Committee on Indian Affairs, and it will give me pleasure to say a few words upon it, and I hope to make it clear, if it is possible for me to do so.

The Pottawatomie Nation is a nation that has always been at peace with this Government. They entered into treaties with this Government commencing in 1795, and from that date to the present there have been fourteen or fifteen treaties. The Pottawatomies have ceded to the Government their lands from time to time and received other lands or money or clothing or annuities, sometimes payable for a limited time and sometimes perpetual. These have been the considerations upon which the Pottawatomies have ceded their lands.

This continued up to the 26th of September, 1833, at which time the nation as a whole ceded five million acres in Wisconsin to the Government and received the same quantity of land in Kansas, and in addition to that they received $850,000 in money, in goods, and in annuities. But at that time there was a band living in Southern Michigan who did not subscribe to the treaty. They came in the next day, the 27th of September, 1833, and then agreed to become parties to the treaty which was made on the 26th of September. In the supplemental treaty the agreement was that they should be participators with those who made the treaty the day before, and those who made that treaty were not to forfeit any of their annuities or any of their rights under former treaties. In the supplemental treaty the band conveyed three distinct reservations in Michigan, for which they received $100,000, a part of which was an annuity of $2,000 for twenty years. After this was done the band were dissatisfied, and they made a second supplemental treaty. The great object of the treaty first made was to remove the Indians west, that they might have a home there, and they promised to remove within three years. This band was dissatisfied with that part of the arrangement, and proposed to go to Northern Michigan on account of their religious views, they having been instructed by the Catholics. Then it was determined that if they should go north they should still be participators in the benefits of the former treaties. The promise on the part of the Government was that if they should go north, although the annuities which were paid to the main nation were to be paid west of the Mississippi after three years, yet the proportion of the annuities which was due this band should be paid at L'Arbre Croche, in Michigan, where they were going. There was a separation between the main nation and this band.

At this point there comes up the question, What rights have this band in the annuities or in the lands which belonged to the tribe after the separation? In 1862 Mr. Smith, the Secretary of the Interior, said:

> That the band which by the supplementary treaty was permitted to remain in Michigan must be regarded as a part of the Pottawatomie Nation. They are entitled to receive per capita their proportion of the annuities and other payments provided for in the several treaties with the nation, to the same extent they would have been if they had gone west with the tribe.

Mr. Crawford, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in 1843, said:

> They are entitled to their numerical proportion of these annuities to the tribe under treaty of 1829, and under supplemental article, treaty of 1833.

I quote from these two public officers to show that this band, though separated from the main nation, had all the rights and privileges under former treaties to which the main nation was entitled.

Now the question comes up, What is the amount due them? They petitioned the Forty-second Congress and asked for payment for claims amounting to $269,038. In December, 1862, upon a resolution by Congress requiring the Secretary of the Interior to furnish a statement of the amount due that band, the Secretary reported that there were $160,540.48 due. On February 19, 1864, Hon. Mr. WINDOM, now a Senator in this body, then chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs on the part of the House, reported that there was due this band $192,850. This, it will be understood, was some time ago, and to this sum reported there should be added annuities which have been due and not paid. Mr. Doolittle, as Senator, reported a less sum, but the report which he made was based upon an error, and that error was made in the census of those who had gone west, making the number about 50 per cent. more than there really were. The Senate committee of the Forty-second Congress made an entirely different report. They reported that there was due this band in annuities $95,705.46, and to capitalize the annuities which were perpetual would require $56,877.50, making in the whole $152,602.96. There was a great discrepancy between the report made by the Senate committee at the last Congress and the reports of committees of Congress that had been made some years before. The report of the committee of the Senate was approved and a bill passed making this appropriation. It went to the House of Representatives and there received a favorable report from the committee. They recommended the passage of the bill appropriating the same amount.

Now, why is there this difference in the amount? I will state as briefly as I can. It arises from the construction given to the treaty of 1833. The fourth article of the treaty says:

> A just proportion of the annuities secured as well by former treaties as the present shall be paid west of the Mississippi to such portion as remove.

On the 27th of September, 1833, Pokagon and his band made a supplemental treaty, in which it was provided that—

> They shall be considered parties to said treaty, and be entitled to participate in all the provisions therein as a part of the united nation.

What were these provisions? A right in proportion with those who went West to all the annuities which were promised under previous treaties, a right to an equal interest in the five million acres of land in Kansas, a right to an equal participation in the $850,000 which had been promised in connection with the land, including the annuity of $14,000 for twenty years. But there was a provision in a second supplementary treaty, which provided that the band should be entitled to annuities under former treaties, and your committee construe that to mean not the treaty of that day or the day before, to which they had now made themselves parties, but all treaties except that, and therefore they excluded this band from participation in the benefits of the treaty of the 26th of September. This causes the difference in the estimates of the amount due between your present committee and the former committees of this body and of the other House.

Now, the question is, is this construction of the treaty right? If so, how do we determine the amount named in the bill? I will state that there has been an enrollment of the nation west of the Mississippi and an enrollment of the band which now claims this amount, and the enrollments have been filed in the Treasury Department, where the annuities have been paid, and part o the annuities have been paid to this band. They received some $1,500 for twenty years, and then they were discontinued. To make up the claim we have gone back to 1795, and ascertained the amount which was due on each treaty, or rather I should say to 1836, for all the annuities were paid up to that time; and from 1836 on we have ascertained how much money was due under each treaty to the entire nation, and then we have apportioned that part which belongs to this band in accordance with their numbers. Then we have deducted from that the entire amount which has been paid this band since 1836. The difference is the amount which is stated in the bill.

Now, the question is which statement is right? The report of the Senate committee of the Forty-second Congress claimed that this was right and reported in favor of its payment, and the Senate passed the bill. The committee of the House adopted the same views and recommended the payment of the same amount. The Secretary of the Interior transmits the opinion of the Commissioner, "which is concurred in by this Department, that the Pottawatomies referred to are justly and equitably entitled to the amount allowed them by said bill." This judgment is expressed in a letter which the Secretory of the Interior addressed to a member of the House of Representatives.

Then, still further, the Indians now discard their former claim and have accepted the report which was made at the last session of Congress, and come before this Congress and ask an appropriation for the same amount, with the addition of an annuity which has accumulated since. It appears to me you can get no better evidence, no more correct estimate of the amount which is due this band of Indians; and believing it is right, believing it is just, I hope the Senate will pass this bill. I do not think that you can afford to do differently; it is what we justly owe to them, and it is better to deal justly with these people than to hold money in the Treasury which belongs to them.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to protect all citizens of the United States in their civil rights and to furnish the means for their vindication," passed April 9, 1866.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I ask that there be a vote on this bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If the civil-rights bill be taken up, I will suffer it to lie aside informally for a few moments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. STOCKTON. I trust my colleague will not call up this bill now. There is ample time for the bill to be considered before we adjourn. The appropriation bills are pressing upon us, and we can occupy our time as well, I think, and more wisely in getting through with the public business. This bill, of course, will lead to discussion, and there are many gentlemen who desire to discuss it, among others gentlemen who are not now here. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] is absent at his home in Delaware, and it is impossible for him to be here. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] is in the same position. The Senator from Delaware asked me to state to the Senate, if this bill was called up in his absence, that he would be back in a day or two, and he asked that it should not be considered until he came back as he wished to speak upon it. I desire myself to speak upon it, but am not prepared to-day. The committee work has been very laborious in the committees that I have been on, and I have not had time to prepare myself. I know there are other gentlemen who wish to speak, and I do not think it will injure the cause which my colleague has at heart if the bill should be postponed until a time which will be more convenient for its consideration, when gentlemen will be able to express their views reasonably and at length on the subject.

Mr. McCREERY. In addition to what the Senator from New Jersey has stated, I can say that my own colleague [Mr. STEVENSON] desires to speak on this bill; and I join with him in the hope that the Senate will not urge its present consideration, but will give time for the return of those gentlemen who are necessarily absent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN.]

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 31.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to state that my reason for calling for the yeas and nays on this motion is, that gentlemen who are necessarily absent from this Senate desire an opportunity to be here to protest against the passage of this bill; and I wish gentlemen here to be placed on record in opposition to what I conceive is demanded by the courtesies which the Senate owes to absent members. I call for the yeas and nays for that purpose.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am very glad that I shall have the privilege and the opportunity of recording my "yea" to take up this bill. A bill that has been talked over and over and over again, year in and year out, I think demands of us no extreme courtesy to gentlemen who voluntarily go away from this Hall.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think that when the business of the Senate is determined in political caucuses, the members of the dominant party who meet in caucus to determine the order of business ought to have some respect for gentlemen who are absent and whose wish they know is to be present to participate in the discussion of this question.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARVEY, (when his name was called.) On all political questions I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON.] Were he present he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Boreman, Boutwell, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Cragin, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Scott, Spencer, Stewart, Wadleigh, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Hager, Johnston, Kelly, McCreery, Norwood, Ransom, Saulsbury, Stockton, Thurman, and Tipton—13.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Brownlow, Cameron, Conover, Dennis, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Harvey, Jones, Lewis, Merrimon, Pease, Sargent, Schurz, Sherman, Sprague, and Stevenson—23.

So the motion of Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The civil-rights bill is before the Senate. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] to strike out the second section of the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FLANAGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I should be very glad if this bill were laid aside for a moment that we may have a vote on the bill which was under consideration at the close of the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield for that purpose?

Mr. FLANAGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. I was so much engaged that I did not get the purpose of this bill which the Senator from Connecticut asks that the vote be taken upon. Is it a bill appropriating money?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. How much?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. One hundred and fifty thousand and odd dollars for a band of Pottawatomie Indians.

Mr. THURMAN. Where are they?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. In Michigan. I made a statement to the Senate; I believe the Senator was not in his seat at the time. I can merely repeat what I said, that the present report is in harmony with the report made at the last session and the bill accompanying which passed this body. It also was adopted by the committee of the House and was recommended by that committee, but did not pass for want of time perhaps. The amount appropriated is approved by the former Commissioner of Indian Affairs, General Walker. It is said to be right by the present Secretary of the Interior. It is a much less amount than has been recommended by several committees of Congress, going back as far as 1862 and 1864, owing to the different construction which the committees of the last Congress placed on a certain treaty. It is also in perfect accordance with the wishes of the Indians themselves, they having abandoned their memorial for a much larger sum and accepted as just and equitable the amount recommended at the last session of Congress.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator hand me the bill?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. This bill I find appropriates $155,447.83 "for the purpose of fulfilling treaty stipulations with the Pottawatomie Indians, known as such, residing in the counties of Cass, Van Buren, and Berrien, in the State of Michigan, and Saint Joseph County, in the State of Indiana; provided that said Indians, being hereby recognized and declared to be citizens of the United States, shall accept such sum in full of all demands whatsoever for all past, present, and perpetual annuities, and all claims whatsoever for lands and trust, school, and educational funds, and all other moneyed provisions in any manner whatsoever arising from or growing out of any and all treaties or agreements to which they are parties. The Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to make the payment herein provided for per capita, after the manner of the payment of Indian annuities, taking their receipts therefor, in accordance with the provisions of this act."

It seems, then, that this money was due to the Pottawatomie Indians while they were a tribe, under treaties made between them and the United States, and I suppose from the proviso that these Indians spoken of as residing in Michigan and Indiana have ceased to belong to any tribe.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I will state that this was a band of the Pottawatomie tribe which had separate interests. They separated from the tribe in 1833, but while they separated from the tribe they retained certain interests under former treaties, and had certain privileges distinct from the original tribe which went to Kansas. This band went to Michigan and remained there, and under the treaty had a right to participate in all the annuities which belonged to the tribe under former treaties.

Mr. THURMAN. Has any treaty been made with these Michigan Pottawatomies since the main body of the tribe went westward?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I am not aware of any.

Mr. THURMAN. How is it provided that if a tribe breaks up into bands each band shall have a right?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. That was the provision in the original treaty.

Mr. THURMAN. Now I come to the question, did this band that remained in Michigan maintain its tribal organization?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. No, sir; it is a separate band from the main nation, and it has received for twenty-odd years a portion of the annuities which were due the original nation, they taking a portion of certain annuities in proportion to their number.

Mr. THURMAN. If these Indians have abandoned their tribal organization and thereby become citizens of the United States by force of the provisions of the fourteenth amendment, as they certainly are if they have abandoned their tribal organization, I do not very well see how the treaty applies to them, and I should doubt exceedingly whether the payment to them would relieve us from any obligation to pay the body of Pottawatomies who have maintained their organization.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. But the treaty expressly determined that this band should go north while the others went west, and that when they went north they should be entitled to their proportion of the annuities.

Mr. THURMAN. Can the Senator tell us how many of them there are?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. About three hundred and twenty-two now.

Mr. THURMAN. In Indiana and Michigan?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. Have the committee any knowledge as to how many of them are half-breeds or people adopted into the tribe?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I do not know that I can answer that question. The enrollment is to be found in the Treasury Department, where a distribution has been made of the annuities up to within a short time.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not like to oppose a bill that has received the careful consideration of a committee; but I cannot help thinking that this is a very doubtful measure.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CIVIL RIGHTS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to protect all citizens of the United States in their civil rights, and to furnish the means for their vindication," passed April 9, 1866.

Mr. FLANAGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Before the Senator from Texas proceeds, there are two or three amendments which I desire to offer to the bill, which I suppose will create no discussion. If they lead to discussion I will waive them, and let the Senator from Texas resume the floor. In the first section of the amendment reported by the committee, line 3, I move to strike out the words "all persons within the jurisdiction," and to insert "every citizen;" so that the clause will read: "That every citizen of the United States shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment," &c.; instead of, "that all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled," &c.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. On page 5, section 2 of the committee's amendment, line 12, I move to strike out the words "less than $500 nor," and in the thirteenth line to strike out the words "less than thirty days nor;" so that the clause will read: "shall be fined not more than $1,000, or shall be imprisoned not more than one year."

Mr. JOHNSTON. Before proceeding with that amendment, I desire to ask the Senator from New Jersey a question in reference to the previous amendment. I understand that he proposes to amend the bill by striking out in the fifth line, on the fourth page, the words "all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States" and inserting "every citizen of the United States." I wish to inquire whether the object of that amendment is to exclude from the benefits of this bill persons who have arrived in the United States to settle and have not been naturalized? What status have they under this bill?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will answer the Senator. My idea is that it is so easy for any person who desires to become a citizen of the United States to become such that we ought to make provision for citizens only, and I do not think that a person merely landing in this country is entitled, as a matter of right, to the benefit of our schools, which are supported by taxation. But, sir, if these amendments lead to any discussion, as I said, I will not interfere with the Senator from Texas, and he may resume the floor. I supposed they would be adopted by common consent.

Mr. THURMAN. I should like to hear the last amendment reported.

Mr. MORTON. Is the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey pending? Does he urge the amendment now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, [Mr. SCOTT in the chair.] The Senator from New Jersey has withdrawn the amendment for the present.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I withdraw it if there is any opposition to it.

Mr. THURMAN. But the amendment striking out the words "all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States," and inserting "every citizen of the United States," was adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment was adopted.

Mr. MORTON. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which it was adopted. I think that is a very important amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey having withdrawn his amendment, the Senator from Texas is entitled to the floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest, if Senators want to discuss that question, that the Senator from New Jersey withdraw all the amendments that he proposes for the time being, including the first.

Mr. THURMAN. I think it would be better by unanimous consent to disregard the vote adopting that amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; let them all stand, and they can be acted upon after the debate is over, and then we shall have the debate on the general bill.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to suggest an amendment. On page 4, section 1, line 9, the clause reads:

> And also of common schools and public institutions of learning or benevolence, supported in whole or in part by general taxation.

I propose to strike out the word "general" and insert "public."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the Senator from Texas go on with his remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield for the purpose of having that amendment offered?

Mr. FLANAGAN. I prefer to go on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield. Is it the understanding that the amendments proposed by the Senator from New Jersey are considered as withdrawn?

["Yes." "Yes."]

[Mr. FLANAGAN addressed the Senate. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, I rise to give my reasons briefly for supporting the measure now before the Senate—the supplementary civil-rights bill, so-called, as it has come to us from the hands of the Committee on the Judiciary. I believe what our fathers who laid the foundations of our political edifice taught, that all men are created equal. I believe in a still older teaching—that God is no respecter of persons, and that he made of one blood all nations of men to dwell on the face of the earth; and further, that he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and unjust. I believe that government is instituted for all, and, like the sun, the rain, and the dew, should shed its blessing upon all alike. I believe that the colored race in this country differ in nothing but their color and lineage from the white race, except in so far as their natures have been dwarfed by slavery. That they have the same bodily and mental and moral faculties, the same wants and appetites, the same capacity for labor and enjoyment, the same sensibility to wrong and insult, no one can deny. Most were born upon this soil, and such as were not were captured and made slaves and brought here against their will.

Well, sir, the people of three-fourths of the States, upon the plain proposition submitted to them to vote ay or no at their free will, have deliberately declared at the polls that all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. The vote of the States which placed this great declaration in the Constitution and made it paramount law was completed in 1868, and public proclamation of the event was made on the 28th day of July, in that year. The language used, all persons, is not only general, but all-comprehensive. Since that day no one can dispute that every black man born in the United States is a citizen, and entitled to a citizen's rights, whatever they are, and bound to perform a citizen's duties to the United States and to the State where he resides, whatever those duties may be. If further authority were wanted upon the point, we have it judicially declared by the Supreme Court that this article added to the Constitution had special reference to the colored race. All, then, born here are citizens and of equal degree; for, sir, you will observe that no distinctions or discriminations in the matter of citizenship are made in this article, but, on the contrary, one rule governs all, and the rights and privileges of citizenship are distributed by an equal hand without favor or partiality to all, without the slightest reference to race or color or previous condition.

When the enumeration was made in 1860, this race, planted here more than two hundred years ago against their will, and reduced to slavery, numbered 4,441,835, of whom nearly four millions were slaves, and the remainder freemen, but not citizens. When ten years later the enumeration was repeated, not a single slave remained, but in their place 4,880,000 freemen and citizens.

But the people did not stop with this single act of conferring citizenship, and leave the race which had just emerged from the condition of slavery, ignorant, poor, helpless, and homeless, at the mercy of their old masters, to surround them by such conditions as practically to deprive them of the enjoyment of their rights as citizens. No, sir, they invested Congress with power to enforce by appropriate legislation—such was the language—the rights which citizenship conferred.

Two years later the people added a new article to the Constitution, intended to supplement whatever was wanting to make this race equal in all civil and political rights with the dominant one, and made them voters. Thus, sir, the people have made one rule for all, and abolished every badge of servitude which appertained to the colored race; and they have done this in the most solemn form known to our system of government. While the Constitution continues to exist, while that declaration remains in it as now, that this Constitution shall be the supreme law of the land, it cannot be questioned that every man of African descent born in the United States is a citizen and entitled to the full measure of a citizen's rights.

I do not go into the argument whether this was wisely done. The time for argument has gone by; it is an accomplished fact. The people, after ample debate, have decided the question, and I find my duty, as a member of this body, sworn to support this Constitution in all its parts, a plain one, to aid by my voice and vote in doing whatever is necessary to enforce and carry into effect this article wherever I find a single right or privilege of citizenship withheld from the colored man.

Had the rights thus conferred been accorded, or were they recognized now, there would be no occasion for this bill. The determined opposition made to its passage at this time is evidence to my mind that the privileges, facilities, and accommodations enumerated in the bill are withheld, and are sought to be withheld in the future, on the plea that to accord them will bring around a condition of equality distasteful to its opponents.

The bill declares that citizens of the United States shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the privileges, &c., of inns, public conveyances, theaters and other places of public amusement, and also of common schools and public institutions of learning or benevolence, supported in whole or in part by general taxation, and of cemeteries so supported, subject only to the conditions and limitations established by law and applicable alike to citizens of every race and color regardless of any previous condition of servitude. Further on the bill provides that no citizen possessing all other qualifications prescribed by law shall be disqualified for service as a grand or petit juror in the courts of the States or United States.

Particular exception is taken to that part which relates to schools and cemeteries, and which the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] proposes to strike out.

And now, sir, what are the arguments with which this measure of justice is confronted? No one reading the Constitution can deny that every colored man is a citizen, and as such, so far as legislation may go, entitled to equal rights and privileges with white people. Can it be doubted that for a denial of any of the privileges or accommodations enumerated in the bill he could maintain a suit at common law against the inn-keeper, the public carrier, or proprietor or lessee of the theater who withheld them? Suppose a colored man presents himself at a public inn, kept for the accommodation of the public, is decently clad and behaves himself well and is ready to pay the customary charges for rest and refreshment, and is either refused admittance or treated as an inferior guest—placed at the second table and consigned to the garret, or compelled to make his couch upon the floor—does any one doubt that upon an appeal to the courts, the law if justly administered would pronounce the inn-keeper responsible to him in damages for the unjust discrimination? I suppose not. Prejudice in the jury-box might deny him substantial damages; but about the law in the matter there can be no two opinions. The same is true of public carriers on land or water. Their engagement with the public is to carry all persons who seek conveyance on their cars or boats to the extent of their facilities for certain established fares, and all persons who behave themselves and are not afflicted with any contagious disease are entitled to equal accommodations where they pay equal fares.

But it is asked, if the law be as you lay it down, where the necessity for this legislation, since the courts are open to all? My answer is, that the remedy is inadequate and too expensive, and involves too much loss of time and patience to pursue it. When a man is traveling, and far from home, it does not pay to sue every inn-keeper who, or railroad company which, insults him by unjust discrimination. Practically the remedy is worthless.

Now, sir, if I am right in stating the law, this bill is justified in providing a more efficient remedy, one that is so stringent in its penalties that it is likely to be obeyed, and render litigation unnecessary. Many a wrong is practiced even upon the white traveler, upon the supposition that his business will not allow him to remain and bring the wrong-doer to account, which is generally true.

And let me say right here, that this measure is not confined to colored citizens; it embraces all, of whatever color.

Then, as there is no argument to be drawn from the Constitution or the existing law against this measure, since the bill indeed is in full harmony with the common law, what are the objections? They all resolve themselves, sir, into one, and that is prejudice, the most formidable of all arguments; for it is impossible to reason against it. You object because he is a negro; and when pressed, your objection is founded upon his color and his past servile condition. He was once a slave, you say, not owning himself, but a piece of chattel property belonging to another, condemned to perform the menial offices of society, enduring the contumelies heaped upon slaves, bearing on his back the marks of the cruel lash; and you cannot forget these things, nor allow him, now that he is a freeman, anything approaching your privileges in society.

The trouble with the argument is that it is not candid in its premises. The negro does not seek nor does this bill give him any of your peculiar social rights and privileges. You may still select your own society and invite whom you will to your table. No negro, against your will, may cross your threshold. You may travel in your own private conveyance, occupy your own room at the hotel and have your meals there, and the vision of the colored man will not disturb your serenity. But if you will travel in a public conveyance, you must be content to share your convenience with the Indian, negro, Turk, Italian, Swede, Norwegian, or any other foreigner who avails himself of the same facility, because it is public, and should therefore be open to all. And so, if you choose to set down at a public table in a public inn open to all comers who behave themselves, you must be content to sit beside or opposite to somebody whose skin or language, manners or religion, may shock your sensibilities. No law will force you to talk to him or even look at him, much less make his acquaintance. You may wrap yourself up in your exclusiveness as much as you please, and neither this bill nor any other will compel you to accept or extend any civilities you do not willingly vouchsafe.

But the chief objection is to allowing what are called mixed schools. In the first place, this bill does not necessarily lead to that, especially in the large cities, where colored people abound. In this city, for example, the schools are kept separate and will continue to be, though this bill become a law. Where the colored people are numerous enough to have separate schools of their own, they would probably prefer their children should be educated by themselves, and there is nothing in this bill which prohibits this. But in the villages and country separate schools will be impracticable, and the colored children, if educated at all in public schools, must necessarily be where the great majority of the children are white. There may be but one or two colored families in the district, and I admit that here the question must be fairly met whether they shall share or be excluded from the benefits of the public schools.

In the first place, if not allowed, they must remain uneducated; a thing to be avoided, since these children will one day be voters, and policy requires they should be intelligent voters. In the next place, there is no more reason or justice why they should be excluded than an equal number of white children, for their father as a citizen has been taxed to build the school-house and to maintain the school. And, lastly, there is precisely the same reason his children should receive a rudimentary education at the common school that there is for white children. Beyond all this, what becomes of the colored man's rights as a citizen if this discrimination shall operate against him in a point where a parent's heart is most sensitive, to exclude his children from drinking at the common fount of knowledge. It is a miserable misnomer, he will be very apt to think, to call that a common school which is practically an exclusive one, since it debars his children from attending, although his labor and funds contributed to build it and he is taxed to maintain it. Sir, to exclude the colored man's children under the circumstances I have put, finds its justification in an unreasoning and unreasonable prejudice only, which we must learn to dismiss as we have others, if we would faithfully obey the Constitution.

The time was when the proposition to admit colored men into the Army to fight the enemy shocked the notions of many. But when the terrible harvester was mowing down our sons by the thousand, and still the rebellion was not put down, we came to think that to kill a rebel in battle was a good thing, whether the hands that pointed the musket were white or black. Then there was a prejudice at first against putting them upon the footing of other soldiers in pay, bounty, and pensions. We got over that prejudice too. Then there was a prejudice against allowing a colored man the right to go into a court of justice and testify in his own behalf or another's. We surmounted that when we found he could tell the truth like other people. Then followed his admission to juries and the ballot-box, but after what struggles of prejudice! We have lived to see all these prejudices give way one after another, until nobody now would return the negroes to slavery or take away from them those right and privileges, at first so grudgingly accorded by the same party that resists the pending measure.

Sir, this legislation is demanded as a matter of sheer justice by five millions of men, women, and children, whom our own laws have made the inferiors they are. We owe it to them and to ourselves to elevate them, because they must henceforth share with us the political power which resides in the people. You object because they have been a servile race and are as yet unfit to perform the duties of citizenship. But who made them slaves and kept them in ignorance? Why should we not hasten to make reparation for the wrongs done them in the past? Who can doubt our warrant for granting them the privileges enumerated in this bill, since the adoption of the constitutional amendments? I find in them not only authority, but a command laid on me to do whatever is necessary in the way of legislation to bring around a practical equality in all civil and political rights, so that there shall be no difference in respect to civil or political rights between the two races.

We must admit at the very outset of the argument as a fact not to be gainsaid or questioned that the people of this country, in whom resides all political power, have by their supreme decree and in the exercise of the highest form of legislation raised the colored race to the plane of perfect equality in making them citizens and voters. They have said that the negro shall be a citizen of the Republic, and in saying that they have declared that, let the word mean what it will, let it include more or less of rights and privileges, the same measure of rights shall be the negro's that belongs to the white man. If he does not possess these in equal degree with you, sir, the people have failed to accomplish what they intended in the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments. Gentlemen may refine and split hairs as they please in construing these amendments, criticise the language of the courts and dissenting judges, and attempt to prove what they will, there stand the plain, unambiguous words of the Constitution, written by the people's own hand, and intended to be understood and obeyed. One would think from the discussions here that this instrument was full of mysteries and capable of being understood different ways. But it is so only to the willfully blind. When the people ordained and wrote it down in the Constitution that all men born in the United States were citizens of the United States and of the State where they dwelt, they supposed they had made one rule for all. No one doubts, I suppose, that the black man is a citizen. What more than a citizen is the white man, I care not what his degree? Whatever rights or privileges citizenship confers on a white man belong to the man of color, and no process of reasoning could make the proposition plainer.

Now, sir, a few words more and I am done. We must accept as facts that the colored race constitutes an integral part of our population—nearly one-eighth part in fact; that they were born on this soil and have no other country than this; and that the two races must remain here intermingled, the black race sharing with ours the political power which resides in citizens. Neither should we forget in the argument that they are unequally distributed in the States, and that in two they outnumber the whites, while in some others they approximate equality in numbers. Nor must we lose sight of the main fact that every man among them twenty-one years old and upward is a voter in all our national, State, and municipal elections, and wherever they are in the majority that the political power is in their hands, to be wisely used or abused accordingly as they are made educated, moral citizens and treated with justice and kindness, or are held and treated as inferiors by discriminating legislation or by refusing such needed legislation as this.

Now, sir, I ask again, what argument do we find arrayed against this claim to equality under the law, founded, as I have endeavored to show, upon the fundamental law of the land? I regret to say that the argument begins and ends in prejudice—a prejudice as unreasonable as it is unjust; a prejudice that reaches beyond life even, and would perpetuate distinctions in the grave. Alas, sir, I know how hard it is to argue against prejudices. Time, reason, and reflection only can correct them. I remember well how a little more than twenty years ago the people of my own State forbade in their organic law that any negro or mulatto should enter the State; and now our school system makes no distinction in the races. But hopeless as is the task of reasoning them away, let me remind the Senate that nature has not discriminated against the negro in any of her regulations. On the contrary, he has all the bodily faculties in the fullest perfection, the same capacity to subdue nature and supply his wants, the same appetites. More than that, he has the same spiritual nature; the same thirst for knowledge; the same hopes and fears; the same loves and hates; the same sensibilities to wrong and insult, and the same desire to improve his condition. If you could forget the color of his skin, the difference between him and you would disappear. And then, again, does he not dwell in this goodly heritage by the same title that you and I do? Is he not warmed by the same sun, does he not breathe the same air, and draw his subsistence from the same bountiful earth, which knows no distinction in the hands that till her and bring forth her fruits? More than that, does he not speak the same language, worship the same God, owe the same allegiance, and obey the same laws?

Why should this prejudice linger here when in the most civilized countries in Europe it is unknown? If the color of his skin does not disqualify the colored man from the enjoyment of equal privileges in France and England, why should it here?

I notice a single objection more. It is said such a law as this bill enacts will be so odious that it cannot be executed. The objection assumes what I deny is true, that it will be generally odious. The colored people all demand it as their due, and of course it will not be odious to them. It will be odious only in particular sections of the country, for in many parts their rights and privileges as set out in this bill are now recognized. In one State the practice of mixed schools has always been the rule, and in several of the Southern States the rule has been established by State laws. Pass this bill and all opposition will cease in a few months, when it is known that the question is settled; for people will come to see that the law is supported by reason and justice, and that free government demands the abolition of all distinctions founded on color and race.

It has seemed to me a most surprising thing that people who declaim against what they call negro equality are never heard to start any objection to admission to fullest rights of citizenship of the foreigner, though he be ignorant to the last degree, a pauper or a criminal, unacquainted with our laws and not capable even of speaking our language. More than the third of a million of immigrants from every country of Europe annually land upon our shores and are heartily welcomed to the privileges of citizenship, with whom it is not unfair to say the negro population of this country will bear favorable comparison in all the elements that go to make useful citizens.

Common gratitude, if nothing else, should prompt us to pass this bill. Sir, when I remember the wrongs that have been inflicted upon the colored race through so many generations of slavery; when I recall how patient and long-suffering they have been through all the long years of cruel bondage; how they have contributed to the wealth and prosperity of the country, and at last how nobly they came to its rescue when, like a noble ship, it seemed about dashing upon rocks and perishing, and how they offered their lives to save a Government they had known only by its oppressions, my heart warms with unspeakable gratitude. When the opportunity for wreaking vengeance upon his task-master came, was the negro swift to avenge by fire and sword and rapine his accumulated wrongs? No, sir; to his lasting honor let it be remembered of him and stir our warmest sentiments of gratitude in the memory, that he watched like a faithful sentinel over the women and children, and tenderly cared for them, while his rebel master was seeking upon fields of battle to fix him and his posterity in a still more hopeless condition of slavery. Even then he put aside the supreme temptation, and listened only to the voice of religion, "Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord."

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, the remarks I shall make on this bill will be brief, unless prolonged by interruptions, and this for several reasons. One is that at a previous session of the Senate I spoke at length on this subject, and gave the reasons why I believed this measure to be both unconstitutional and impolitic. I could add very little, if anything, to what I then said; and as I do not care about repeating ideas that I have once troubled the Senate to hear, I shall content myself with a mere condensation of some of the views which I then presented; with however a reference to a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and one of the supreme court of Ohio, both rendered since that discussion took place.

I have another reason for not desiring to speak at length on this bill; and that is that I know that it is to pass this body; not because of its merits, for I do not believe, notwithstanding the fervid declamation that we have just heard, that there is one-third of the Senate who, untrammeled by any outside pressure or any extrinsic consideration, would be found to vote for it. I think I am very liberal in supposing that even a third of the Senate would, if untrammeled, give it their support. But there are about eight hundred thousand colored voters in the United States, and they are essential to the maintenance of the power of the republican party, and their demands, or what are supposed to be their demands, have more power in this Chamber than the Constitution of the country or the welfare of the colored race itself. That is the trouble, sir; that is what produces all the trouble we have about this matter. If this question were to be decided solely by the provisions in the Constitution, notwithstanding the bold and unqualified language of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PRATT,] notwithstanding his bold and positive assertions, I, humble as I am, would venture to achieve in this Senate such a victory over his constitutional interpretation as would settle that question at least in this body. Furthermore, if the fate of this measure were to be determined by its intrinsic merits, by its policy or impolicy, it would require but very little ability to show that it ought never to pass. And yet further, if its fate were to be determined by the interests of the colored race, there is nothing more capable of demonstration than that the very best interests of that race require that it should be defeated. And again, if its adoption or rejection depended upon principles of eternal justice recognized in all civilized communities, its rejection would be certain.

I do not know but that it is considered almost ridiculous here to speak of the principles that once were universally admitted in regard to this Government and in regard to our Constitution. There was a time when no human being in the United States, of whatever political party, denied the proposition that the Government of the United States is a government of delegated powers, and that it possesses no powers but such as are expressly conferred upon it by the Constitution or such as result by necessary implication from those which are thus expressly conferred. I say there was a time when no man in all the length and breadth of this land disputed that proposition; and perhaps there are very few now who openly deny it; and yet in practice it is utterly disregarded, and instead of that a wholly different mode of interpreting the Constitution and powers of this Government has acquired complete dominion in its legislative department. The old doctrine, which had the sanction not only of the fathers of the Constitution but of nearly three generations after them, has come to be totally supplanted in practice by the dogma that Congress may do whatever it is not expressly forbidden to do in the Constitution; so that, instead of the old doctrine that where you cannot find a delegated power, the power does not exist, the theory upon which Congress now acts is that it may exercise every power of Government whether it can be found in the Constitution or not, unless it is expressly prohibited. Upon no other foundation whatsoever can much of the legislation of the last eight or nine years be maintained for a moment. And I regret to say, Mr. President, that not only here, but in a judicial tribunal that I need not name, this doctrine has the apparent sanction of one of its most distinguished judges. A doctrine from which Marshall himself, strong as he was in his devotion to Federal power, would have shrunk in horror, is now avowed in effect, not in the seat that he occupied, but so close to it that it cannot but excite remark.

Now, sir, what is the Constitution of the United States? It consists of certain delegations of power to the Federal Government apportioned among the departments of that Government, and of certain prohibitions. It is thus affirmative in its provisions and negative in its provisions. It grants power to the Government and to the several departments thereof, and then it contains prohibitions for the greater security of the States and the people; prohibitions against the exercise of power by the Federal Government. Those prohibitions are to be found especially in the ninth section of the first article and in the first eight amendments. Then it contains another set of prohibitions upon the powers of the States, and those prohibitions are in every instance prohibitions upon the States as States; not prohibitions upon individuals, but prohibitions upon the States in their sovereign capacity as States. What are they? It would take too much time to refer to many of them. Let me refer to a few in the original Constitution, section 10 of article 1:

> No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation; grant letters of marque and reprisal; coin money; emit bills of credit; make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts; pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts, or grant any title of nobility.
> No State shall, without the consent of the Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws: and the net produce of all duties and imposts, laid by any State on imports or exports, shall be for the use of the Treasury of the United States; and all such laws shall be subject to the revision and control of the Congress.
> No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty of tonnage, keep troops, or ships of war in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another State, or with a foreign power, or engage in war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay.

There, sir, you see the original prohibitions, prohibitions upon the States, limitations of the power of the States.

Soon after the Constitution was ratified the people saw fit to adopt ten amendments to it about the same time. Every one of those amendments is a limitation, not upon the powers of the States, but upon the powers of the Federal Government. The people were so jealous then of encroachments by the Federal Government, so fearful that it would usurp authority detrimental to the best interests, if not to the existence of the States, and also detrimental to the liberties and the prosperity of the people, that they required it to be put in solemn form in these amendments that the Federal Government should be restricted as therein declared and that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

In the course of time the people proceeded to further amend the Constitution by articles 13, 14, and 15, and now I ask the particular attention of the Senate to what the prohibitions in these articles are in order to show that they are precisely of the same nature as the prohibitions in the original Constitution and in the first eight amendments thereof; prohibitions some of them upon the Federal Government as a Government, and the others prohibitions upon the States as sovereign States, and nothing else, nowhere prohibitions upon individuals as individuals, nowhere treating individuals as mere members of the community, but everywhere, in every line and sentence of the amendments, treating the States as corporations, as sovereign States, and acting upon them as States, and treating the Federal Government in its sphere as a sovereign Government, and acting upon it in its sovereign capacity. What is the thirteenth article of amendment?

Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

There is a prohibition upon both the Federal and the State governments. It is not directed against an individual, for how could any individual constitute slavery? Slavery can only exist by operation of law, and law could only be enacted by either the Federal or the State governments. The prohibition then is upon these governments as governments, and in no other sense whatsoever.

Now, let us come to article 14, section 1:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

That is mere definition. Then comes the prohibition:

No State—

Not "no individual," but "no State"— shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States.

An individual cannot make law; it is the State alone that can make law, and it is the State alone that can enforce law; and therefore the prohibition is directly upon that sovereign being, the State, that it shall neither make or enforce any law that "shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States;" and proceeding, it says:

Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Mr. President, is not that plainly a prohibition directed to the States in their capacity as States? Is that provision a mere statute of murder, &c.? Is that merely a provision that no man in the United States shall commit murder, that no man in the United States shall kidnap, that no man in the United States shall unlawfully arrest and detain? Is that it? In other words, is this great provision of the Constitution degraded to the mere office of an ordinary criminal code? No, sir; but it is a limitation on the power of the States and its prohibition is addressed to the States.

What next? I need not speak of sections 2, 3, and 4 of that article, because they are not necessary to illustrate what I am endeavoring to prove. I therefore proceed to article 15; and what is that?

The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question before he passes from the fourteenth amendment?

Mr. THURMAN. If it is not a speech. I wish to be very brief this evening. If the Senator has only a question to ask I will yield.

Mr. MORTON. Only a question. The Senator states that the prohibitions in the first section of the fourteenth amendment are addressed to the States as corporations and not to individuals. Calling his attention to the fact that the last section provides that Congress may enforce the amendment by appropriate legislation, I ask him how Congress may enforce the prohibitions against a State?

Mr. THURMAN. Just precisely as it enforces the prohibition against a State that it shall not pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts, contained in the original Constitution. It enforces it by providing for the making of a case for the judicial tribunals of the United States, in which that law impairing the obligation of contracts may be declared to be null and void. So, too, any law which any State may pass or enforce in violation of the thirteenth, fourteenth, or fifteenth amendments may be declared void in precisely the same way; and the only proper and constitutional mode in my judgment for Congress to adopt is to provide for bringing any such cases that it sees proper to provide for for decision before the judicial tribunals of the Federal Government. That was the mode under the Constitution before these amendments were adopted; and it is the proper mode yet.

The Constitution is not so imperfect an instrument as some seem to suppose. It provides not simply for an executive and legislative department, but also for a judicial department, and provides that the judicial power shall extend to all cases arising under this Constitution or the laws and treaties made in pursuance thereof. That gives the judicial power ample cognizance of every case that can possibly arise that brings into discussion the validity of any State law which is said to be in contravention of the Constitution of the United States, or the laws of Congress passed in pursuance thereof.

And now, in regard to this clause that "Congress shall have power by appropriate legislation to enforce this article," Congress would have exactly the same power if that clause were not in the Constitution at all. That does not add one iota to the power of Congress.

The section is:

The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

That does not add, as I say, one iota to the power of Congress; and if it were stricken out of each of the thirteenth and fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, the power of Congress would be precisely what it now is. For what is "appropriate legislation?" It is the very same thing that is provided for by the eighth section of article 1, as construed by the Supreme Court in McCulloch vs. Maryland, the well-known and familiar provision as to the power of Congress to make necessary laws, and which reads:

The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

That provision covers the amendments adopted afterward, just as much as it covers the powers conferred by the original Constitution.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the Senator allow me a single question? I ask whether he understands the general power which was treated of in the case of McCulloch vs. Maryland to give to Congress authority to enforce the first clause of the second section of article 4, namely:

The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senator will hear me through he will find out precisely what I mean. I say if you strike out all these clauses about appropriate legislation, you have remaining the power conferred in the eighth section of the first article upon Congress to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The distinction which has been made I think is this: that the clause which I have just read does not confer upon the Government of the United States a power, but is a declaration of a right of citizens of the several States in other States; and the question I put is whether, under the general power which is contained in the clause the Senator has just read, Congress has authority to give to the citizens of each State all privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States; whether Congress could legislate to carry that clause into effect as though it were a power conferred by the Constitution of the United States upon the Government of the United States?

Mr. THURMAN. I understand the Senator's question, and it is a very pertinent one. It may be asked in respect to various clauses of the Constitution, as well as in respect to provisions in the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments. When you turn to section 10 of article 1, what do you find?

No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation.

The Senator might say that that is not a grant of power to the Government of the United States, or to any department of the Government of the United States.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not say that. I only say that is one theory of the subject.

Mr. THURMAN. I know; and it is a very poor theory; for as this prohibition rests upon the States by virtue of a provision contained in the Constitution of the United States, it necessarily follows that the Federal Government has power to give effect to the prohibition. Of course it is so; and the only question is how is it to give effect to it. Is it to give effect to it by such original legislation, operating directly in the first instance upon individuals, as that proposed in this bill; or is it to give effect to it by making a case for the judicial tribunals of the Federal Government, for they cannot decide unless a case is made?

The judicial power extends to "all cases"—you must have a case made before you can have a decision that a State law or a State decision is unconstitutional. The function of Congress is to provide by law for the making of the case, and then the judicial power intervenes and decides upon the validity or invalidity of the State law.

The provision at the close of section 8 of article 1, "that Congress shall have power to make all laws," &c., applies to all provisions of the Constitution that may be in it in all time to come. It is a standing, speaking power that continues for all time as long as the Constitution shall endure, and reaches every particle of it, however it may be added to by amendment. We all know perfectly well that that provision "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers," and so on, is wholly and absolutely unnecessary. It was so declared—and no man ever contradicted it—in the Federalist, and proved to be wholly unnecessary, and it was put in only out of abundant caution. In no debate whatever, either in the Federal Convention or in the conventions of the States, have I ever seen, nor do I believe it has ever been found, the position that that was a substantive, independent power of Congress. It was nothing but putting in words, in the form of an express grant, that power which would have resulted by necessary implication even if those words were stricken out of the Constitution; and so it is expressly stated in the Federalist. There is no question about that.

Now, whence come these words "appropriate legislation?" They come from the language of Marshall in deciding the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland. It had been argued that Congress could not pass laws under this provision "which may be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers," &c., unless the measure adopted by Congress was one that was "absolutely necessary," and by "absolutely necessary" was meant one which if it were not enacted would leave an express power without execution; that it was one which must be enacted in order that the express power could be executed at all, and therefore it must be one upon which the very existence of the express power in practice must depend. Otherwise it was not necessary legislation. We know with what power Marshall reasoned that down; and going perhaps to the other extreme, he said that it was sufficient that the legislation was a natural and proper mode of effecting the end to be accomplished; that if the end was within the competency of Congress under the Constitution, then Congress had the power to adopt any means which are "appropriate" and proper. "Appropriate" was the very word he used, and it is from that decision, using that word, that Congress had the power to adopt any legislation which was in its judgment appropriate, that the last section in each of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments was derived. It was taken right from that decision, showing conclusively that nothing more was meant by this clause, "Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article," than was meant by the last clause in the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, which says that Congress may make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, &c. They mean precisely the same thing; and therefore if this provision upon which so much has been based and which the Senator from Indiana over the way [Mr. PRATT] seems to think overrides everything in the Constitution and allows us to legislate whatever we please, whatever we may deem to be appropriate on the subjects provided for in these amendments to the Constitution, were stricken out of these articles, their provisions would not be weakened one single particle; not by the weight of a hair would they be weakened; they would be precisely the same. Nay, if the last clause were stricken out of section 8 of article 1, the Constitution would be precisely what it is.

I have said that these are prohibitions upon the powers of the States. But what does this bill undertake to do? Does this bill undertake to treat with laws made or enforced by States that deprive any citizen of the United States of any privilege or immunities of a citizen of the United States, or that deny him the equal protection of the laws? Does it do any such thing as that? Let us see. Mark it, this bill must rest, if it have any constitutional warrant at all, upon these words: "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." And again: "Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

"No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." Does this bill deal with any such law of a State? No, sir; it does not profess to do so. It is not aimed at any law of a State. It is aimed against the acts of individuals; it is aimed against keepers of theaters, keepers of circuses, keepers of hotels, managers of railroads, stage-coaches, and the like. There is not one single sentence in the whole bill which is leveled against any law made or enforced by a State. The Constitution says that no State shall make or enforce any such law. This bill says to a State, "Although you do not make any such law, although you do not enforce any such law, although your law is directly the opposite, although you punish every man who does any one of the acts mentioned in this bill, and punish him never so severely, yet the Congress of the United States will step in and under that clause of the Constitution which says that you, the State, shall not make or enforce any such law, we, the Federal power, will seize the man whom you have punished for this very act, and will punish him again; we will treat the keeper of a theater as the State; we will treat the hotel keeper as the State; we will treat the railroad conductor as the State; we will treat the stage-driver as the State; and although you may have punished each and every one of these men for the very acts enumerated in this bill, we, under the pretense that the States do make or enforce a law which deprives a citizen of his equal privileges and immunities, will seize that citizen again and subject him to a double punishment for the offense for which he has already suffered." That is what this bill is; and no sophistry can make it anything else.

Take the case of Louisiana. If I am rightly informed—and if I am not the Senator from Louisiana can correct me—there is not one single act or omission in this bill which is not already punishable in Louisiana under her State statute. And now, sir, you are to go with the Federal power into the State of Louisiana and under pretense that that State has made and enforced laws which violate the fourteenth amendment, when every law that she has made and every law that she does enforce is in strict consonance and accordance with that amendment, you are to go there and seize her citizens who have already been punished by the State authority and punish them a second time by the Federal arm!

Why, sir, if it is constitutional reasoning that supports this bill, then I confess that all my studies of the Constitution have been wholly in vain. If this is justice, then I confess that forty years and more of study of the law have all been thrown away upon me. If this is not monstrous, if this is not inhuman, if it is not a violation of the first principles of right, if it is not a violation of the spirit of that provision in the Constitution that no man shall be put in jeopardy twice for the same offense, if it is not legislation utterly disgraceful to a civilized people, then I confess, Mr. President, that I am not able to see correctly what is the scope or purpose of this legislation, or what are the principles of right and justice that should prevail under a civilized government.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator pardon me for asking him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. RANSOM in the chair.) Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARPENTER. The concluding clause in the legislative article is that Congress shall have power—

> To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

Turn now to the other provision of the Constitution which says that no State shall make any law "impairing the obligation of contracts." Does this clause in the legislative article cover that case, or authorize Congress to pass any law in regard to it? The provision is that Congress shall have power to make laws "necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers"—that is, the power just preceding in this legislative article conferred by the Constitution upon Congress—

> And all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

Now, does the provision in the other section, that "no State shall coin money," vest any power in the United States or in any department or officer thereof? Clearly not. It is an inhibition laid upon the State; but no power with reference to it is conferred upon the General Government. My honorable friend is entirely sound undoubtedly in saying that this clause adds nothing to the legislative article; that all which is covered by it would be raised by necessary implication. But do not these words go in the other direction and do they not restrict? When this clause was put in, that Congress shall have power to make all laws necessary and proper for a certain purpose, that is to execute the powers conferred by the Constitution upon Congress and the powers vested by the Constitution in the United States Government, or in any department or officer thereof, does not that fairly exclude any power to legislate in regard to a State's impairing the obligation of contracts or coining money?

Come now to the fifteenth amendment:

> The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

There is nothing in the world but a clear and clean prohibition upon the States. But then it adds:

> The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

If this means simply that Congress shall have power to declare by law that no State shall deny this right, that is nonsense, because the Constitution declares it already, and no legislation is required for that. Therefore the Senator, in order to maintain his argument, must convict those who framed and those who adopted this constitutional amendment of nonsense when he says that this provision gives no power to legislate affirmatively upon the subject, because a mere prohibition repeated in a statute would be wholly worthless, it being already in the Constitution. Therefore, being bound to presume that this provision in the Constitution was intended to grant some power, and some substantial beneficial power, must we not say that it meant to empower Congress to see to it that the State did not in any way do the thing which the Constitution says no State shall do? In other words, may not Congress under this provision enter into that field and see to it that every citizen has a right to vote in every State and that he is not deprived of that right either by a law, or by a fraud at the polls systematically carried on over the State, or by any other means, by which the citizen might lose his right. In other words, was this clause put in here merely to tie down a State by act of Congress or statute which was already tied down by the Constitution itself; or was it put there to carry out the substantial end, to act affirmatively, and to see not only that the State did not do it negatively, but that we might see that the fact itself, the right to vote, should be enjoyed?

Mr. THURMAN. I do not object to this question, although it has taken immense proportions, and the Senator has set up a man of straw to knock it down by putting in my mouth an argument that I never made. I certainly did not say or mean to say that the power of Congress is merely to re-enact the terms of the Constitution. I do not think the Constitution ever contemplated any such thing as that. If the Senator will listen to me a little while, I think I shall make my idea clear to him, which I evidently did not do before; and if I did not make it clear to him, I should doubt having made it clear to anybody else.

My proposition is that this provision, that "the Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation," means nothing more in respect to the amendments to which it is attached, the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth, than does the last clause in the eighth section of the first article in reference to the provisions to which that referred. If the Senator will follow me through, he will see how that works.

He asks, Can the clause "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers" apply to the prohibitions on the States which follow that in the first article of the Constitution? I say no, so far; but the clause does not stop there. It says further:

> And all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

Congress has the power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." Now, let us turn for a moment to the judicial article:

> The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and the treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority.

Then to various other things. I need not read more. "The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and the treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority."

The adjudication then of all cases, either in law or in equity, that arise under this Constitution is a power vested in one of the departments of this Government, the judicial department, and the Congress has power under the last clause of section 8 of article 1 to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution that power which is thus vested in the judicial department. Then the only thing that remains to make the demonstration complete is to prove that a case in which a State violates one of the prohibitions of the Constitution of the United States is a case that comes within the judicial power of the United States. I need not say to my friend that that is the very case which has of all others been the oftenest decided. It began with the Dartmouth College case, which was decided upon the ground that an act of New Hampshire impaired the obligation of a contract, and therefore that it was prohibited by the Constitution of the United States; that is, New Hampshire was prohibited by the Constitution of the United States from impairing the obligation of a contract. That being so, when the question was, has she impaired the obligation of a contract, it was said, and correctly said, that is a question "arising under the Constitution" of the United States, and therefore the judicial power of the United States extends to it, and extending to it the court held the act to be void.

The Senator will therefore see that in these cases of mere prohibitions upon the States they do make cases that arise under the Constitution of the United States, and of which the judicial power of the United States may be clothed with cognizance, and authorized to decide; and therefore that Congress has the power to make cases, that is to provide far the bringing of a case into the judicial courts so that it may be decided. But that does not touch the question whether or not under a provision like this in the fourteenth article of amendments "that no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States," where you know that no such law has been made, where no such law is enforced, but where laws directly the opposite, laws to secure every citizen in his privileges and immunities and laws to extend to him equal protection with all other men, exist, and where laws are made punishing the violation of these privileges and immunities, you can step in and, treating that State as if it had violated the Constitution of the United States, seize upon the individual and punish him a second time.

Mr. President, I do not wish to speak further about that. I have no hope whatever that any reasoning that I can urge will be of the least avail; and why not? First, for the reason I have already stated, and next for the reason that the Supreme Court of the United States has rendered a solemn decision that is as plainly in the face of this bill as I am in the presence of this Senate; and if Senators will pay no regard to that decision I cannot hope that they will be influenced by any arguments of mine. I allude to the decision in what are known as the Slaughter-house cases. There is no refinement or hair-splitting that can get rid of the opposition of that decision to this bill. I must content myself with referring to only a few passages from the opinion of the majority, remarking, however, that the opinion of the dissenting judges, as explained afterward in the Bartmeyer case shows, as it seems to me, that they did not intend to support any such bill as this by the weight of their authority; but, be that as it may, what demands our attention is the opinion of the majority of the court.

Mr. PEASE. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. THURMAN. If it is only a question.

Mr. PEASE. If I understand the position taken by the honorable Senator, it is that under the Constitution Congress is only authorized to provide such legislation as shall enable the citizen to bring any abridgement of his rights into the courts or under the judicial action of the United States. I desire to ask the Senator if the bill under consideration does not provide for just such a state of things, does it not provide that a man who is abridged in any of his rights as a citizen can get redress in the Federal courts of the United States?

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator certainly could not have heard what I said before or he would not have asked me that question. The bill undoubtedly provides for making cases enough, God knows. It provides for making a great many too many cases for Federal jurisdiction; but it does not provide for making that case which the Constitution is aimed at, the case where a State makes or enforces a law that deprives a citizen of the United States of his privileges or immunities. It does not touch any such case at all. It is not aimed at any such case; but, as I have said before and repeated once, and I do not like to repeat it again, it applies to a State in which the laws punish the very acts that are provided for in this bill just as much as it does to any State that should make or enforce a law contrary to either one of these amendments to the Constitution.

To return to the decision of which I was speaking. The judge delivering the opinion of the majority of the court in the Slaughter-house cases goes on to show, and in this exposes the error of the argument of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PRATT,] delivered to-day, that the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States are distinct from the privileges and immunities of citizens of the States; that the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States must of necessity be derived from the Constitution of the United States, but the privileges and immunities of citizens of a State are derived under her constitution, and therefore they are different things. It may be that a citizen may have the same immunities as a citizen of the United States that he has in Ohio as a citizen of Ohio, because the provisions constituting a bill of rights in the Federal and State constitutions are in many particulars the same; and so the same remark might be made of many other States, perhaps the most of them, but still the distinction remains between privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States as citizens of the United States, and privileges and immunities that belong to a citizen of a State in virtue of his character of State citizenship. This is made extremely clear in the opinion of the judge who delivered the opinion in that case. I desire to call the particular attention of the Senate to some of his reasoning upon the fourteenth amendment. The first sentence of that amendment is:

> All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

That secures two citizenships to a person born or naturalized in the United States. It secures to him, in the first place, a citizenship of the United States. For instance, if he were born in the District of Columbia it secures him citizenship of the United States. The old argument, which never seemed to me to be sound, was that a man could not be a citizen of the United States unless he were a citizen of a State—that was the extreme view taken by the State-rights men—and consequently that a man born in a Territory could not become a citizen of the United States until he became a citizen of some State, and in the same way that all persons born and residing in the District of Columbia were not citizens of the United States. That was the old argument. It necessarily resulted in that. This provision puts an end to that, and says that wherever you are born, whether in the District of Columbia, in a Territory, or in a fortress, you are a citizen of the United States; or wherever you are naturalized, whether in the District of Columbia or in a Territory, you are a citizen of the United States. Then it goes further, and provides that the same person shall be a citizen of the State wherein he resides, and thus secures to him State citizenship.

But the next sentence contains the prohibition upon which this bill is founded, and mark what it is:

> No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States.

Limiting it to United States citizenship alone. It is not provided that "no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States or of the State." There are no such words there as "or of the State." It is only a limitation on the power of the State to make a law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, and leaves the State to deal with its citizens as it has the power to do in regard to their privileges and immunities as citizens of the State. This distinction is very clearly pointed out by the judge who delivered the opinion of the majority in that case, and he then goes on and says:

> It is quite clear, then, that there is a citizenship of the United States, and a citizenship of a State, which are distinct from each other, and which depend upon different characteristics or circumstances in the individual.
> We think this distinction and its explicit recognition in this amendment of great weight in this argument, because the next paragraph of this same section, which is the one mainly relied on by the plaintiffs in error, speaks only of privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States—
>
> That is the clause which is now under consideration—> and does not speak of those of citizens of the several States. The argument, however, in favor of the plaintiffs rests wholly on the assumption that the citizenship is the same, and the privileges and immunities guaranteed by the clause are the same.

That is, the argument of the plaintiffs in error in the Slaughter-house cases went upon the theory that the privileges and immunities of citizens of the State and of citizens of the United States were identical, were the same. The court show that this is not the case, and then they go on to say:

> The language is, "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." It is a little remarkable, if this clause was intended as a protection to the citizen of a State against the legislative power of his own State, that the word "citizen of the State" should be left out when it is so carefully used, and used in contradistinction to citizens of the United States, in the very sentence which precedes it. It is too clear for argument that the change in phraseology was adopted understandingly and with a purpose.

Of the privileges and immunities of the citizen of the United States, and of the privileges and immunities of the citizen of the State, and what they respectively are, we will presently consider.

Now I ask the attention of the Senate to this:

But we wish to state here that it is only the former—

That is, the immunities and privileges of citizens of the United States as such—which are placed by this clause under the protection of the Federal Constitution, and that the latter, whatever they may be, are not intended to have any additional protection by this paragraph of the amendment.

If, then, there is a difference between the privileges and immunities belonging to a citizen of the United States as such, and those belonging to the citizen of the State as such, the latter—

That is the privileges and immunities belonging to him as the citizen of a State—must rest for their security and protection where they have heretofore rested; for they are not embraced by this paragraph of the amendment.

The court next proceeds to show what is meant by the privileges and immunities of the citizen of a State; and to that I beg leave to call the careful attention of the Senate. To do this Mr. Justice Miller refers to the decisions upon this article in the original Constitution:

The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

That is section 2 of the fourth article of the original Constitution. Now mark it, that deals with State citizenship alone; it has nothing to do with citizenship of the United States. It deals with State citizenship alone, and the very words are "privileges and immunities," just as they are in the fourteenth amendment, and the question arose first in Corfield vs. Coryell, reported in Washington's Circuit Court Reports, and afterward in Ward vs. The State of Maryland, (12 Wallace,) and in Paul vs. Virginia, (8 Wallace.) What are the privileges and immunities of citizens of the States which under this article of the original Constitution are to be respected by the other States?

Mr. HOWE. Privileges of citizens of the United States.

Mr. THURMAN. No; privileges of citizens of the State. The question arose, what were the privileges of citizens of the State—not of the United States, but of the State. Let me read the section again:

The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

That is to say, they shall be entitled to the privileges and immunities of State citizenship. That is the provision of the original Constitution. Now the question comes, what are those privileges and immunities that appertain to men as citizens of the State? If they appertain to them as citizens of the State, they are not those peculiar privileges that appertain to them as citizens of the United States, but they are privileges and immunities that belong to them in virtue of their State citizenship. The first definition was by Justice Washington in the case of Corfield vs. Coryell, decided in 3 Washington's Circuit Court Reports, 371.

Mr. MORTON. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the privileges and immunities of citizens of the State, spoken of in the article of the Constitution he has just read, are treated as being identical with the privileges of citizens of the United States under the fourteenth article, and the judge reads from the case of Coryell to show that those rights were identical in their character.

Mr. THURMAN. There is nothing in the world to show that under the fourteenth amendment they are treated as identical at all, but on the contrary this very case decides that they are not identical. This very decision which I have read decides that they are not identical.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator does not understand me. The court draws a distinction between the privileges of citizens of the United States and of citizens of a State, but the privileges meant by the original article referred to are those which are now treated as the privileges of a citizen of the United States.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, in this Hall, but in no court.

Mr. MORTON. In that decision.

Mr. THURMAN. No, sir; not a bit of it.

Mr. MORTON. I will show it.

Mr. THURMAN. On the contrary, the Senator cannot find one word in the opinion of the majority of the court that sustains any such proposition, but directly the reverse.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. As I understand the Slaughter-house cases, the majority of the court hold that it is one of the privileges of a citizen of the United States to have the benefit of the provision of the fourteenth amendment which declares that no State shall "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws," and I will call the attention of the Senator to the eightieth page of the decision. The majority of the court, commencing on the seventy-ninth page, run over a list of what they consider the privileges of United States citizenship; and then at the end of the first clause on the eightieth page the court say:

To these may be added the rights secured by the thirteenth—

That is, freedom—

and fifteenth articles of amendment, and by the other clause of the fourteenth, next to be considered.

That clause is:

Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

The court go on and say:

The existence of laws in the States where the newly emancipated negroes resided, which discriminated with gross injustice and hardship against them as a class, was the evil to be remedied by this clause, and by it such laws are forbidden.

Mr. THURMAN. I am astonished, I must confess, after the court made an elaborate argument to show that these rights of citizens of the State must depend upon the State, and that they are wholly distinct from the rights, privileges, and immunities which belong to a man in his character of citizen of the United States, and basing the very decision upon that ground, that the Senator from New Jersey should take hold of a single sentence, separated from its context, to draw directly an opposite conclusion to that at which the majority of the court arrived.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I only read one sentence, but it extends over two or three pages.

Mr. THURMAN. Not only that; the judge proceeded to show that the very ground taken now by the Senator from New Jersey could be reduced to absurdity, and he went into an elaborate reductio ad absurdum of the very identical proposition that is now started by the Senator from New Jersey.

But, sir, before referring to that, I will go back a little in the course of my argument, for I have been interrupted so much that I am compelled to occupy more time than I intended and to repeat more than I intended. The court show by the decision in Coryell's case, by the decision in Ward vs. The State of Maryland, by the decision in Paul vs. Virginia, that these rights of citizens of the State are the fundamental rights that belong to a man, and which this bill supposes have been invaded; that they are the very kind of rights that belong to him as a citizen of the State, and not in his character of citizen of the United States. What are they? They were thus defined by Washington:

The inquiry is, what are the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States?

Not of citizens of the United States, but of State citizenship.

We feel no hesitation in confining these expressions to those privileges and immunities which are, in their nature, fundamental; which belong of right to citizens of all free governments, and which have at all times been enjoyed by the citizens of the several States which compose the Union from the time of their becoming free, independent, and sovereign. What these fundamental principles are it would perhaps be more tedious than difficult to enumerate. They may, however, be all comprehended under the following general heads: Protection by the Government, the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the right to acquire and possess property of every kind, and to pursue and obtain happiness and safety; subject, nevertheless, to such restraints as the Government may justly prescribe for the general good of the whole.

You cannot have a broader definition of privileges and immunities of a citizen than is contained in that definition of Washington, and those are the privileges and immunities which belong to a man, not in his character as a citizen of the United States, but in his character as a citizen of the State; and those are the privileges and immunities which Mr. Justice Miller twice says in his opinion are not touched in the slightest degree by this paragraph in the fourteenth amendment. Then he goes to show by a reductio ad absurdum what would be the contrary doctrine, which, by the way, is just the doctrine for which the Senator from New Jersey contends. He says:

The constitutional provision there alluded to—

That is, the original Constitution—

did not create those rights which it called privileges and immunities of citizens of the States. It threw around them in that clause no security for the citizen of the State in which they were claimed or exercised. Nor did it profess to control the power of the State governments over the rights of its own citizens.

Its sole purpose was to declare to the several States, that whatever those rights, as you grant or establish them to your own citizens, or as you limit or qualify or impose restrictions on their exercise, the same, neither more nor less, shall be the measure of the rights of citizens of other States within your jurisdiction.

Then he proceeds:

It would be the vainest show of learning to attempt to prove by citations of authority that up to the adoption of the recent amendments no claim or pretense was set up that those rights depended on the Federal Government for their existence or protection, beyond the very few express limitations which the Federal Constitution imposed upon the States, such, for instance, as the prohibition against ex post facto laws, bills of attainder, and laws impairing the obligations of contracts. But with the exception of these and a few other restrictions, the entire domain of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the States, as above defined, lay within the constitutional and legislative power of the States, and without that of the Federal Government. Was it the purpose of the fourteenth amendment, by the simple declaration that no State should make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, to transfer the security and protection of all the civil rights which we have mentioned from the States to the Federal Government? And where it is declared that Congress shall have the power to enforce that article, was it intended to bring within the power of Congress the entire domain of civil rights heretofore belonging exclusively to the States?

All this and more must follow if the proposition of the plaintiffs in error be sound.

That is the proposition for which the Senator from New Jersey contends.

For not only are these rights subject to the control of Congress whenever in its discretion any of them are supposed to be abridged by State legislation, but that body may also pass laws in advance, limiting and restricting the exercise of legislative power by the States in their most ordinary and useful functions as in its judgment it may think proper on all such subjects. And still further, such a construction, followed by the reversal of the judgments of the supreme court of Louisiana in these cases, would constitute this court a perpetual censor upon all legislation of the States on the civil rights of their own citizens, with authority to nullify such as it did not approve as consistent with those rights as they existed at the time of the adoption of this amendment. The argument we admit is not always the most conclusive which is drawn from the consequences urged against the adoption of a particular construction of an instrument. But when, as in the case before us, these consequences are so serious, so far-reaching and pervading, so great a departure from the structure and spirit of our institutions; when the effect is to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character; when in fact it radically changes the whole theory of the relations of the State and Federal governments to each other and of both these governments to the people, the argument has a force that is irresistible, in the absence of language which expresses such a purpose too clearly to admit of doubt.

We are convinced that no such results were intended by the Congress which proposed these amendments, nor by the Legislatures of the States which ratified them.

Why, sir, if language can be plainer than that, if language can condemn this bill more clearly, more cogently, more eloquently than that, I have never heard it used. I apply to this bill precisely these words, that it is a case "where the consequences are so serious, so far-reaching and pervading, so great a departure from the structure and spirit of our institutions," that its "effect is to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character;" that "in fact it radically changes the whole theory of the relations of the State and Federal governments to each other and of both these governments to the people." I say, using that language in respect to this bill, that the argument against it "has a force that is irresistible."

That, Mr. President, is the decision of the highest judicial tribunal of this country, clothed, as we all admit, with the final determination of what is the law and Constitution of this land——

Mr. EDMUNDS, (in his seat.) I do not admit it.

Mr. THURMAN. Whenever a case arises that is the subject of judicial cognizance. I did not hear the remark of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I stated that I did not admit it; but as qualified, as the Senator now does, the statement that the Supreme Court have the right to decide a case that is properly before them that involves a constitutional question, of course it is correct; but as a question of political consideration, it is not.

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senator had not interrupted me in the middle of a sentence, he would have had no occasion to interrupt me at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That may be true.

Mr. THURMAN. I know there are certain gentlemen who have been in the Congress of the United States, who thought it their duty to shear the Supreme Court of its powers under the Constitution and the laws, and by the repeal of statutes to prevent questions affecting the liberty, nay, the lives of citizens from being determined by that high judicial tribunal; but with the oath that I have taken to support the Constitution of the United States, and with the provision of the Constitution that the judicial power of the Government shall extend to all cases arising under the Constitution and all laws and treaties made in pursuance thereof, I consider it to be a part of my sworn duty not to deprive that court of the power to decide questions of that character, and that it is my duty to provide by law that such questions shall take the form of a case in order that they may be thus decided.

But, sir, enough of this. I beg the attention of the lawyers of the Senate to the opinion of the judges, including those of the dissenting judges, as explained in the Bartmeyer case, to show that as they there interpret the powers of Congress, those powers do not cover this bill.

A few words more and I will have done. I have spoken three times as long as I should have done but for the interruptions to which I have been subjected, of which, however, I make not the slightest complaint. I have no desire but to arrive at the truth. I have no feeling on this subject. I believe that I have far less prejudice against this colored race than perhaps half the people that reside in States where a colored man's face never was seen or where it was so seldom seen that the man who bore it was rather a novelty and a show. I have lived all my life surrounded by the colored race, and there is not one of them living on the face of this earth that can say that I ever treated him unkindly or with disrespect. I entertain for them none but the kindest feelings. They are human beings, as I am, and I am willing to see them enjoy every civil right that I enjoy. In my State they have enjoyed these rights for many a long year by the universal consent of all the people, and they will so continue to enjoy them; and now, speaking in their interest, I say that this bill is injurious and prejudicial to them. I say nothing about any hostile feeling that the bill itself may create that may lead to acts of oppression or violence. I speak not of that now. I shall confine myself mainly if not altogether to the question of the common schools. In regard to that, if I understood the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PRATT,] he said that this bill did not require mixed schools. I may have misunderstood him; but if I apprehended his remarks clearly he said this bill does not require mixed schools. I do not think that any one of the majority of the Judiciary Committee who reported the bill will sustain that assertion. I know that the first section of the bill may to a careless reader seem ambiguous, but I do not think there is one member of the majority of the Judiciary Committee who will not say, if the question is put directly to him, that the meaning of the section is that there shall be mixed schools. Let us see:

That all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of inns, public conveyances on land or water, theaters, and other places of public amusement—

Let us stop there for a moment. That means mixed audiences, does it not? That means mixed guests at a hotel, does it not? That means mixed travelers on a railway or in a stage-coach, does it not? If not, it does not mean anything. It certainly was not intended by the committee that Mr. Saville should build another theater for the entertainment of the colored people of Washington City, or that the Baltimore and Ohio Railway or the Baltimore and Potomac Railway is to run separate cars to carry colored persons. These are the very things that are complained of. Therefore, mixture is meant in inns, in public conveyances on land or water, in theaters, in other places of public amusement, and then it goes right on, "and"—there is the copulative conjunction, and as if to make that more emphatic the word "also" is added—and also of common schools and public institutions of learning or benevolence supported, in whole or in part, by general taxation.

If it means a mixed audience in a theater, if it means mixed guests at an inn, if it means mixed travelers on a railway, it means mixed colors in public schools and public institutions of learning and benevolence supported in whole or in part by general taxation. There is no getting rid of it. But that is not all—

And of cemeteries so supported—

And then comes—subject only to the conditions and limitations established by law.

If it stopped there it would possibly, but by no means certainly, leave it to the law-making power of the State to make a discrimination on the basis of color; but it does not stop there. For the very purpose of preventing any such discrimination on the basis of color, this sentence is added:

and applicable alike to citizens of every race and color, regardless of any previous condition of servitude.

That is to say, you may make conditions and limitations by law, but they must be conditions and limitations "applicable alike to citizens of every race and color regardless of any previous condition of servitude." You may provide by law that a negro man for certain sufficient causes may be excluded from an inn, a railway car, or a theater; but you must for the same causes exclude white men also. In other words, the prohibition is against any discrimination on the basis of race or color. There is no question about that. There cannot be. Therefore my friend from Indiana, if he has understood this first section as allowing the State of Indiana to provide by law that the children of colored people and of white people shall be educated in different schools, is entirely mistaken. This is intended to prohibit that very thing. Take my own State. Ohio was the first of the Western States that established a common-school system, and she established it long before it was established in a majority of the States lying east of the Alleghanies. She has nurtured it with all the care that ever a mother nurtured her offspring until there are $12,000,000 raised annually in the State of Ohio for the support of common schools. Twelve million dollars by taxation her people pay every year for the erection of school-houses and the support of common schools. If any other State can show a better record, let it be produced. She has provided always that the colored children should have equal advantages with the whites; and although $999 out of every $1,000 of those $12,000,000 come from the pockets of the white people, yet she gives to the negro child per capita pecisely the same amount for his education that she does to the child of the white parent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question? Is that given as a matter of grace and generosity, or is it given as a matter of right that the colored citizen has to have the State protect him and educate him?

Mr. THURMAN. I do not care whether it is a matter of right or whether it is a matter of generosity, it is a matter of fact; and it does not become the Senator from Vermont to be questioning the motive when the fact exists.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether the laws of Ohio provide for the establishment of separate schools now?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir; they do; that is the statute to this day, and I hold in my hand a decision pronounced by the supreme court of that State, composed of five eminent republicans, every one of them a republican; and it is the unanimous decision of that court, pronounced in December, 1871—only two years ago—in which the very question was whether that law of Ohio was in violation of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution; and the court, after stating the case, say:

It is quite apparent from this state of the case that the proceeding is brought, not because the children of the plaintiff are excluded from the public schools, but to test the right of those having charge of them to make a classification of scholars on the basis of color.

It was not a question of their being excluded, because they were not excluded from the school which was established for colored children.

This is the principal question in the case, and we propose to consider it without reference to the question made as to the proper parties to the proceeding, for in the view we take of the case this becomes unnecessary.

Then the court go on to show that if this provision of the law making separate schools on the basis of the distinction of color were in violation of the fourteenth amendment, it must be in violation of certain similar provisions in the constitution of Ohio of 1851, and of the first constitution of that State adopted in 1802, and then they cite uniform decisions directly upon the point by the supreme court of that State that that classification on the basis of color was not a violation of the constitution of 1851, or of the constitution of 1802, nor was it a violation of the provisions of the grants by the United States to the State of Ohio of land for purposes of education.

Mr. CONKLING. Has the Senator the words of the Ohio constitution in that regard before him?

Mr. THURMAN. They are here in the decision. I will try to find them for the Senator, but it will perhaps take me some little time. I will find them for him, however, and hand them to him. Having done that, the court go on to say:

But the question of legislative power to authorize the classification of the youth of the State for school purposes on the basis of color, has been determined by the supreme court of this State, both under the present constitution and that of 1802.

Now here is the language in the constitution of 1802:

The twenty-fifth section of the bill of rights in the latter contains express provisions guaranteeing "equal participation" to all in the schools endowed, in whole or in part, from the revenue arising from donations made by the United States for the support of schools. But it was held in The State, ex. rel., &c., vs. The City of Cincinnati, (19 Ohio, 178,) that inasmuch as "the whole subject of organizing and regulating schools is very properly left to the General Assembly, in the exercise of its legislative powers," an act to authorize the establishment of separate schools for the education of colored children was constitutional; and it was said by Hitchcock, C. J., in that case—

And if there is a man in this Senate who lives west of the Alleghanies and has not heard of the legal renown and great ability and learning of Peter Hitchcock, for seventeen years a judge of the supreme court of Ohio, and for a large portion of that time its chief justice, a name that in Ohio is as much revered by the disciples of the law as that of Gibson in Pennsylvania, or Parsons or Shaw in Massachusetts, or of Marshall in the Federal judiciary—I say if there is a man here who does not know that, he has paid but little attention to the history of my State. That judge said:

And it was said by Hitchcock, C. J., in that case that, "as a matter of policy, it is unquestionably better that the white and colored youth should be placed in separate schools, and that the school fund should be divided to them in proportion to their numbers."

I may remark, too, that Judge Hitchcock was a very firm and consistent member of the whig party as long as that party had an existence, and that he had very little sympathy indeed with what he used to call the locofocos. The court proceed:

After this expression of opinion by that eminent judge, we might at least hesitate to conclude that the classification of the youth of the State for school purposes, on the basis of color, was an unauthorized or unreasonable exercise of the legislative discretion in the regulation of the public schools of the State.

But in Van Camp vs. The Board of Education of Logan (9 Ohio Statutes, 406) the question under consideration was expressly determined by this court upon the original statute, which, so far as material to the question, was the same as that under which the classification was made in this case. In that case the legislative power of classification on the basis of color was sanctioned, and it was held that, inasmuch as the statute "is a law of classification and not of exclusion," colored children "are not, as of right, entitled to admission into the common schools set apart under said act for the instruction of white youths."

* * * * * * *

It would seem, then, that under the constitution and laws of this State, the right to classify the youth of the State for school purposes on the basis of color, and to assign them to separate schools for education, both upon well-recognized legal principles and the repeated adjudications of this court, is too firmly established to be now judicially disturbed.

Then it proceeds to the fourteenth amendment:

But it is claimed that the law authorizing the classification in question contravenes the provisions of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and is therefore abrogated thereby.

Then the court quote the fourteenth amendment. After some further observations the court say:

This involves the inquiry as to what privileges or immunities are embraced in the inhibition of this clause. We are not aware that this has been as yet judicially settled—

This was before the Slaughter-house cases were decided—

The language of the clause, however, taken in connection with other provisions of the amendment and of the Constitution of which it forms a part, affords strong reasons for believing that it includes only such privileges or immunities as are derived from, or recognized by, the Constitution of the United States. A broader interpretation opens into a field of conjecture limitless as the range of speculative theories, and might work such limitations of the power of the States to manage and regulate their local institutions and affairs as were never contemplated by the amendment.

If this construction be correct, the clause has no application to this case, for all the privileges of the school system of this State are derived solely from the constitution and laws of the State. If the General Assembly should pass a law repealing all laws creating and regulating the system, it cannot be claimed that the fourteenth amendment could be interposed to prevent so grievous an abridgment of the citizens of the State, for they would thereby be deprived of privileges derived from the State, and not of privileges derived from the United States.

After further arguing the matter the court say:

The question therefore under consideration is the same that has, as we have seen, been heretofore determined in this State, that a classification of the youth of the State for school purposes upon any basis which does not exclude either class from equal school advantages is no infringement of the equal rights of citizens secured by the constitution of the State.

We have seen that the law in the case before us works no substantial inequality of school privileges between the children of both classes in the locality of the parties. Under the lawful regulation of equal educational privileges the children of each class are required to attend the school provided for them, and to which they are assigned by those having the lawful official control of all. The plaintiff, then, cannot claim that his privileges are abridged on the ground of inequality of school advantages for his children. Nor can he dictate where his children shall be instructed, or what teacher shall perform that office, without obtaining privileges not enjoyed by white citizens. Equality of rights does not involve the necessity of educating white and colored persons in the same school, any more than it does that of educating children of both sexes in the same school, or that different grades of scholars must be kept in the same school. Any classification which preserves substantially equal school advantages is not prohibited by either the State or Federal Constitution, nor would it contravene the provisions of either. There is, then, no ground upon which the plaintiff can claim that his rights under the fourteenth amendment have been infringed. (21 Critchfield's Ohio State Reports, 204-211.)

That decision was followed by the decision of the Slaughter-house cases, which is on all-fours with that unanimous decision of the supreme court of Ohio. Now, I need not say to any Senator that if the exclusion of colored children from white schools is not a violation of the fourteenth amendment, then you have no right to punish such exclusion. You cannot get the right to punish it unless it is a violation of the Constitution, and the Supreme Court of the United States has said in effect that it is no violation of the Constitution of the United States. The supreme court of Ohio, by a unanimous decision of judges strongly sympathizing with the colored people and belonging to that party which sets itself up as their great champion, has said the same thing. And yet you seek to overthrow the law of my State and force upon her people what her Legislature, her courts, her constitutional conventions, and her people have always opposed and ever will oppose.

Mr. President, I said some time ago, so long ago that I had almost forgotten it, that this bill is prejudicial to the interests of the colored race. Every man in this Senate I have no doubt desires to see that race educated. It is for the best interests of the whole people, not simply of that race but of the white race also, that they should be educated. How are they to be educated in the Southern States which lately were slave-holding States? Unless the Federal Government is to assume the right to set up schools there and carry on education on the doctrine to which I have alluded, that there is no express prohibition against their doing it in the Constitution, if the Federal Government is not to set up and pay for schools there, those schools must be set up and maintained by the State Legislatures and paid for out of the property of the white people of those States. The property belongs to the white people, almost the whole of it; the taxes come out of their pockets; and it is their Legislatures that must pass the laws to levy those taxes, with the exception of perhaps two States, or at the most three, in which the negroes predominate. Now, I ask you, Senators, if you, treating as utterly unworthy of regard this thing which you call a prejudice, and which you felt yourselves not a great while ago and which was as strong in your States, Senators from New England, as it was in the Southern States in the days of your fathers—if treating that as a mere prejudice you require that there shall be mixed schools in those States, I ask you what will be the result? The result will be that schools will not be established; the taxes will not be laid; the laws for the common-school system will be repealed or rendered nugatory; and the consequence will be that both the negro children and the poor white children too will go without education. There never was so fatal a blow aimed at the common-school system, never so fatal a blow aimed at the education of the poor, never so fatal a blow aimed at the education and elevation of the children of this colored race, conceived by the mind of man as this civil-rights bill. Now, there are some people of the colored race who have the sense to perceive it. I hold in my hand what I have clipped from a newspaper, an extract from an address by a colored Methodist preacher, delivered in the city of Richmond but a short time ago in reference to this very bill; and I crave the attention of the Senate to it. It is marked by such good sense, it is so well and so clearly expressed, it is applicable to this bill and so apposite to the matter in hand, that it deserves to be read in the Senate of the United States?

Rev. W. B. Derrick, pastor of the Third-street Methodist church, of Richmond, in a late discourse, said:

"From information received, the Government now contemplates the passage of a bill in which the coeducation of the races is to be attempted. Now, I may be frowned at by my own people; but, regardless of frowns and consequences, I will say the moment such an enactment appears on the statute-book the public-school system in the South will receive a blow that will cause its death, and no power this side of Heaven's can infuse life into its dead carcass. Then who will be the losers, the blacks or the whites? I need not tell you. That I leave to you to answer and ponder over. I am anxious for the days to come when caste will be abolished; but the teachings of two hundred years cannot be forgotten in ten or twenty years. I will look forward with gloomy anticipations if such a law is passed. Why, how long would such a system be maintained in the fifteen ex-slave States?"

That is, the system of common schools—

"Just as long as would be required to go through the forms of law needed to destroy it. Some bring the lawfulness of the bill in question; but all things that are lawful are not expedient. As a negro, I am with you as far as consistency will allow me. There are to be found in the South over one million of colored children attending schools."

Senators, I beg your attention to that. There are now to be found in the South over one million colored children attending school under the separate school system.

"Are we prepared to furnish means to continue their education"—

"Are we," the negroes—

"when these States refuse to impose taxation for school purposes, which they will surely do!"

That man sees, and sees with the keen instinct which the interest of his own race suggests, that this bill is to strike down the schools in which one million colored children are now receiving that education which is to fit them to become useful citizens of this country. That is to be the result of it; and yet for party purposes this bill will pass! I wash my hands of it.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President——

Mr. WEST. If it is not disagreeable to the Senator from Indiana to have an executive session, to enable him to speak to-morrow, I will make a motion that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORTON. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before putting the question on that motion the Chair will, with the indulgence of the Senate, clear his table of the papers upon it.

Several SENATORS. No objection.

ADJOURNMENT SINE DIE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That when the two Houses adjourn on Monday the 22d day of June next, the first session of this Congress shall be declared adjourned without day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is the same resolution in substance with the one we have passed, and I move that the Senate concur in it.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. No. 1995) to amend the act approved June 18, 1838, entitled "An act to require the judge of the district courts of East and West Tennessee to hold a court at Jackson, in said State—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. No. 3171) to amend the customs-revenue laws, and to repeal moieties—to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. No. 3417) to relieve Thomas Claiborne, of Tennessee, of political disabilities imposed upon him by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1013) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

On motion by Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, it was Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. SARGENT, Mr. MORRILL of Maine, and Mr. DAVIS.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 3030) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1873 and 1874, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOGAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 3030) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1873 and 1874, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSTON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 3168) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works for rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WEST. I renew my motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened and (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 20, 1874.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a privileged question. I call up the concurrent resolution of the Senate for the final adjournment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the concurrent resolution of the Senate, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
May 19, 1874.

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, directed to adjourn their respective Houses, without day, on the 22d day of June, A. D. 1874, at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. KASSON. I must object until a disposition is made of bills affecting western interests.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is the resolution privileged?

The SPEAKER. The resolution for final adjournment is privileged as an original motion. But a resolution from the Senate lies on the Speaker's table subject to the control of the majority of the House.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Is it in order to take business from the Speaker's table before the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. BURCHARD. I ask that the resolution may be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. CESSNA. I object.

SAINT PAUL AND PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Speaker, I give notice that on Monday next, immediately after the call of the States has been concluded, I shall move to suspend the rules to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill 486, an act to extend the act of March 3, 1873, entitled "An act for the extension of time to the Saint Paul and Pacific Railroad Company for the completion of its roads," for consideration and passage.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a privileged question. I submit a concurrent resolution which I send to the desk, and on it I call the previous question.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That when the two Houses adjourn on Tuesday, the 16th day of June next, the first session of this Congress shall be declared adjourned without day.

Mr. DAWES. I will change the day to Monday, the 22d, which is the day in the Senate resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be so modified.

Mr. COBURN. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether it is in order to move that the House do now adjourn?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. COBURN. Then I make that motion.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, the Chair stated that the noes had it.

Mr. COBURN. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. Would it be in order to move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency?

The SPEAKER. It would not, because the gentleman from Massachusetts has demanded the previous question. If the House should refuse to second the demand for the previous question the motion would be in order.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I desire to submit that motion if I get the opportunity.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn, there were ayes 12; not a sufficient number.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering tellers, there were ayes 12; not one-fifth of a quorum.

So tellers were refused, the yeas and nays were refused, and the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. Pending the demand for the previous question, I move that the concurrent resolution be laid on the table.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 51, noes 96.

Mr. KASSON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 65, nays 135, not voting 90; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atkins, Biery, Bradley, Bromberg, Brown, Bundy, Cain, Cessna, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Donnan, Dunnell, Eldredge, Farwell, Field, Fort, Frye, John T. Harris, Harrison, Havens, Gerry W. Hazelton, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyde, Hynes, Kasson, Knapp, Loughridge, Lynch, Maynard, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, Merriam, Niblack, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Isaac C. Parker, James H. Platt, jr., Pratt, Ransier, Rapier, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Sener, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloss, John Q. Smith, Sprague, Stanard, Strait, Thornburgh, Tyner, Wallace, Marcus L. Ward, White, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, William B. Williams, James Wilson, and Woodworth—65.

NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Banning, Barber, Barrere, Beck, Bell, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Buckner, Buffinton, Burchard, Burrows, Caldwell, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Clark, jr., Corwin, Cotton, Cox, Crossland, Crounse, Curtis, Danford, Darrall, Dawes, DeWitt, Duell, Durham, Eames, Eden, Foster, Freeman, Garfield, Glover, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Henry R. Harris, Hatcher, Hathorn, John B. Hawley, Hendee, Hereford, Herndon, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hoskins, Houghton, Hubbell, Kellogg, Kendall, Killinger, Lawrence, Lowndes, Luttrell, Magee, MacDougall, McKee, McLean, Milliken, Mills, Mitchell, Monroe, Moore, Morey, Morrison, Myers, Neal, Niles, Nunn, O'Brien, O'Neill, Page, Hosea W. Parker, Parsons, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, Potter, Randall, Rice, Ellis H. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sessions, Sheldon, Sloan, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Southard, Standiford, Starkweather, St. John, Stone, Storm, Christopher Y. Thomas, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Vance, Waddell, Waldron, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Wells, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whiteley, Wilber, William Williams, Willie, Wolfe, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—135.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Averill, Barnum, Barry, Bass, Begole, Berry, Bright, Burleigh, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cannon, Cason, Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clymer, Clinton L. Cobb, Comingo, Conger, Creamer, Crittenden, Crocker, Crooke, Crutchfield, Davis, Dobbins, Elliott, Giddings, Robert S. Hale, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, John W. Hazelton, Hersey, Holman, Hooper, Howe, Hunton, Jewett, Kelley, Lamar, Lamison, Lamport, Lansing, Lawson, Leach, Lewis, Lofland, Lowe, Marshall, Martin, McJunkin, McNulta, Mellish, Negley, Nesmith, Pelham, Phillips, Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Purman, Rainey, Ray, Read, Richmond, Robbins, William R. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Shanks, Sheats, Sherwood, Snyder, Speer, Stephens, Stowell, Strawbridge, Swann, Sypher, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Wheeler, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, Wilshire, Ephraim K. Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodford—90

So the House refused to lay the concurrent resolution upon the table.

The question recurred upon seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. MAYNARD. Would it be in order to move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency?

The SPEAKER. It would be if the House refused to second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the previous question be voted down I will make that motion so that we can have the currency question disposed of.

Mr. McCRARY. By what process can the House reach the resolution on this subject that came from the Senate?

The SPEAKER. By going to business on the Speaker's table after the morning hour.

On seconding the previous question tellers were ordered; and Mr. DAWES and Mr. KASSON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 112, noes 49.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered, being upon agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 37 members voting therefor.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 143, nays 69, not voting 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Banning, Barber, Barrere, Beck, Bell, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Buckner, Buffinton, Burchard, Burrows, Cain, Caldwell, Cason, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Comingo, Corwin, Cotton, Cox, Crittenden, Crounse, Curtis, Danford, Darrall, Dawes, DeWitt, Duell, Durham, Eames, Eden, Field, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Glover, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Henry R. Harris, Hatcher, Hathorn, John B. Hawley, John W. Hazelton, Hendee, Hereford, Herndon, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hoskins, Houghton, Hunton, Kellogg, Kendall, Killinger, Lamport, Lowndes, Luttrell, Magee, MacDougall, McLean, Milliken, Mills, Mitchell, Monroe, Moore, Morrison, Myers, Neal, Nesmith, Niles, Nunn, O'Brien, O'Neill, Page, Hosea W. Parker, Parsons, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, Thomas C. Platt, Potter, Randall, Read, Rice, Ellis H. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Sessions, Sheats, Sloan, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, John Q. Smith, William A. Smith, Southard, Standiford, Starkweather, St. John, Stone, Storm, Christopher Y. Thomas, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Vance, Waddell, Waldron, Walls, Wells, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whiteley, Wilber, George Willard, William Williams, Willie, Wolfe, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—143.

NAYS—Messrs. Atkins, Biery, Bradley, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Bundy, Cannon, Cessna, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Crossland, Donnan, Dunnell, Eldredge, John T. Harris, Harrison, Havens, Gerry W. Hazelton, Holman, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyde, Hynes, Kasson, Knapp, Lawrence, Lawson, Loughridge, Lynch, Maynard, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, McKee, Merriam, Niblack, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Isaac C. Parker, James H. Platt, jr., Pratt, Ransier, Rapier, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloss, Sprague, Stanard, Strait, Thornburgh, Tyner, Wallace, Marcus L. Ward, White, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, William B. Williams, James Wilson, and Woodworth—69.

So the concurrent resolution was adopted.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SANBORN CONTRACT.

Several members called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on Ways and Means in relation to the Sanborn contract.

Mr. FOSTER. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. DAWES. I have just received a letter from my colleague from the Essex district, [Mr. BUTLER,] saying that he is ill and upon his back, unable to get from his room. He is desirous of speaking on this question, and he reserved the remarks he desired to make yesterday on the then pending bill until to-day, and he requests me to ask the gentleman from Ohio or the House for such postponement as will enable him to participate in the debate on the bill now pending.

Mr. FOSTER. Were it a matter entirely personal to myself, I should, of course, make no objection to the postponement; but this subject has been before the House since the 4th of May last, and it is desirable that action should be had upon it. I prefer, therefore, to take the judgment of the House upon the question whether it shall be postponed or not.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Committee on Appropriations will be very glad to use to-day.

Mr. DAWES. I will ask the Clerk to read my colleague's letter, and then I will ask that this bill may stand over until to-morrow, when it will come up as unfinished business.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 20, 1874.

MR. DAWES:

I was taken ill again last night, somewhat as before, and am confined to my bed. Cannot the matter in regard to the moiety system by contracts, which is up for to-day, be deferred until I get out? I intended to have made such remarks as I have to make upon the whole system of moieties upon this question. May I venture to ask of your committee so great a courtesy? It is not often that I have to ask it on account of illness, and the issues of life and health are not in our own hands.

I am yours, truly,

BENJAMIN F. BUTLER.

Mr. DAWES. I now suggest to the House that this bill stand over until to-morrow, just as it is to-day.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TYNER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the post-office appropriation bill, and pending that motion I move that all general debate on the bill close in half a minute.

The SPEAKER. If this motion prevails it would leave the moiety bill before the House to-morrow without any postponement whatever.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to oppose the motion to close debate.

The SPEAKER. It is not a debatable question.

Mr. WOOD. I shall move that the House adjourn if this motion to close debate is to prevail. I cannot consent that this bill shall pass without debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the motion to close debate so as to allow one hour and a half for debate.

Mr. TYNER. I hope the House will vote down that amendment. I do not desire to debate the bill.

The question was taken on Mr. HOLMAN's amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 73, noes 72.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. TYNER. I suggest to my colleague, [Mr. HOLMAN]——

Mr. ELDREDGE. I object to debate.

Mr. TYNER. I am not designing to debate. I wish to suggest——

Mr. RANDALL. I object to any discussion.

Mr. TYNER. Very well; then I call for tellers.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays; we may as well have them.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was again taken; and there were—yeas 120, nays 92, not voting 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albright, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barber, Barrere, Beck, Bell, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, John B. Clark, jr., Clements, Clymer, Stephen A. Cobb, Comingo, Cook, Corwin, Cox, Crittenden, Crossland, Crounse, Curtis, Darrall, DeWitt, Dunnell, Durham, Eames, Eden, Eldredge, Field, Freeman, Frye, Giddings, Glover, Gooch, Gunckel, Hancock, Benjamin W. Harris, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Havens, John B. Hawley, Gerry W. Hazelton, Hereford, Herndon, E. Rockwood Hoar, Holman, Hunton, Hurlbut, Hyde, Hynes, Kasson, Kellogg, Kendall, Killinger, Knapp, Lawson, Lowe, Luttrell, Magee, McKee, McLean, Merriam, Milliken, Mills, Mitchell, Moore, Morrison, Myers, Neal, Nesmith, Niblack, O'Brien, Hosea W. Parker, Pendleton, Perry, Pierce, Pike, James H. Platt, jr., Potter, Randall, Ransier, Rapier, Read, James C. Robinson, Sener, Sloss, John Q. Smith, Southard, Stanard, Standiford, St. John, Stone, Storm, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thornburgh, Todd, Vance, Waddell, Jasper D. Ward, Wells, White, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, Willie, James Wilson, Wood, and John D. Young—120.

NAYS—Messrs. Averill, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Burchard, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Coburn, Danford, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Foster, Garfield, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Harmer, Harrison, Hathorn, John W. Hazelton, Hendee, Hoskins, Houghton, Hubbell, Hunter, Lawrence, Loughridge, Lowndes, Lynch, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, Monroe, Negley, Nunn, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pelham, Phelps, Thomas C. Platt, Pratt, Ray, Rice, Ellis H. Roberts, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Scofield, Isaac W. Scudder, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Smart, A. Herr Smith, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Starkweather, Strait, Strawbridge, Sypher, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Waldron, Wallace, Walls, Marcus L. Ward, Wilber, George Willard, William Williams, William B. Williams, Wolfe, and Woodworth—92.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Albert, Barnum, Barry, Bass, Begole, Berry, Bundy, Burleigh, Benjamin F. Butler, Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clinton L. Cobb, Conger, Cotton, Creamer, Crocker, Crooke, Crutchfield, Davis, Dawes, Elliott, Farwell, Fort, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, Hersey, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hooper, Howe, Jewett, Kelley, Lamar, Lamison, Lamport, Lansing, Leach, Lewis, Lofland, Marshall, Martin, Maynard, McJunkin, McNulta, Mellish, Morey, Niles, Phillips, Poland, Purman, Rainey, Richmond, Robbins, William R. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Henry J. Scudder, Sheldon, Small, George L. Smith, Speer, Stephens, Stowell, Swann, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Wheeler, Whiteley, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, Wilshire, Ephraim K. Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Woodford, and Pierce M. B. Young—78.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The motion, as amended, was then agreed to.

Mr. TYNER. I move to reconsider the vote just taken, and also move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The SPEAKER. It has been frequently ruled that that would have no effect upon debate in Committee of the Whole. The House at any time can order an extension of time for debate.

Mr. TYNER. I wanted the decision of the Chair upon that point. I will withdraw the motion.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Pending the motion to go into Committee of the Whole,

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask that the legislative appropriation bill with the amendments of the Senate, just returned from that body, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and that the bill with the amendments numbered, some one hundred and forty of them, be printed.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

CHOCTAW CLAIMS.

Mr. COMINGO, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, submitted a report on the memorial of P. P. Pitchlyn, asking payment of the claim of the Choctaws for money awarded the Choctaw Nation by the Senate of the United States, March 9, 1859; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

MOUTH OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. HURLBUT. I desire to give notice that on Tuesday next at one o'clock, or at the expiration of the morning hour, or as soon thereafter as practicable, I will call up for consideration House bill No. 2342, for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River.

PATENTS AND COPYRIGHTS.

Mr. MACDOUGALL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3418) to amend an act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to patents and copyrights;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

WAGON-ROAD IN WYOMING.

Mr. STEELE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be authorized to transmit to the House of Representatives the report of a reconnaisance made by Captain W. A. Jones, Corps of Engineers, in the year 1873, for a wagon-road from the line of the Union Pacific Railroad, in Wyoming Territory, to the Yellowstone National Park and Fort Ellis, Montana Territory.

HOMESTEAD AND PRE-EMPTION CLAIMANTS.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference to the Commiteee on the Public Lands for the protection of homestead and pre-emption claimants on lands granted the Southern Pacific Railroad Company by act of Congress, July 27, 1866, and the several acts and resolutions amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto.

Mr. HOUGHTON. I ask that that bill be read.

The SPEAKER. Why cannot this bill wait until Monday next?

Mr. LUTTRELL. The bill, or the substance of it, was sent to me with a request that I introduce it and have it referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. This is very irregular; all the day of Monday is devoted to the introduction of bills.

The bill was not received.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TYNER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TYNER] that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the post-office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. PARSONS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3094) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all general debate will be limited to one hour and a half. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TYNER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TYNER. I do not desire myself to occupy any considerable portion of the time of the committee upon this bill at present; nor indeed will I occupy any time now in discussing it. I will simply notify the Chair that, so far as I am concerned, he is at liberty to recognize, in the general discussion of this bill, any gentleman up to the expiration of the first hour allowed for general debate, at which time I will ask the Chair to recognize me, if I should have anything to say by way of reply.

And now I desire to say to my colleague [Mr. HOLMAN] especially, and to gentlemen on the other side, that it was not my intention at all to cut off general debate on this bill. What I wanted to do was first to test the sense of the House as to whether or not there should be any general debate; and if the House indicated its purpose to debate the bill in a general way, then I desired to tender a compromise (which gentlemen upon the other side of the House prevented me from proposing) by saying that I was willing we should debate the bill for one hour, they occupying fifty-five minutes of the time. I make this statement in justice to myself, and now the Chair is at liberty to recognize whom he may.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, the course pursued by gentlemen in reference to this bill is somewhat unusual; and I am glad that my colleague [Mr. TYNER] has sought an early moment to make some explanation. A bill making large appropriations of money, even though in conformity with previous experience, without any material increase, is always an especial object of interest, if not to this House, at least to the people who bear the weight of taxation. One very important duty—perhaps the very highest duty devolving upon Congress, especially at this time and it will probably be the case for years to come—is the determination of the amounts which shall be appropriated annually to carry on the various Departments of the Government. But, sir, when a bill like this is reported to this House by the Committee on Appropriations, providing for an important Department of the Government in which every citizen has a direct and immediate interest, proposes largely to increase former appropriations, and makes an unexampled increase in the appropriations for that Department from the public Treasury at a time when severe economy is demanded, it is certainly remarkable that a strenuous effort should be made to cut off all debate except that limited five-minute debate which is allowed by the rules and which cannot be suspended.

This post-office appropriation bill, of all others, requires examination; and the House last evening was if not electrified, at least amused, by the statement of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS,] a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, who announced the interesting fact that the republican party stood alone not simply on its willingness to inquire into and expose frauds upon the Government, but in its determination to enforce the most severe economy and integrity in public affairs. Yet, sir, to-day we noticed that that gentleman voted to stifle debate upon this bill, undertaking to limit discussion to a half-minute. In other words, we have not yet reached the point in the administration of the Post-Office Department where concealment is no longer possible; the facts do not as yet compel a remedy, hence no examination shall be made. There shall at least be delay until the facts exposed shall compel investigation. It was a refreshing spectacle, after the whole country had been dishonored by a long and unbroken series of frauds through the moieties system and farming out the collection of the public revenues that at the last moment gentlemen controlling the affairs of the Government should come forward and propose a remedy, and then make it a matter of boast that the republican party is always eager to purify itself. Yet upon this bill, to which attention has been already somewhat arrested by grave charges of questionable practices, an attempt is deliberately made by ninety-two gentlemen on this floor to cut off debate!

Mr. Chairman, the bill now before us appropriates $35,753,391 directly. I find that the amount as footed up by the Committee on Appropriations is $35,653,391; but on summing up the various items it is found that there is a mistake of $100,000 in the amount, which is, as I have just stated, $35,753,391. Now, sir, we have no mode of getting at excessive appropriations except by comparison; the annual appropriations are the index of the nature and extent of our increase of expenditures. Last year the sum appropriated for this Department was $32,529,167; so that the country is now informed by this bill that there is to be an increase of expenditure in the Post-Office Department of $3,224,224 over the extravagant appropriations of last year; and, sir, if you add to the amount directly appropriated by this bill the sum of $5,634,842, appropriated conditionally by the terms of the bill and which may be used for the Post-Office Department during the coming fiscal year, the entire appropriations in this bill amount to $41,328,233. Thus $41,328,233—a sum equal to two-thirds of the entire expenditures of this Government the year preceding the late war—is placed under the absolute control of a single Department of the Government. And this is the bill which was to be put through the House without any opportunity for debate!

Mr. ELDREDGE. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the figures he states include the income of the Post-Office Department, or whether this is an independent appropriation over and above the income or earnings of the Department?

Mr. HOLMAN. The estimate of the income of the Post-Office Department for the coming fiscal year is $29,293,549. That sum is taken into the account. The income of the Department is appropriated in common with whatever expenditures it is estimated there will be over and above the revenues of the Department.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Is the income of the Department first paid into the Treasury? Is it ever covered into the Treasury, so that when expended it appears among the general expenditures of the Government; or is that income used without going into the Treasury, so that it does not appear as making a part of the aggregate expenses of the current year?

Mr. HOLMAN. The income of the Post-Office Department, estimated for the current year as something more than $29,293,549, is not covered into the Treasury, but is appropriated in advance.

It is a fund placed absolutely under the control of the Department. It is that much money absolutely under the control of the Department, and the appropriation of that money by Congress is more a matter of form than reality. The revenue of the Post-Office Department is appropriated in advance, and whatever over that the Department may have to expend.

Mr. ELDREDGE. If the gentleman will allow me, I wish to make another remark. In making up the expenditure for the current year this sum of the income of the Post-Office Department has never appeared, as I understand it, as a part of the aggregate sum, but is kept back as though the Post-Office Department were self-supporting and earning its own money, except so far as the sum in excess of the income is concerned. The people, although paying for their own postage, paying this sum of $29,000,000 and something over out of their own pockets, precisely the same as they pay their taxes, are deluded by the statement of the aggregate expenditures for the current year.

Mr. HOLMAN. The statement made by the gentleman from Wisconsin is certainly correct. The amount absolutely under the control of the Department is the amount of revenue, whatever it may be, and also the additional sums appropriated by Congress. It is estimated this year, as I have said, at $29,293,549, and the amount here appropriated is $35,753,391. That is the aggregate of the entire appropriation by this bill, and the expenditures over the receipts is the difference between $29,293,549 and $35,753,391; and then the further sum of $5,634,842 is appropriated by this bill on the condition only that the Postmaster-General wishes to expend that much more. In other words, the bill places at his disposal the sum of $41,328,233.

On examining the reports which come to Congress from this Department it is manifest a large portion of this increased expenditure results from an act passed in 1873, authorizing the Post-Office Department to readjust the allowances made to various railroad corporations of the country for the transportation of the mails. And it is to that particular subject I desire to invite the attention of the committee. The increase, sir, in this particular is very startling. The encroachments of these great railroad corporations may well alarm the country. This consolidated railroad power is a fearful drain on your Treasury. It is already a controlling power in this Government in the tremendous weight it is able to exercise over your Departments. You will find its power in an increase of your expenditures of nearly three and a quarter million dollars by this bill over the expenditures of last year. We shall find that this increased expenditure has resulted from the expedients and manipulations of railroad corporations.

I have in my hand, Mr. Chairman, a statement of the increase in the amount to be received by railroad companies under this bill over the last year. I desire to call the attention of the committee, and especially of my colleague, [Mr. TYNER,] to the increase in the cost of transporting the mails by the railroads, by specific instances. I take a single instance out of a large number of railroad corporations, to which large increase of application of public moneys for carrying the public mails has recently been made by the Post-Office Department, as a fair illustration. I take the New York and Erie Railroad Company from the city of New York to Dunkirk as a fair example of the progress of the increase of expenditures by the Post-Office Department in the interest of railroad corporations, to show to what extent this Department of the Government has become subordinate to that power.

The following statement shows the effect of the law of March 3, 1873, increasing the compensation of railroads for carrying the United States mails:

Erie Railroad Company, New York to Dunkirk, four hundred and sixty miles.

1869, (Postmaster-General's report,) page 55, route 1001, law March 3, 1845	$128,175
1870, (Postmaster-General's report,) page 58, route 1001, law March 3, 1845	122,675
1871, (Postmaster-General's report,) page 22, route 1001, law March 3, 1845	122,675
1872, (Postmaster-General's report,) page 69, route 1001, law March 3, 1845	138,000
1873, (Postmaster-General's report,) page 38, route 1001, law March 3, 1845	172,500
1874, under law of March 3, 1873, (order of December 31, 1873)	323,595
Increase per annum under new law	151,095

Now, sir, as exceedingly pertinent to the line of my remarks, I again call attention to the fact that in 1871 the amount paid this road for carrying the mails from New York to Dunkirk was $122,675, while for the present year it is $323,595, an increase of $200,920; that, too, as a friend near me suggests, while the franking privilege has been abolished, diminishing the amount of mail matter, and with every agency demanded by the Post-Office Department under its control, not simply to diminish the expenses of the Department, but to increase its revenue, and especially with the large powers under its control in reference to contracts with railroad corporations granted by the act of March 3, 1873.

I wish to call attention to another fact, if my colleague will permit me. I find from a table before me, carefully prepared, that the Post-Office Department is now paying the Erie Railroad corporation a larger sum for the transportation of the mails, weight considered and all, than is charged by the same company for the transportation of passengers in first-class cars.

For instance, I find that on a train of cars upon that road, for passengers holding commutation tickets, where the traveler passes over the road twice every day, as the mails are carried, under the schedule which I have before me, the sum which the railroad company charges and receives for the full number of first-class passengers, who could be seated in a car of the dimensions of such as are used for postal purposes, would amount to the sum of $135,106.60. That is to say, according to the charges of that company, which I have before me, for commutation tickets for the transportation of passengers, assuming the car to be full to its utmost capacity each way, (two trips daily as mails are carried twice a day,) the amount received would be $135,106.60. And yet for the transportation of the mails in a car of the same capacity the Post-Office Department is paying under the act of March 3, 1873, the same company the sum of $323,595; making the Government pay $188,488.40 more for the transportation of the mails than would be received by the company for the transportation of passengers the same distance for a number equal to the whole capacity of the car in which the mails are transported.

Mr. TYNER. Without questioning the accuracy of my colleague's calculation, I desire to ask him whether or not in making that calculation he considered the fact that the mails are carried over that road twice each day?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly; I stated that.

Mr. TYNER. I did not hear the gentleman state it. I will ask further, did he make the same estimate in regard to the passengers?

Mr. HOLMAN. The same estimate exactly. That is to say, on the same road, at the company's rates for commutation tickets, for a car carrying passengers to its utmost capacity twice a day, as the mails are carried, the amount annually received would be $135,106.60; while for the transportation of mails twice a day you are paying that company the sum of $323,595; making a difference, as I have stated, against the Government of $188,488.40 a year, when, as everybody knows, the transportation of passengers has been supposed to be the most important and valuable employment to railroad corporations. I make this statement on the authority of tables before me prepared by a gentleman fully competent for such an investigation, and which I believe to be correct in every particular.

Mr. BECK. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana whether, in connection with this subject of the increased cost of the railroad transportation of the mails, his attention has been called to the letter of Mr. Giles A. Smith which Senator MORRILL had read in the Senate? Has the gentleman got that letter?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. TYNER. Before my colleague proceeds further, I wish to see if he is precisely correct in his calculation as to a passenger car. Does my colleague, in making up his estimate of the value of a passenger coach to that company, take into account the fact that the company must run four cars a day to make it equivalent to the number of cars used in the postal service? Two each way per day would be four coaches each day. Has my colleague estimated the value to the company, even on commutation tickets, of four passenger cars a day over the entire line of road?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes; the tables before me estimate for one car four times a day over the road. All I am anxious to do is to present the question in the fairest possible light. And I have shown that by the increase in 1874, under the act of March 3, 1873, you are paying the Erie Railroad Company, recently if not now, under the management of Jay Gould and his associates, a larger sum by $188,488.40 a year than they would receive for the transportation of a number of passengers in a car of equal size to that used in the transportation of your mail, and that that has all been brought about by the action of the Post-Office Department under the act of 1873, more than doubling the amounts formerly paid. I have before me also a corresponding statement in regard to the New York and New Haven Railroad Company, where the same extraordinary fact makes its appearance.

Mr. TYNER. Before my colleague proceeds to any other road, will he please state to the committee what he means by commutation tickets, and at what rates these are issued as compared with the regular tariff rates?

Mr. HOLMAN. They are much lower.

Mr. TYNER. Will my colleague state how much lower they are?

Mr. HOLMAN. I will furnish my colleague the table, which will give the information he asks. They are much lower.

The mail is carried four times a day, and I have made the computation on the prices of the tickets for travelers passing over the road, the year round, four times a day. I have put the mail on the one hand and the travel of the people of the country on the other on exactly the same footing. Now, sir, under the old rates, the rates of 1872, when the amount was $172,000, the railroad company was almost as well paid for the transportation of your mails as for the transportation of passengers, assuming the cars to be filled to their utmost capacity. But by this extraordinary legislation of last year and the action of the Post-Office Department upon it you have furnished facilities to the roads for increasing their profits of transportation above anything that has transpired up to this hour in the railroad traffic of the country. I shall publish with these remarks a table I have before me, showing the increased compensation to a large number of companies.

Now, Mr. Chairman, my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has called my attention to a letter which I shall ask to be read, as indicating an extraordinary combination to effect just such a result as I have attempted to set forth, and which may or may not be at the root of this extraordinary increase in the amount of compensation paid to these corporations; and I trust, for the honor of the country, that it may be shown that this excessive increase of expenditure has not resulted from the conspiracy against your Treasury indicated by this letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Confidential.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 11, 1871.

DEAR SIR: In view of the inadequate compensation to railroad companies for transportation of mails, fixed by law, and the apparent necessity for systematic proceeding to effect an increase, a movement looking to this end was begun about a year ago by leading railroad men, and is now so far developed as to insure the hearty co-operation of the chief officers of railroads representing more than half of the whole amount paid to railroad companies for such service, and it only remains to hear from the other roads when active work can be commenced. It would have been much more satisfactory if the writer could have conferred with all the chief officers of railroad companies interested, but the large number to visit, and the time it would necessarily occupy, makes it impossible, and I am therefore compelled to submit the plan through correspondence, and to refer you to those railroad officers who have been conferred with, if this does not sufficiently commend itself to your mind for immediate action. The plan is to effect the passage of an act increasing the present compensation, without regard to existing contracts, 50 per cent. To accomplish this, it is thought it will require 33⅓ per cent. of the increase for one year, 3⅓ per cent. of which is to be advanced to meet contingent expenses, and the balance to be paid when the act becomes a law.

I inclose herewith a statement showing the amount received by your company, with the contemplated increase of 50 per cent., and the amount of 3⅓ per cent. to be advanced on such increase, (for which a draft on New York payable to my order may be remitted,) also, a circular letter which will partially explain the plan of operation, to be signed and returned to me for the amount to be paid, contingent on the passage of the act. With this action, and a determination on the part of the chief officers of railroad companies to personally aid in such manner as they may deem proper through local members, I regard the passage of the act as a certainty. It is desirable that you reply at once to this, and if the proposition is accepted, to further communicate with me, giving names of such persons (as soon as they can be ascertained) as will of your own knowledge support the measure. I inclose the names of some of the prominent men who have already entered into the arrangement, any of whom you can correspond with on the subject should you desire further information as to the feasibility of the plan, or my fitness for the undertaking. All communications on the subject should be strictly confidential, as any publicity may cause defeat.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

GILES A. SMITH.

ISAAC HINCKLEY, Esq.,
President Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad,
Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

Mr. HOLMAN. It will be remembered that Giles A. Smith had a short time before the date of this letter resigned the office of Second Assistant Postmaster General, and that this letter was laid before the Senate by Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, on the 6th day of March, 1872, having accidentally fallen into the hands of an honest man. This letter, with the list of names attached to it, appears in the proceedings of the Senate, of the 6th of March, 1872. The list which the Clerk has read are the names of the persons referred to as having acquiesced in the arrangement proposed by the writer of this extraordinary letter. The country was informed of the fact, at the time, that the writer of this letter had long been in the Post-Office Department, holding the office of Second Assistant Postmaster-General, high in the confidence of that Department, and the fact was brought out that he resigned his office and entered upon this extraordinary conspiracy of working up legislation under which the Post-Office Department might increase 50 per cent. the profits of the transportation of the mails by the railroad corporations, and the proposition made by him to those companies involved, not in obscure terms but expressly, the use of vast sums of money in molding legislation in the interest of these corporations and to rob the people. Considered in every light it was the most infamous conspiracy to rob the Treasury ever brought to light in this country, and the fact of its exposure seemed to promise that the scheme should fail. In the list of names of railroad presidents who Smith alleged had entered upon this enterprise to subordinate Congress and the Post-Office Department to this scheme of plunder is that of Jay Gould, president of the railroad company whose annual profits out of your Treasury were increased from $122,675 to $323,595 under an act passed within fifteen months after the letter was written.

May not the country well demand an explanation of this extraordinary transaction? Is this House willing that these parties shall enjoy in peace the fruits of their conspiracy? If happily, in spite of the facts that appear, this increase was attributable to other causes than a corrupt conspiracy, does not this House owe it to the country to make that fact appear? And yet a bill in the discussion of which such facts as these may be shown, and to which explanations are demanded, must pass this House with half a minute allowed for debate, and no explanation is to be offered to what seems to be a most corrupt and deliberate fraud!

No member of the House would feel more gratified than I shall if any explanation can be made of this matter. I submit to the House at this point a schedule embracing a number of these railroad contracts, in which it is shown that almost every company that assented to the proposition of Giles A. Smith obtained an increase on the contract prices for transporting the mails. (See table on next page.)

When Giles A. Smith wrote that letter a bill was pending to empower the Post-Office Department to increase the contract prices for carrying mails by the railroads. That bill did not finally pass until the month of June, 1872. It was while that bill was pending in Congress that this letter was written, and it would seem that that letter was written with a view to that measure then pending. The bill passed Congress. It was not carried into effect for the reason that Congress failed to make the necessary appropriations. That bill was afterward repealed when the act of March 3, 1873, was enacted, under which the results proposed by Giles A. Smith were substantially and virtually attained. The question is, was it through that combination that these results were reached? I hope that my colleague will be able to explain this consistently with the honor of the country and the integrity of the public service; that he will show that notwithstanding that extraordinary combination to increase the profits of these corporations at the public expense and this corrupt proposition in which a large body of railroads is alleged to have concurred, and notwithstanding there is an increase of their compensation corresponding substantially to the proposed plan, that still, in spite of all these unfortunate appearances, neither our legislation nor the Post-Office Department were influenced by other than proper and legitimate motives in enlarging the compensation of these corporations so much beyond former amounts and almost double the compensation paid for the same services when our currency was greatly under its present value.

There is no Department of our Government subject to such pressure in financial transactions as the Post-Office Department, growing out of the fact that the railroad companies are able to act as a unit in influencing if possible the action of that Department from which so large a portion of their revenues is derived. And when it was known they had entered into this combination with Giles A. Smith in 1871 it was remarkable that any approach toward the consummation of their purpose should have been permitted. Congress, this House and the Senate, should not have subjected this Department of the Government to a pressure which it was shown was intended to be made for the purpose of increasing the profits of these corporations. It was well known that their mail contracts were already one of their most profitable employments. This combination of corporations, with such men as Jay Gould at the head of it and with a dishonest public official who had retired from his trust co-operating with them, it would seem were absolutely giving out edicts for measures beneficial to themselves, which the national Congress and the Departments of the Government were to register at their will, and carry on to consummation by laws and contracts.

Are these corporations to be permitted always to control legislation, dictate measures to the Government, and dictate contracts to the Departments?

There is no Department of your Government where there should be such constant scrutiny as in this Department, which is brought absolutely and immediately under the influence of this vast railroad power. The utmost vigilance of Congress and the highest integrity in that Department is absolutely demanded to resist their encroachments and questionable measures. And I am the more astonished, when I remember the vigilance of gentlemen in trying to protect their constituents from the extortion of these corporations by the passage of a law to limit the cost of transportation, that they should not exercise the same degree of vigilance in trying to restrain the cupidity of those corporations in their assault upon your Treasury through the Post-Office Department.

This Department should be most economically administered, for upon its economy depends your being able to reach every neighborhood in the whole land by increasing the number of your mail-routes and post-offices, and so as to bring intelligence and information in the business and social life of our people to every home. And yet it is not administered with economy. An army of unemployed employés eat up your appropriations, and the railroad corporations appropriate to themselves the millions in excess of reasonable compensation which should either remain in your Treasury or be used to open up new postal facilities for our people.

If by inconsiderate and hasty legislation we have placed our Treasury through the Post-Office Department under the control of this mercenary combination of corporations, a remedy should be promptly applied. If a most corrupt conspiracy against the integrity of the public service to plunder the Treasury has in fact been consummated, the conspirators should not be permitted to enjoy in peace the fruits of their dishonest practices, and if in fact there was a good and justifiable reason for this greatly enlarged compensation to these corporations for postal services, that fact should be made to appear, and in any event these overgrown corporations should not be permitted to extort subsidies from the public Treasury beyond reasonable compensation through the appliance of the legislation of Congress, dictating their own terms for services rendered the country.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the gentleman allow me an inquiry?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I think it altogether probable that we are paying too much to the railroad companies for mail service, but the gentleman must know that legislation prescribing rates would not be appropriate on an appropriation bill. Now, what is the remedy which my friend proposes in case the railroad companies should refuse to carry the mails for such rates as in his judgment would be proper? I have a remedy which I think might be applied; but I am not apprised whether my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and gentlemen on that side of the Chamber who entertain the views he does would agree to it. I would prescribe rates; what is the remedy of my friend from Indiana?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly the remedy proposed by the gentleman from Ohio is the correct one, to prescribe a rate. That is the duty and within the power of Congress.

Congress has no right to leave on the statute-book a law under which a Department may give exorbitant subsidies to corporations. Such an act as that of 1845 leaving discretion in the Post-Office Department, was well enough in those days of economy and simplicity in Government, and before corporate monopolies had aspired to control Government and seize upon the Treasury; but now, sir, Congress must prescribe reasonable rates for the postal service and repeal the grasping cupidity of these corporations.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Does not my friend know that very many of the gentlemen on his side of the Chamber have voted at this session of Congress to deny that power?

Mr. HOLMAN. This question has never yet been discussed before the House. But no gentleman on this side of the House is opposed to limiting the rates for postal service. The vice of the act of 1873 was that it fixed exorbitant rates and left such a latitude of extraordinary power in the hands of those upon whom the pressure of these railroad corporations would be directed. It was the duty of Congress to impose a restriction on the rates. The old rates were perhaps reasonable; the new are exorbitant and without justification or excuse.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will my friend from Indiana vote for a proposition directly prescribing rates; and if so, how many other gentlemen on his side of the Chamber will he get to vote with him?

Mr. HOLMAN. Why, sir, upon a proposition to prescribe rates for transportation of the mails, no gentleman would refuse to vote in the affirmative unless he acted in the interest of these corporations. No gentleman on this side of the House will hesitate to limit the rates to be paid corporations for transporting the mails.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, in the absence of any explanation from the chairman of the committee with reference to this bill, I have risen more for the purpose of seeking information than to criticise its details. A standing appropriation bill in this House is generally one of great mystery to the large body of the members. It always appropriates vast sums of money, and upon the face of the bill itself is exceedingly vague and indefinite as to the purposes and objects for which the proposed appropriations are to be made. This is especially the case with the present bill. It covers but a very few pages, but aggregates between thirty-five and thirty-six million dollars. It appropriates $16,000,000 in one paragraph for one purpose, and $6,000,000 in another paragraph for another purpose—all indefinitely expressed and in regard to which I think we should have some information.

I have risen therefore rather for the purpose of making an inquiry than anything else. I desire to know why it is that although the Postmaster-General in his annual report sent in at the beginning of this Congress told us that he should require but $33,929,912 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, this bill appropriates largely in excess of the amount he asks for; the appropriation being in the aggregate $35,653,391? I would like to know why it is that though the Postmaster-General in his report estimates the deficiency of receipts as compared with expenditures at $4,636,363, this bill proposes to appropriate for this deficiency $5,634,842—an excess of $1,400,000 beyond what the Postmaster-General told us he would require? If these items of increase are in consequence of any change of the law, I hope some gentleman will rise here and explain the effect of the new legislation under which it is attempted to defend some of these extraordinary appropriations. Although in 1868 we appropriated for the whole service of the Post-Office Department but $22,730,592, there has been under this economical republican administration, as defended by my colleague [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS] at the close of the debate yesterday on the moiety question, a gradual increase; so that in 1869 the amount had risen to $23,698,000; in 1870 to $23,998,837; in 1871 to $24,390,104; in 1872 to $26,658,192; and now in 1874 the amount reaches $35,653,000.

Now, sir, I want some gentleman who is familiar with the practical administration of this Department—some defender of the party who placed this Administration in power, and I hold that party responsible for every act of that Administration—I want some gentleman, my distinguished colleague, [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS,] or the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. GARFIELD,] or the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TYNER] who fathers this bill on this occasion, to explain to the House this most remarkable increase of expenditures in the Post-Office Department.

Sir, it is not my purpose to repeat what has been alleged upon this floor in reference to certain fraudulent contracts made by that Department. It is not my purpose to refer to the exposition made by the gentleman who now holds the position of chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. DAWES] in reference to an important contract in which that Department is very seriously implicated. Nor do I desire to refer, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has just done, to this notorious entrance of straw-bidding by which contracts have been finally awarded to men largely in excess of other bona fide bidders. I make no allegations here except those I make by reading from the records, from official documents, and I leave this committee and the country to judge for themselves the why and the wherefore of this extraordinary increase of expenditure.

But, sir, my friend and colleague [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS] yesterday told the House his party always weeded out their own wrongdoers; that it was the only political party which ever existed that at all times and under all circumstances excluded from its councils and participation in administration of the Government those who were detected and known to have done wrong. Were I permitted on this occasion to read from the minutes of the Committee on Ways and Means in reference to the investigation into the Sanborn contracts, and to the Jayne swindling contracts, I would show that sixty officers of the New York custom-house were reported officially to the Secretary of the Treasury as being in collusion with fraudulent importers. Notwithstanding the official notification, and the testimony being furnished the Secretary of the Treasury, those men are in office there to-day. And Judge Davis, a present judge of the supreme court of the State of New York, told us that while district attorney he himself had finally succeeded in getting the removal of a custom-house officer in consequence of this collusion, and that the republican State treasurer appointed that same man within thirty days to a place of trust as assistant treasurer of the State of New York.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS rose.

Mr. WOOD. I do not yield to that gentleman.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. If my colleague will state——

Mr. WOOD. I refuse to yield. I have stated the truth and I challenge the gentleman to produce any record to the contrary.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour has expired.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. It was a democratic treasurer.

Mr. WOOD. It was the republican treasurer.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. It was the liberal treasurer nominated by the democratic party.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour has expired.

Mr. WOOD. I thought I had the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana in charge of the bill yielded the floor with the understanding that at the expiration of an hour he should have the remaining half an hour in which to close debate.

Mr. WOOD. He distinctly stated that he would yield the floor and the Chair could recognize whomsoever he pleased.

The CHAIRMAN. But only during the hour.

Mr. WOOD. He yielded indefinitely.

The CHAIRMAN. No; only for an hour.

Mr. WOOD. I ask whether the gentleman from Indiana can yield the floor and resume it at pleasure?

Mr. RANDALL. When the House fixed the time they were not aware of these astounding statements. The committee, however, can control the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana was entitled to the floor. He yielded with the understanding that at the expiration of an hour he would resume the floor for the half an hour remaining for general debate in which to close. Under that arrangement the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TYNER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WOOD. If the Chair so determines, I suppose I must resume my seat.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the rule to be, the gentleman from Indiana having yielded his time with the understanding the Chair has indicated, now that the hour has expired he is entitled to the floor for half an hour.

Mr. WOOD. Our time on this side of the House always expires, but on the other side always continues.

Mr. TYNER. Will the gentleman from New York state how much longer he desires to address the House?

Mr. WOOD. I will take all the time the gentleman will yield me and the liberality of the committee will give me.

Mr. TYNER. Will he be satisfied with five minutes?

Mr. WOOD. I should like to have ten.

Mr. TYNER. Well, I will give the gentleman ten minutes.

Mr. WOOD. Very well, sir. I will state in addition, following the thought I had in my mind at the moment I was interrupted, it was also in testimony that another of Mr. Jayne's tools, used by him for governmental and his own purpose, who was charged with and convicted of theft, was put in the money-order office in the city of New York in three days after he was removed from the custom-house in the city of New York.

I will state moreover, in reply to the assertions of my colleague yesterday with reference to the action of this committee, by which he endeavored to give the republican party and the republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means the exclusive credit for the introduction of this moiety bill, that on the 17th February—and I hold in my hand the minutes of the committee, which, under the rules, I do not feel at liberty to use, but on this occasion I feel at liberty to say this much—on the 17th of February, 1874, a committee from the Chamber of Commerce of the City of New York and a committee from the Board of Trade of Boston were in attendance on our committee and requested to be heard in favor of the repeal of the moiety laws. On that occasion my colleague was foremost in his objection to their being heard. They were told to go away and return in a fortnight. But, sir, on the 17th of February, the same day, Mr. Jayne was admitted and gave his statement and his testimony, slandering and abusing the mercantile interests of which my colleague is now the defender and the assumed exponent of their wishes and interests. Well, sir, as I have said, when these men were turned away from the doors of that committee, after coming many hundred miles to have their grievances stated, Mr. Jayne was admitted. I hold in my hand the official report saying that he appeared before the committee on the 17th of February, the same day, and made an argument in favor of the continuance of this system of moieties and denouncing and traducing and vilifying the character of the most eminent merchants that ever lived in this country.

Therefore, sir, it will not do for that gentleman in his own behalf, or in behalf of his friends or his party, to make any attempt to give to themselves the credit for the repeal of the law which this House on yesterday, so far as it was concerned, saw proper to repeal. Sir, if that gentleman's friends whom he represents here in the city of New York and in the New York custom-house had their way, as they may yet have in the other branch of Congress, this bill would never become a law; and this plunder would continue to go into the pockets of the men who use it for partisan purposes in carrying the republican party into power in the State of New York.

These, sir, are facts. And in the discussion yesterday I elevated this subject as I supposed far above partisan considerations. My friend from Kentucky made no political reference in his remarks. It remained for that gentleman in the last moments of the time to which debate was limited, at the expiration of the hour when he knew we were not allowed to reply under the rules of the House, to endeavor to give himself and his party the exclusive credit for that which he and his party have been preventing from passing through either House of Congress for six years.

Sir, according to a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury it appears that from 1862 to 1869 the whole amount of forfeitures that went into the hands of these informers was $224,905.78; but from 1869 until the 30th of November, 1863, that gentleman's friends and political associates in the city of New York received $491,342.26. I have the official document here, and I quote correctly from it. It says that they received $491,000 in four and a half years of service, while in the administration of Mr. Lincoln and the administration of Mr. Johnson in the preceding seven years, the amount received was $224,905.78. Therefore, sir, in view of that document—I quote from Executive Document No. 124—in view of the record, it will not do for that gentleman to say that his party and this Administration have done nothing else but what the preceding administrations have done. I say by their vigilance, by their activity, not in collecting the revenue and putting it into the Treasury, but collecting it and putting it into their own pockets, they have taken within four years three times as much as was taken in the seven years preceding under the previous administrations. Sir, I admire the moral courage of any gentleman who will rise on this floor to talk of the probity and public integrity and official devotion to the interests of the people of the party in power. No party and no administration in the history of any country, not alone of this country, but in the history of any country within the range of my reading, ancient or modern, have ever in so short a period shown so utter a degeneracy and deterioration, not only in the efficiency and execution of the laws, but in the integrity with which those laws are administered, as have the party and Administration which my colleague has attempted to justify.

Mr. TYNER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS.]

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, so long as the democratic party recognize my colleague from the city of New York [Mr. WOOD] as their representative upon this floor, we have a right to accept him as the representative of the democratic party. He was their candidate for Speaker in this House. He is the gentleman who comes here to talk to us about morality and about honor. He referred to a State treasurer of New York; that State treasurer was Mr. Thomas Raines. I am not here to bandy questions with my colleague. The record will show whether or not he was a liberal State treasurer; whether or not he was nominated by the democratic party for treasurer of the State of New York and after a defalcation in his office as such treasurer. If we are to make a comparison of records between parties we are quite willing. The gentleman from New York challenges the republican party, and upon this floor is the representative of his own party. That fact embodies the whole case. He has chosen to refer to certain proceedings in the Committee on Ways and Means where a postponement occurred of a hearing. The gentleman may have forgotten—my other colleagues upon the committee have not forgotten—that the postponement was made at the request of the representatives from the Chamber of Commerce of New York and the Board of Trade of Boston.

Never, Mr. Chairman, has an investigation been more patient; never have the doors been opened wider to an investigation of alleged wrongs. I am not the one who has introduced partisan allusions on this floor with reference to moieties or with reference to any other of the matters in investigation before the Committee on Ways and Means. I hold in my hand the RECORD of March 10, including an elaborate speech of my colleague from the city of New York, in which, although the subject under discussion was the repeal of the tax on matches, he chose to discuss the subject of moieties and other subjects, and went on to say, "I have thus briefly presented some of the errors for which the republican party is responsible."

My other colleague upon the committee, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] yesterday chose to hold the republican party responsible for the system of moieties. It fell to me to close the debate upon the bill which was then pending. I could do no less than to refer to the most marked suggestions which had been made. I could do no less than appeal to the truth of history, and say that this system of moieties came down to us from 1799; that until 1867 the distribution of moieties was made by the collector without report to the Secretary of the Treasury for his revision, and that under that system nobody could know what was done, and that it was a republican Congress that made this distribution depend upon the action of the Secretary of the Treasury and brought it to the light. It was a republican Congress, upon the motion of a republican member, that called for all information with reference to these abuses. It was a committee including a majority of republicans that examined into these abuses; but I intimated no word yesterday, and should have intimated no word to-day, that the members of that committee, democrats as well as republicans, were not vigilant for bringing about this reform.

I repeat, and I challenge contradiction, that the republican party is the only party in history that ever had the courage to seek abuses in its own ranks and to strive to reform them. We may not achieve everything; but we will do the best we can.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like five minutes to say a few words in reply to the gentleman from New York as to who is responsible for the moiety legislation complained of.

Mr. TYNER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RANDALL. I charge here, and I have the RECORD before me, that the Republican party almost solidly placed on the appropriation bill by their votes the very clause under which Mr. Sanborn has been allowed to go abroad carrying on his operations without right or reason. Moreover, I charge that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] and the gentleman from New York himself [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS] cast their votes in favor of the Sanborn contract law.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. So did Mr. NIBLACK, of Indiana.

Mr. RANDALL. I cannot help that; there were some exceptions on each side.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. It does the gentleman from Indiana no wrong to say he voted for it.

Mr. NIBLACK. I can take care of myself upon that question.

Mr. RANDALL. There was almost a solid democratic vote cast against that clause of the law which authorized the Sanborn contract, while on the other side almost a solid republican vote inserted it.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania state that the vote was not on that proposition, but upon the report of the committee of conference on the appropriation bill?

Mr. RANDALL. I will state that there were two votes. When the conference report was first presented the issue was made by Mr. HALE, of Maine, and myself against that report, because it contained that clause authorizing the Sanborn contract, and the House rejected that report by one majority (80 ayes and 81 noes) because it contained that clause. On the motion of some gentleman in the House, I think the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] the report of the committee of conference was recommitted to the same gentlemen, and after recruiting in this House they came in in a day or two afterward and passed the report by ten majority, (ayes 87, nays 77,) and I find that upon both votes the gentleman from New York [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS] voted to sustain the report, and so did the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. If the gentleman will state that the vote was on a conference report that included many topics, he will state the exact truth.

Mr. RANDALL. I say that we rejected the report in the first instance on the very ground that it contained this clause, and I deny that the Administration is entirely responsible for this system. The Congress of the United States, this House and the Senate, voted the Sanborn contract into the law with their eyes open, for Mr. HALE, of Maine, did all he could, and I did all I could as an humble member of this House, to enlighten them; and if I had been a prophet my language and predictions at that time could not have been more fully fulfilled than the result has shown. The republican party voted deliberately, almost en masse, in favor of inserting the Sanborn-contract clause in the bill. Now, I ask the gentleman from New York who is responsible, and whether he can with any truth or propriety charge that the democratic party is in any manner responsible for anything that has occurred under that law?

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] by saying that a republican member of this House inaugurated the movement for the cancellation of the law; that the republican majority has sustained that movement, and that a republican committee has reported a bill for its repeal.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir, when you could not help it. You allowed the law to stand for two years. The whole thing is in a nut-shell. Your law robbed the merchants of the country to the extent of $4,000,000 and more, and acquired for the Treasury of the United States only $250,000.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. The members of the committee without distinction of party unanimously——

Mr. RANDALL. I do not wish to detract anything from the honorable gentleman, nor from his good zeal. But I go for the truth of history, and have stated who put this law on the statute-book. You never attempted to repeal it until a storm of public indignation unprecedented swept over this land.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to say in regard to some other things——

Mr. TYNER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] ought to remember that he has occupied five minutes, and I have but ten minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish but a few minutes.

Mr. TYNER. I would be very glad to accommodate the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] but I cannot. To so much as has been said in the progress of this debate about matters in nowise connected with the Post-Office Department and the postal service, I have no reply whatever to make. Gentlemen who have different views on this subject may settle them for themselves. Nor will I attempt to reply to all that has been said even in regard to matters connected with the postal service, but to only so much as in my judgment should be considered by this committee.

I pay my respects first to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] who calls upon me for an explanation of why it is that the bill reported from the Committee on Appropriations exceeds in amount the estimates of the Post-Office Department. I beg leave to remind that gentleman of the fact that he has either intentionally failed to call attention to all the estimates of the Post-Office Department, or omitted to turn over to the page following the one from which he quoted to ascertain that additional estimates had been made.

On the first page of the report of the Postmaster-General will be found the estimated expenditures for the year ending June 30, 1875, $33,929,912, the precise amount to which the gentleman called the attention of the committee. But he failed to call their attention to the further fact that upon the following page there was an estimate for $1,225,000 to cover the cost of subsidies that were allowed under specific law to several steamship lines; and that in addition the Postmaster-General asked for an appropriation of $950,000 to cover the cost of postage on the correspondence of his own Department, making in all an aggregate of estimates of $36,104,912; while the bill of which I have charge proposes to appropriate only $35,653,391, or $451,521 less than the Postmaster-General asked for. That is a sufficient answer to the gentleman from New York.

In addition to that I will say upon this subject that the only item of appropriation that the committee has increased over and above the estimate of the Postmaster-General was the single item of inland transportation, amounting in all to the sum of $292,000. That increase was recommended because the readjustment of pay to railroad companies, under the law that took effect on the 1st day of July last, indicates that the expenditure of the Department for that branch of the service would be increased over $1,600,000. In addition to that, when the estimate was made up for inland transportation the Postmaster-General had reason to believe that new railroads would not be built and operated to the extent of more than thirty-five hundred miles; while the data which was placed in his hands afterward indicated that six thousand miles would not cover the additional number of miles of railroad service in the United States.

I wish now to call the attention of the committee, perhaps not very concisely or consecutively, to this question of inland transportation. When I say to gentlemen that the business of the Post-Office Department, its resources and expenditures, are increasing at the rate of 10 per cent. every year, or doubling every ten years, they may form some idea of the necessity of increasing the appropriations for the support of that Department. The main item of increase in the bill, inland transportation, notwithstanding this enormous increase under the law of the last Congress, is estimated to be only 7 per cent. increase, while the entire business of the Department is increasing at the rate of 10 per cent. every year. Gentlemen need only refer to the table in my hand, and which I will furnish to any one who may desire to see it, to discover this fact: that in 1868, when the country had almost entirely recovered from the effects of the war, the compensation to railroad companies was $4,107,126, while in 1873, the last year for which we have an official report, it was $7,257,196, an increase of $3,180,070, or over 80 per cent. from 1868 to 1874.

When I say that this compensation was fixed for railroad companies in 1868 under precisely the same law and upon the same basis for the compensation of railroads as controlled and guided the Department in 1874, gentlemen will see that the increase of the railroad service in this country at the rate of 80 per cent. between those two periods is a sufficient answer to everything that has been said upon that subject.

A word now in regard to some matters that have been presented by my colleague, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. KENDALL rose.

Mr. TYNER. I cannot yield, because I have only three minutes left.

Mr. KENDALL. I only wish to ask——

Mr. TYNER. I would be very glad to yield, but I cannot.

Mr. KENDALL. I would like to ask a single question before the gentleman takes his seat.

Mr. TYNER. I ask the Chair to protect me in my right to the floor, for I have yielded almost the whole of my time to gentlemen on the opposite side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TYNER] must be permitted to proceed without interruption.

Mr. TYNER. Now, sir, if there is anything wrong in the compensation to the railroads of the country for carrying the mails, the Postmaster-General and the Post-Office Department are not responsible. I hold here the law passed by Congress on the 3d of March, 1873, increasing the compensation of the railroads—a law passed after the fullest and most complete debate. Under that law the Postmaster-General cannot pay a single railroad company for a single pound of mail that it does not carry over its line. If there has been an enormous increase in the payment to railroad companies, Congress is alone responsible for it, not the Post-Office Department.

I am sorry that I have not time to pursue this subject further; but I want now to call attention (without stopping to read it) to the circular which was sent out by Giles A. Smith, formerly Second Assistant Postmaster-General, to several railroad companies of the country, and which was signed by some of their officers, agreeing to give him a certain percentage if he should succeed in getting an increase of their compensation for carrying the mails. I want my colleague to remember that that circular was exposed in the Senate on the 6th of March, 1872, and that on next day certain railroad officers notified the Senate and the country that they had not signed that circular, and therefore were not parties to that contemplated fraud. One year after that exposure, the Senate and the House being well acquainted with the facts, Congress passed a law increasing the compensation of the railroad companies, and I know, sir, that not a gentleman who voted for that increase was influenced by that circular.

I wish to submit one further consideration, which I think will convince gentlemen that the compensation to the railroad companies is not so extravagant as they have been inclined to think. I hold in my hand a calculation which I have prepared with a great deal of care and which has been submitted to the proper officials of the Post-Office Department and by them pronounced strictly correct. This calculation will show the precise cost of carrying mail matter over the railroads of the country. As I am admonished my time is about to expire, I can only take a single instance—the New York and Erie road. The compensation to that road is $575 per mile annually for carrying over their line every day thirty-five thousand pounds of mail matter. It will thus be seen that the mail service of that line costs the Post-Office Department just five one-thousandths of one cent per pound; and the compensation of this road is as great as that of any other railroad in the United States. It costs the Post-Office Department just five cents to carry one pound of mail matter—letters, newspapers, and everything else—one thousand miles over that New York and Erie road. Can a passenger travel at a less rate? Can you ship flour for less? Can you ship pig-iron for less? I undertake to say, if I had the time, that I could demonstrate that the railroad companies are receiving less per pound for the mails they carry than they do for second-class or even third-class freight transported in box-cars, while they furnish in some instances palaces, as it were, for the conveyance of route agents and postal clerks, and also carry free over their lines all the officials of the Department who are embraced in the contract.

In connection with the New York and Erie road, I beg leave to say that previous to the increase of compensation to the railroads under the act of 1873 that line was carrying an immense amount of mail matter for which it received no pay. I am not standing here as the advocate of railroad companies. I do say, however, that until we shall change the entire relation existing between these corporations and the Government, we have no right to impose upon them labor without paying them for it. The increase of mails over the New York and Erie road (it being the great funnel through which the city of New York empties its vast amount of mail matter going to the West) represents simply the increase that is going on from day to day, and from week to week, and from month to month in the carrying of the mails.

Now, sir, although the discussion is not pertinent here, (nor will it be when we take up the bill by items, inasmuch as we have passed the item for inland transportation,) yet I beg leave to ask whether any gentleman on this floor will rise and say that the postal facilities of this country are excessive? Is there any gentleman here who will say that the mail facilities now enjoyed by his constituents are greater than he or they desire? If so, I want him to "show his hand" here now. The increase in this appropriation bill as to every item save the one for inland transportation (which extraordinary increase I have already explained) is at a less percentage than the growth in the business of the Post-Office Department from year to year.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate on this bill having closed, the bill will now be read by clauses for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of mail-route messengers, $160,000.

Library University of Wisconsin

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend by striking out the word "sixty" in the clause just read. I make this motion for the purpose of enabling me to say a few words to which I would like to have the attention of the committee. I have carefully analyzed this bill and compared it with the last post-office appropriation bill for the current fiscal year which was enacted into a law about a year ago. I find by that comparison there are many differences in the amount of the respective items. There are in this bill eighteen items in which there is an increase varying in amounts. The first increase is inland-mail service and rises to $1,559,980; the other increases vary. The bill shows an increase in these eighteen items of $3,298,421 over what was appropriated last year for like purposes. I find, on the other hand, there are ten items in which there are reductions aggregating $62,243, showing throughout this bill that there is a net increase of $3,236,178. I do not include the increase which is asked for in the third section, because that is a contingent increase, and amounts to $238,240. The others are an absolute increase.

As we go from item to item, I will direct the attention of the gentleman having the bill in charge, so he may give us a satisfactory explanation in regard to them, if he can do so. We have already passed from the first item, in which there is an increase over last year. For inland-mail transportation, in that item, there is an increase over last year of $1,559,980. There is also in the item for mail messengers an increase of $36,000. In the item for the pay of route agents there is an increase of $44,000. Now I come to the item on which we now are, for the pay of mail-route messengers, $160,000. This shows a decrease of $11,265.

But the most important item of increase is in reference to the pay of postmasters, in which the increase is $775,000. While on that subject, I desire to direct the attention of the House to Miscellaneous Document No. 157, in which it is shown there are quite a number of postmasters who receive a salary of $4,000 a year. For instance, the postmaster at Akron, Ohio, receives a salary of $4,000 a year. He employs three clerks. The receipts of his office are only $15,000. The postmaster at Central City, Colorado, receives $4,000, while the receipts of that office do not exceed $7,000. At Central City, Colorado, while the whole average receipts are not over $7,000 a year, the pay of the postmaster is $4,000. Compare that with what is the condition of things in other places. Take my own city of Philadelphia. In Central City, Colorado, while the postmaster employs but one clerk, the postmaster in Philadelphia employs about three hundred and seventy-five clerks, and yet the postmaster in Philadelphia gets no more salary than the one at Central City.

There is manifest injustice in this, Mr. Chairman, and I wish publicly to call the attention of the Postmaster-General to the necessity for a revision of this law as regards the salaries of postmasters. It is his duty to indicate some way in which we can get rid of this injustice. If I am not incorrectly informed, and I do not think I step beyond the bounds of propriety in speaking of it, the gentleman himself has indicated a plan whereby more than four or five hundred thousand dollars can be saved to the Government by a review or revision of this subject of the salaries of postmasters. I hope the gentleman will persevere until we have such an amendment to the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of postmasters, $6,500,000.

Mr. RANDALL. We appropriated for this item last year $5,575,000. Here is an apparent increase of $775,000. I should like to have some explanation why that increase is necessary.

Mr. TYNER. Mr. Chairman, the increase in the compensation of postmasters in the year 1872 over 1873 was 3.62 per cent.; and in 1874 over 1873, 0.81 per cent. The estimate for 1875 over 1874 is 13.53 per cent.; a very considerable increase as gentlemen can see. Under the law, as the gentleman is aware, the Postmaster-General has to make a biennial readjustment of the salaries of postmasters. It is estimated by the Post-Office Department, undoubtedly with great accuracy, this readjustment of the salaries of postmasters will require this very considerable increase in the percentage of their compensation.

The increase of salaries of postmasters is simply an indication of the growth of the postal service and of the business within the delivery of the several post-offices throughout the United States. If there were no biennial readjustment of the postmaster's salaries this year the ordinary increase would only be asked for.

Mr. RANDALL. Under existing laws the Postmaster-General has the right to readjust these salaries to which I have made allusion, these $4,000 salaries.

Mr. TYNER. They cannot get more than $4,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to know whether under the existing law in reference to the biennial readjustment of salaries of postmasters power is not conferred upon the Postmaster-General to correct this abuse, about which you or I do not differ at all. The gentleman from Indiana, as I have heard, desires to save the Government, by a plan of readjustment which he has, half a million dollars, while by another plan it has been suggested some $420,000 can be saved.

Mr. TYNER. In reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I would say that the law requires the Postmaster-General to allow certain per centages on the business transacted at each office in the form of salary; and in every instance this is done, and that kind of computation makes up this salary of postmasters in the various offices throughout the country. But I think I know what the gentleman from Pennsylvania is trying to get at. He wants me to say whether or not a classification of salaries might not be made that would save a very considerable amount to the Treasury of the United States. I will say that the Committee on Appropriations instructed me to gather some data on this subject and present to them with a view to asking a suspension of the rules in the House to change the law in regard to the compensation of postmasters in the larger post-offices throughout the country. I got a list of all the postmasters in the United States whose salary exceeded $2,000, and I found that we could make a classification something like this: That we might provide in the law that postmasters in towns and cities whose population did not exceed 20,000 should have a salary of not over $2,000; with a population of 20,000 to 40,000, a salary of $2,500; from 40,000 to 60,000, $3,000; from 60,000 to 86,000, $3,500, and above 80,000, a salary of $4,000; and that the saving would amount to about $440,000. Now, the gentleman wants to know in all probability why we did not report such a law.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to know whether what the gentleman proposes as the result of his investigation could not under existing laws be done by the Postmaster-General, under the power given to him for a biennial rearrangement of salaries?

Mr. TYNER. I think not.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman will see that it is very important that if the Postmaster-General possesses that power he should exercise it at once; and if he does not possess that power we ought to give it to him.

Mr. TYNER. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania desires it, and the committee will bear with me, I will call attention to what is now the law. But I am asked by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] to state the reason why the Committee on Appropriations did not bring in this proposition. Let me answer that very briefly by saying that the committee did not agree to do it. But there is still a better reason than that. The Committee on Appropriations, as I construe their duties, are not required to report to this House changes in existing laws. There is a Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads whose duty it is to report to the House the result of their investigations in regard to all matters appertaining to that committee.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Has the gentleman from Indiana not reported a change of the existing law in regard to the population of cities where letter-carriers should be established?

Mr. TYNER. Yes, sir, we did so; but we also asked the consent of the House before we so reported. The gentleman from Kansas wants to know, I presume, why we reported in favor of a change of that kind. Our object, sir, was to relieve the Postmaster-General from embarrassment and to prevent his being imposed on.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I had hoped that the gentleman would answer that the reason why the committee did not report the proposition of graduating the salaries of postmasters by the population of the cities where they reside was that they had come to the conclusion it was an unjust and unreasonable method of obtaining that object.

Mr. TYNER. I cannot give an answer so broad as that indicated by the gentleman from Massachusetts. You cannot have any general law to provide the basis of compensation to postmasters that will not work hardship in some cases; and the change of the law which I have suggested would have operated hardly in reference to some postmasters. But undoubtedly it would also have given the Treasury of the United States relief to the extent of $400,000. And I desire right here to say that when the proposition in regard to the change of the compensation of postmasters was brought to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations, the principal reason why that committee did not take the matter in hand was that there was a Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, whose duty it was to report any change of law of that kind.

Mr. RANDALL. I think it is due to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to state that they have been recently considering and are now considering that subject. I do not wish to be understood as casting the slightest reflection on the gentleman from Indiana or his committee. The reason he has given is a good one. I wish to draw out from him whether in his judgment the law needs amendment, so that the Postmaster-General might in some such manner as the gentleman proposes equalize the salaries. Gentlemen must see how unjust it is that while the postmaster at Philadelphia should be drawing $4,000 of salary the same amount should be given at a post-office in the Territory of Colorado. The postmaster at Philadelphia gives $300,000 security, while the postmaster at the city in Colorado which I named gives only $10,000 security. In the large cities, such as Philadelphia, New York, Boston, and San Francisco, the salaries ought to be raised in proportion to the service rendered and in proportion to the responsibilities assumed, while these other salaries should be lower in cases where, as far as I see, there is little or no responsibility, and where the post-offices are of little or no benefit to the Post-Office Department in the way of revenue.

Mr. TYNER. I am free to say that there is force in what the gentleman says; but the committee were compelled to deal with the law as they found it.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of clerks for post-offices, $3,250,000.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move to amend that clause by striking out "2" and inserting in lieu thereof "3;" so as to make the amount $3,350,000 instead of $3,250,000.

I understand that the early estimate of the Post-Office Department was for $3,250,000 for this purpose; but I am informed that after the estimates were made the Post-Office Department asked the Committee on Appropriations to increase this amount because of information which came to the Department subsequent to the making up of the estimates. The estimates were necessarily made up from data obtained in April last, so that this item ought to be at least increased $100,000. My own business, representing as I do a large district in the West, with the Post-Office Department is larger than with any other Department of the Government; and I do not agree with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that we should be surprised at the increase of money asked for this Department. We ought to recollect that in the early and also in the latter part of each session of Congress we pass a large bill providing for new mail-routes, and that hence the increase of mail service is very great. Representing as I do a district composed of nineteen counties, I know that as many as five counties in that district within the past three years have been furnished with largely increased mail facilities, and I shall vote for an increase of this appropriation with more readiness than I would vote for an increase of any other appropriation in the bill.

It will usually be found that after the beginning of the fiscal year and within the first few months the amount appropriated for thi item is expended, and persons going to the Department and asking for an increase of mail service after the first six months of the fiscal year will be told that there is no money for the purpose.

Now, it is true that there are many offices where business rapidly increases. I have asked for clerk hire in a number of offices in my district where it was admitted by the Department that there should be $200 or $300 allowed for clerk hire, and yet I was told that the appropriation was entirely exhausted. I say that this amount should be increased, and that in this important respect the business of the Department ought not to be crippled. I understand that the Department has asked for an increase of the appropriation for this item, not formally perhaps, but has asked an increase since the estimate was made, and I hope it will be granted.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope this amendment to increase the appropriation will not be adopted. There is already in this item an increase of $275,000 over what was appropiated for a like purpose last year, which is an increase of between 9 and 10 per cent. I hope the amount will not be increased.

The question was taken on Mr. DUNNELL'S amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 35, noes 50; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. DUNNELL and Mr. RANDALL were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported ayes 27, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For pay of letter carriers, $1,900,000: Provided, That hereafter letter carriers shall not be employed for the free delivery of mail matter in towns and cities whose population within their corporate limits, as shown by the last report of the national census or by any subsequent census taken in pursuance of State statute or by order of the mayor and common council of such town or city, shall be less than twenty thousand; but this proviso shall not affect the free delivery in towns and cities where it is now established.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to know what is the effect of that proviso?

Mr. BIERY. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out all after the word "population" in line 33, to the word "shall" in line 37, inclusive, and insert the following:
Including that of the immediate vicinity receiving its mail matter at the post-offices in such towns and cities not exceeding a radius of one and a half miles.

I desire to insert this amendment so that cities where the corporate limits do not embrace exactly twenty thousand population, but come near to that limit, and the post-offices which supply the surrounding country, may be entitled to the benefit of this carrier system. I understand that there are a number of cities having a population of sixteen, eighteen, or nineteen thousand, and having a dense population immediately surrounding them, which population receives its mail matter at the post-offices of those cities. I think the amendment is unobjectionable if you limit it to a radius of one and a half miles.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Does that cover the gentleman's city?

Mr. BIERY. I am frank enough to say that it would include the city where I reside, but it also carries out my view of the just principle which should be adopted in regard to this matter. If the gentleman from Kansas had a city of this character in his district, I would vote with him to give that city the benefit of the system. I do not see why a city having a population of eighteen thousand, and extending its limits into the surrounding county, should receive the benefits of this carrier delivery, while other cities whose limits are more restricted should be denied the privilege. I think this amendment is a just one and ought to pass.

Mr. TYNER. I desire simply to say a word in response to what has been said, although I presume it is hardly necessary, and at the same time to answer the question which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] rose to ask as to what effect the change in the law will have. Under the law of the last Congress the Postmaster-General was authorized to establish the free-delivery system where the population within the delivery of the post-office was twenty thousand. The Postmaster-General finds himself continually embarrassed by propositions to establish this service in cities that run down as low as ten thousand in population.

The reason why the Committee on Appropriations and the Postmaster-General desire to change the law is simply this, that wherever the population is confined to the corporate limits of a city, it can be definitely ascertained either by the reports of the national census, or by the census taken by the authorities of the State, or by the mayor and common council of the city.

It is merely for the purpose of making this thing precise that the committee propose this change of the law. They also provide that it shall not affect the free-delivery system where it is now established.

Now a word in regard to the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIERY.] If you go outside of the corporate limits of a city, you open up the matter indefinitely. There would be no official authority for taking the census of lanes and roads and alleys or anything of that kind outside of the corporate limits. Therefore it is unquestionably better to confine the law to corporations with definite limits.

The amendment of Mr. BIERY was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For advertising, $80,000: Provided, That hereafter no payment shall be made to any newspaper published in the District of Columbia for advertising any other mail-routes than those in Virginia and Maryland.

[Mr. KENDALL addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. TYNER. Mr. Chairman, it was not necessary for the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. KENDALL] to do anything more than refer me to a single case; all the rest are merely duplicates, so far as the point he is making is concerned. Under the law that existed prior to the last Congress the system of "straw-bidding" was practiced very extensively by mail contractors throughout the whole country. No man ought to be more familiar with that entire system of "straw-bidding" than the gentleman from Nevada, only because he lives in a region of the country where it has been practiced to a very considerable extent. The old law required the Postmaster-General when bids came in in proper form to accept the lowest offer that might be made for a given route.

Mr. KENDALL. Then why, as in several instances I have named, was a contract let for an amount larger than the highest bid which was put in?

Mr. TYNER. I think that if the gentleman will listen a moment I can by taking up a single route show him all the point there is in that matter. Take one case to which he has referred—the route from San Antonio to Waco. These contracts were all made in 1871 and expire on the 30th of June of the current year. They were all made under a law which has since been repealed, Congress having passed a substitute for it last year. Now, sir, in the case of which the gentleman spoke—the route from San Antonio to Waco—the highest bid upon the route was $20,000; the lowest, $1,800. That was for the conveyance of mails three times a week a distance of one hundred and seventy-four miles and back. Every gentleman must know that $1,800 was insufficient to cover even a fraction of the cost. Now, why did this lowest bidder (who happens to be in this case one A. J. Terry) propose to carry the mails on this route for $1,800? Simply because he was there in the capacity of a "straw-bidder;" he was a go-between between some party who desired this contract to be let to him at a large price, and the Post-Office Department. But by the law as construed by the Attorney-General of the United States, upon a submission of the question by the Postmaster-General, the latter was compelled to accept that bid of $1,800. When the contract time arrived, to wit, July 1, 1871, the contractor failed to perform the service; therefore there was at that time no provision for that service. This man Terry had proved to be a mere man of straw, not complying with his contract, and the Post-Office Department was entirely powerless under the law to enforce the contract. The result was that the Postmaster-General was compelled to make a temporary contract for the performance of that service under the law until there could be a readvertisement in accordance with the provisions of the law and a reletting of the contract. The Postmaster-General was not authorized under the law to take the next lowest bidder, who happened in this case to be one Banister, who proposed to do the work for $2,000. Why could not the Postmaster-General take this bid? Because under the provisions of the law the acceptance of the lowest bidder released every other man who had put in a bid. Besides, the failure to perform the contract could not be determined by the Post-Office Department until the arrival of the time at which the contract service was to be commenced. When that time arrived and the lowest bidder did not make his appearance to do the work, the Postmaster-General was then compelled to abandon the route entirely or to let the service upon a temporary contract; and he did the latter, in accordance with a decision of the Attorney-General, whose opinion I have before me.

Mr. RANDALL. I take the floor to move an amendment, and yield to the gentleman from Nevada, [Mr. KENDALL.]

Mr. KENDALL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. TYNER] why it is that the Postmaster-General has not accepted the next lowest bidder, or, if he should fail, the next lowest to him, and so on? I wish also to ask another question. A party putting in a "straw bid" must of course have filed a bond and made a deposit. Now, why were not the bond and deposit forfeited, and thus indemnity obtained by the Government? Above all, why is it the contract should be let for a larger sum than the very highest bid?

Mr. TYNER. If the gentleman will listen awhile instead of propounding questions I will make it clear to him.

Mr. KENDALL. I have listened to the gentleman attentively.

Mr. TYNER. When bids came in under the old law the Postmaster-General, under the provisions of that law, was required to accept the bid of the lowest bidder. He was not authorized to say that the lowest bidder was a straw-bidder, but the law required him to accept the bid no matter for what purpose the lowest bidder put it in. The law bound the Postmaster-General to that lowest bid until the first day of the contract should have arrived, and if the straw-bidder failed to put in his appearance to answer all the conditions of the contract, then the Postmaster-General was required to let the contract for temporary service to any person who would take it. Does the gentleman from Nevada not see what the result was? When the 1st of July, 1871, arrived, and this man Terry failed to put in his appearance thereupon, this route had to be supplied with mail service and the Postmaster-General was compelled to supply that route with mails. Every bidder on the list was released in accordance with the law, and he had to put himself absolutely in the power of the man who had stock and stages and everything ready to do the service.

Mr. KENDALL. Does the gentleman say the contract must be let for a sum higher than that bid by the highest bidder? Does he say that some thirty or thirty-five bidders must be ruled out entirely and the contract go for a price higher than that of the very highest bidder?

Mr. TYNER. It does not matter whether there were thirty-five or thirteen hundred and thirty-five bidders, the Postmaster-General could not compel a single man to accept service, and if he did they would refuse.

If the committee will bear with me I will say these irregularities under what is known as the straw-bidding system resulted in the investigation by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads during the last Congress, and that committee made the report from which the gentleman from Nevada has quoted. The final result was the passage of the law which cut off this system of straw-bidding entirely; and if the gentleman will turn to the contracts let in his own section during the present year he will find no straw-bidding.

Mr. GLOVER. I wish to ask how the information comes to Mr. Sawyer this mail-route is vacant, rather than to the various parties who bid on it?

Mr. TYNER. Suppose the gentleman had been here at that time and stood in the relation of Mr. Sawyer; suppose instead of Mr. Sawyer he had been here ready with his horses and stages to do the service and had said to the Post-Office Department on the 1st of July, 1871, "I will carry your mails for so much and no less," and the law required the Postmaster-General to supply that route at that time, and there was nobody else to do it, I ask if the Postmaster-General's hands would not be tied in that instance?

But we have corrected all that. I will make this statement now to be put upon record, that the Post-Office Department in no single instance within my knowledge, nor in any single instance, unless as temporary service, has awarded a contract to any but the lowest bidder.

Mr. KENDALL. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I move to strike out in line 46 the words "any other," and in line 47 the words "than those in Virginia and Maryland."

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to withhold his amendment until I can renew the one which has been withdrawn by the gentleman from Nevada in order to add a word to that.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I have no objection if I do not lose the floor.

Mr. MAYNARD. I renew the amendment pro forma.

The means suggested by the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. KENDALL] is one well worthy of being understood. I had occasion in connection with the postal service in my own part of the country to know something about this subject some time ago. I found the state of things under the Post-Office Department under the law substantially to be this: A contractor has by some means possession of the route he desires to get. He has of course the stock purchased for running it. It is advertised to be let. He puts in a bid. If he gets it he is satisfied with it. He procures some person of his own craft to put in a bid so ridiculously low that no one bidding would ever go below it. As the law then stood the Postmaster-General must accept that lowest bid, and in accepting that bidder he releases from responsibility all above him. Time goes on until the 1st of July rolls around, when the contract goes into effect. This man of the lowest bid does not appear; he gives no bonds.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee state whether or not, in cases of straw bids, there is not some security or bond given by which the Post-Office Department will be secured in allowing the matter to lie from the time of the bidding to the time that the contract is to be performed?

Mr. MAYNARD. Suppose he gives his bond, which some postmaster certifies to be good, and which turns out to be not worth as much as the white paper on which it is written. The Postmaster-General must then make a temporary contract, but the other bidders may not be in a condition to undertake a temporary service. Meanwhile the old contractor is there with his stock, and is practically master of the situation, and the Postmaster-General must contract with him or let the mail stop.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Does the gentleman know of any case where the bond was prosecuted, or where the postmaster who certified to a sufficiency of the bond was relieved from office on account of his participation in an apparent fraud by certifying to an insufficient bond?

Mr. MAYNARD. I cannot answer that question because I have not sufficient knowledge of the working of the Department. It is an inquiry the answer to which my friend from Maryland can easily obtain by going to the Department. I am speaking of the working of the system and not of its mode of administration. I am not here to defend the administration. They can take care of themselves. I am trying to explain what I found myself to be the working of that law, in order to show how we attempted to remedy it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I would like the gentleman from Tennessee to state what remedy there is. In speaking of this matter a few days ago, I was told that the evils resulting from this system had been cured by a law which now exists. I would like to know how the evil has been cured?

Mr. MAYNARD. I was about to explain that as I understand it. I was about to remark that this contractor who is on the ground can play the game I have indicated over and over again. It was brought to the attention of Congress during the last Congress, as the gentleman from Wisconsin will remember, and an attempt was made by legislation to require that the bidder with his bid should make a deposit of money in order to give assurance of the good faith of his bid. And I believe that the alteration of the law has been practically to break up the system of straw-bidding to which I have alluded, and with the workings of which I have had occasion to be familiar.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ELDREDGE. I rise to oppose the amendment, and I take the floor more for the purpose of getting explanations from the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] than to attempt to enlighten the House from any knowledge I have myself. It would seem that even the law as it now stands does not cure the evil, for if a bond is required and the lowest bid is so exceedingly low that no honest man can come down to it, as suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee, the bond that he is required to give can be no protection, and the other bidders, it seems, if there should happen to be a lower bid than theirs, are excused or relieved by virtue of there being a lower bid.

Mr. MAYNARD. Along with the bond the bidder is required to make a deposit in money.

Mr. ELDREDGE. In what amount? To what extent?

Mr. MAYNARD. I understand that it is a certain percentage upon the old contract. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that my recollection does not go to the details, to the minutiæ of the thing, but to the principle on which we legislated in last Congress. The bidder who fails when his bid is accepted to fulfill his contract, of course forfeits his deposit; and it was supposed by Congress when they legislated in that direction that that was sufficient to deter from this fictitious bidding to which I have referred, and I understand as a matter of fact it has done so.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Practically, as I understand, it has had no such effect. We have the same difficulty on our hands now as then.

Mr. MAYNARD. The cases which have been referred to, I understand, occurred prior to the passage of the law of last Congress.

Mr. ELDREDGE. As I understand, the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. KENDALL] referred to one case which has occurred since that law passed.

Mr. KENDALL. The case I spoke of as having occurred since the passage of the law of last Congress I referred to from memory. It is not in the statement here.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman is not mistaken in his recollection, then in that case the law has not been efficient to accomplish what was intended.

Mr. ELDREDGE. As the law now stands there is no check to hold anybody to a bid below $5,000. Can the gentleman from Tennessee tell us whether the Postmaster-General has covered into the Treasury one dollar from the forfeiture of any bid?

Mr. MAYNARD. I am not aware. I cannot answer the question.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I have made particular inquiry in regard to that, and I have never yet heard of a single dollar being covered into the Treasury or any credit being given for such a forfeiture.

Mr. TYNER. I will answer the gentleman from Wisconsin if I can have order in the committee.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that the disorder it seems to me has been created mostly by the interference with the questions I have desired to propound. I hope he will not charge the disorder upon me. I shall be glad to get information on this point, whether any money has been covered into the Treasury, or whether this whole thing is a system of humbug. Is the Postmaster-General constantly humbugging us with some pretense of carrying out the law, or have deposits been actually made, and forfeitures on account of these fraudulent bids covered into the Treasury?

Mr. MAYNARD. I would answer the question, but the gentleman who has charge of the bill can, of course, answer it much better than I can.

Mr. TYNER. I would say to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] that no part of the certified checks which the law requires to be deposited with the bids over and above the sum of $..0,000 has yet been covered into the Treasury of the United States; because the law only recently took effect, and there have been no forfeitures. The law went into effect last year, and there has not been a single forfeiture. The contracts let this year take effect on the 1st of July, and of course if there are any forfeitures the certified checks will be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I would ask if there is any report to Congress by which we can ascertain whether they are not such certified checks, or by which we can get some information upon this subject so as to let the people know concerning it?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. MAYNARD. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For advertising, $80,000: Provided, That hereafter no payment shall be made to any newspaper published in the District of Columbia for advertising any other mail-routes than those in Virginia and Maryland.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I move to amend that clause by striking out in line 46 the words "any other," and also by striking out in line 47 the words "than those in Virginia and Maryland;" so that it will read:

For advertising, $80,000: Provided, That hereafter no payment shall be made to any newspaper published in the District of Columbia for advertising mail-routes.

I do not know whether this is a copy of an old act or whether it is a new provision put into this bill for the benefit of the press of the District of Columbia. I cannot myself see any reason why the advertisements for mail-routes in the States of Virginia and Maryland should be advertised in the papers of the District of Columbia any more than the advertisements for mail-routes in the State of Pennsylvania.

It was said by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. PURMAN] some days ago that this patronage given to the republican papers down our way was necessary for their support. If that be so, we have three republican papers in my State that can have this patronage without damage to the republican party. But for one I do not see why mail-routes in the State of Virginia should be advertised in the papers of this District. If a man in my State wished to bid for such contracts he would be far more likely to see the advertisement for bids in a paper published in the State than in a paper published here. There is therefore no reason for this provision unless it be a political reason. The papers published here do not circulate any more in the State of Virginia than they do in the State of Nevada, or Nebraska, or any other State. There can be no reason why this patronage, whatever it is worth, should be given to the papers here and not to the papers of Virginia. Certainly if this provision is for the purpose of political patronage it should be given to the Virginia newspapers of the republican party, for they claim to have some republicans in that State. Now, I propose to strike out the words I have indicated so as to provide hereafter that no advertisements for mail-routes shall be published in the papers of the District of Columbia. I am inclined to think, Mr. Chairman, that this clause must have been inserted under a misapprehension. There can be no reason why the advertisements for mail service in Virginia should be published in the papers of this District when the advertisements for mail service in Pennsylvania are not published in those papers. It is a discrimination against the States of Virginia and Maryland which I do not think the House ought to make.

Mr. TYNER. The amendment is all wrong. There are some mail-routes that run out of this District.

The question was put on Mr. WHITEHEAD'S amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 58, noes 67.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I call for tellers.

Mr. RANDALL. I would suggest to the gentleman a further amendment so as to perfect his amendment, and that is to insert the words "any other routes than those running out of the District of Columbia."

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I will accept that modification.

Tellers were ordered upon agreeing to the amendment as modified; and Mr. WHITEHEAD and Mr. TYNER were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 78, noes 68.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I want to suggest that in my judgment that amendment does not accomplish the purpose which the gentleman had in view.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman is mistaken; it does.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order; the amendment has been agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payments on account of mail depredations and for special agents, $160,000.

Mr. STONE. I move to amend that clause by striking out "$60,000" and in inserting in lieu thereof "$23,000," so as to make the amount $123,000. I find on page 438 of the Blue-Book that the employés to whom this compensation is now paid are as follows: One special general superintendent railway mail service; eight special superintendents mail service; two special assistant superintendents mail service; one special superintendent railway classification; fifty-seven special agents of mail depredations; four special agents of money-order service; two special agents of free-delivery system; one special agent of mail equipments; making seventy-six employés in that department, at a cost of $123,000, as included in the Blue-Book, showing an increase in this bill of $37,000.

Mr. TYNER. I desire to say a word in response to the gentleman from Missouri. The confusion on the floor was so great that I did not hear precisely what he said. But if I understood him his point is this: he finds in the Blue-Book a certain number of special agents, and their compensation under the law, which amounts to $123,000, and he proposes to offer an amendment to reduce the amount of the appropriation in this clause to that sum. The gentleman is not perhaps aware of the fact that a part of the incidental expenses connected with the service of the special agents of the Post-Office Department does not appear in the law. For instance, in making arrests it is very often necessary for the agent to employ outside assistance, and in every instance where that is done of course it is necessary that that outside assistance should be paid for. Then again it is very frequently the case that a special agent who makes an arrest upon the spot, on account of a depredation of which he has personal knowledge, is himself arrested upon a writ of habeas corpus, and compelled to go before a court and employ an attorney to defend him. And in addition to that the special agent is frequently required to travel over roads where there are no mails carried, by stage coach or railroad cars or in any other way, and in all such cases he is obliged to hire a horse or a horse and carriage, for which payment must be made.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then there is the offering of rewards for the arrest of parties.

Mr. TYNER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] will see at once that there are a thousand little things that cannot be accounted for in advance.

Mr. STONE. Were there not incidentals last year as well as now?

Mr. TYNER. Surely.

Mr. STONE. And cannot the deficiency, if any, be charged with that account?

Mr. GARFIELD. This is the only fund applicable to that purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the last word in order to ask my colleague a question. I am told that on the 22d of June, 1872, when this new law in reference to mail contracts went into operation so far as railroads are concerned, a clerk in the Post-Office Department, with a salary of $1,800 a year, was appointed as assistant superintendent of railway mail contracts, at a salary of $1,600 a year and $5 a day and continued his duty at the same desk, at which he received his pay of $1,800. That made his compensation, instead of $1,800 a year, $3,425 a year. In fact, without changing the clerk where the clerk was employed, remaining at the same desk, by this mere process his salary was changed from $1,800 a year to $3,425 a year.

Now I ask my colleague if such transactions occur in the Post-Office Department, whether this statement given to me is correct? And if so, is it not in that way that these indefinite appropriations are made, and are perhaps used in the Department for an improper increase of salaries?

Mr. TYNER. If my colleague will suggest the name of the clerk——

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand the name of the clerk to be Mr. Davis.

Mr. TYNER. My colleague is correct. A man by the name of James M. Davis was appointed superintendent of railway classification, at a salary of $1,600 a year and five dollars a day to cover expenses. His title is that of superintendent of railroad classification. I think if my colleague understood the character of the duties performed by that man he would not raise a question as to the propriety of paying this amount. He is the officer who examines the propositions of pay to every railroad company in the United States, whose large compensation my colleague has complained of so much to-day. In every instance where the pay of a railroad company is adjusted it passes under the supervision of this officer, who examines it closely, looks at every figure, and fixes the rate of compensation under the law. I submit that if there is no other complaint to be made against the manner in which this appropriation is expended, my colleague ought not to say a word, because the important duties that are performed by this man would anywhere else command a much larger compensation than he now gets.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to call the attention of my friend to a fact which he has overlooked. It is that under this indefinite appropriation it is impossible for Congress to know what is paid to the officials of the Government. Here is a clerk who continues at the same desk where he received a salary fixed by law of $1,800, and receives now a salary of $3,425 a year, remaining at the same desk and performing none but merely clerical duties. I submit that if we talk about fixing salaries and holding the Departments to some accountability for the expenditure of appropriations, we must do so more definitely than is done here. No one can tell how these vast sums of money are to be expended, or what salaries are to be paid to our officers.

The amendment moved by Mr. STONE was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For mail locks and keys, $50,000.

Mr. RANDALL. The appropriation for this purpose last year was only $40,000. Why should it be increased now? I suppose the consumption or destruction of locks is about the same each year.

Mr. TYNER. In response to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] I will say that this increase is made necessary for this reason if for no other: this appropriation is to supply locks to boxes used in the several towns and cities where the letter-carrier system is established. Heretofore the Post-Office Department has been in the habit of taking old locks which have been used to some extent and applying them to this purpose. These locks have now nearly all worn out or become insecure, and the Department finds it necessary to have a little larger appropriation this year in order to supply the number that are needed.

The Clerk read the following:

For rent of post-offices, $350,000.

Mr. RANDALL. Last year only $300,000 was appropriated for this purpose; now it is proposed to appropriate $350,000, an increase of $50,000.

Mr. TYNER. That is not more than the ordinary increase of the business of the country would require.

Mr. RANDALL. The increase of expenditures on the part of the Government, so far as the erection of public buildings is concerned, would, I think, render a decrease rather than an increase in this appropriation advisable.

The Clerk read as follows:

For balances due foreign countries, $260,000.
For rent of post-offices, $350,000.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I move to amend by inserting after the clause just passed, in regard to balances due foreign countries, the following:

For balances due mail contractors appearing by the records of the Post-Office Department and heretofore used or covered into the Treasury, $100,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object to going back. The clause to which the amendment is proposed has been passed.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. It had not been passed when I rose. But I will offer the amendment to the pending clause.

Mr. TYNER. I raise the point of order that this is new legislation. These balances have been covered into the Treasury by the provisions of a law of Congress.

Mr. RANDALL. The amendment does not change any law. It merely makes an appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. POLAND. I desire to say a word in reference to the point of order. I apprehend that it is entirely unfounded. Here were balances due to postmasters. There was an appropriation made to pay them. That appropriation has been covered into the Treasury, so that there is now no appropriation to pay these outstanding balances. But no law has ever been passed providing that they shall not be paid. The amendment contravenes no law; it involves no new legislation any more than any appropriation does.

Mr. RANDALL. I think that upon reflection the Chair will see that the amendment does not change any existing law.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. The act of 1863 provided that balances thus due might be used in paying deficiencies of the Post-Office Department, and as the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] says, they were used in that way. It is only necessary now to make an appropriation.

Mr. GARFIELD. Before the point of order is decided, let me inquire of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WHITEHEAD] what he wants paid under this amendment?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. So far as I am concerned I want to secure payment of dues to mail contractors whose claims have been settled by the Post-Office Department, audited in its books, and acknowledged to be due for the quarter commencing January 1, 1861.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then that is clearly against the law.

Mr. TYNER. In view of the statement just made by the gentleman from Virginia as to the object of his amendment, I ask the Clerk to read a joint resolution passed on the 2d of March, 1867; and I raise the point that the amendment is in contravention of the provisions of that resolution which establish a test of loyalty.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution prohibiting payments by any officer of the Government to any person not known to have been opposed to the rebellion and in favor of its suppression.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That until otherwise ordered it shall be unlawful for any officer of the United States Government to pay any account, claim, or demand against said Government, which accrued or existed prior to the 13th day of April, A. D. 1861, in favor of any person who promoted, encouraged, or in any manner sustained the late rebellion, or in favor of any person who during said rebellion was not known to be opposed thereto, and distinctly in favor of its suppression; and no pardon heretofore granted, or hereafter to be granted, shall authorize the payment of such account, claim, or demand, until this resolution is modified or repealed: Provided, That this resolution shall not be construed to prohibit the payment of claims founded upon contracts made by any of the Departments, where such claims were assigned, or contracted to be assigned, prior to April 1, 1861, to creditors of said contractors, loyal citizens of loyal States, in payment of debts incurred prior to March 1, 1861.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. The resolution just read, even if now effective, applies only to those who were disloyal. Some of these parties were loyal, but they cannot be paid any more than those who were disloyal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the amendment is not in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For registered-package envelopes, $42,680.

Mr. TYNER. I move to amend the clause just read by inserting after the word "envelopes" the words "and seals."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For official envelopes for postmasters, $60,000.

Mr. RANDALL. The appropriation last year for this purpose was only $29,525. The present appropriation is more than double that amount. I would like to know the necessity for an increase to such an extent.

Mr. GARFIELD. The House last year was in a pet because the franking privilege had been abolished, and hence cut this item down below what it ought to have been.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, at any rate the Post-Office Department conducted its business with the amount of the appropriation.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Ohio will remember that there was no deficiency.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend by striking out "60" and inserting "30," so as to make the appropriation $30,000. Even the latter sum is in excess of the appropriation made last year.

Mr. TYNER. The Post-Office Department asked for this purpose an appropriation of $69,500; and the officer who has this matter specially in charge states that he cannot get along with a dime less than the amount proposed here to be appropriated.

Mr. RANDALL. How did the Department get along last year?

Mr. TYNER. The increase of the money-order business necessarily increases the appropriation very largely. Every money-order issued by a postmaster requires the use of two envelopes. There has also been an increase in the registered-letter business which I will state has doubled since the 1st of July last. The increase in the registered-letter business by the reduction of the registration fee, together with the increase of the money-order business, will require this increase in the appropriation.

Mr. RANDALL'S amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fees to marshal, attorneys, and clerks of courts, $7,500.

Mr. HOLMAN. I should like to have my colleague explain the object of this appropriation. Seventy-five hundred dollars is appropriated for fees to marshal, attorneys, and clerks of courts. When the Government becomes a party to a lawsuit, certainly this Department is not called on to pay these fees. The Post-Office Department as a Department of this Government has of course the right to call upon its legal officers to prosecute its suits.

Mr. TYNER. When the Post-Office Department enters suits on an official bond, or any other suit, the fees of marshal, attorneys, and clerks of course are as much chargeable against the Department as against any private individual or anybody else. Whenever there has been prosecution of parties for violation of the postal law the Post-Office Department is required to pay these fees to the marshal, attorneys, and clerks of courts, and this appropriation is for that purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is the only instance of such an item being provided for any other Department of the Government that I am aware of.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana must move an amendment, as this debate is proceeding out of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I move to strike out the paragraph. There is no such appropriation for any other Department. The understanding always has been that the appropriation for the Department of Justice covered the appropriation for all such service. I hope some satisfactory explanation will be made of this item. We do not make any appropriation of this sum for the Interior Department or the State Department.

Mr. GARFIELD. If my friend from Indiana will think for a moment, he will see there are certain officers of the court, clerks and marshal, who are paid by fees. They get fees from the suitors before the court. If the Postmaster-General or any agent of his is suitor, these officers are entitled to their fees just as much as though the suit was brought by a private citizen or any one else. This appropriation is for the purpose of paying these fees. There is no appropriation of law otherwise to pay these parties. They only are paid by fees.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no such appropriation for the Department of the Interior or for the Department of State.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman is mistaken. We made this same appropriation for the Internal Revenue and other Departments. This appropriation has been here in the post-office appropriation bill ever since the gentleman has been a member of Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that, but it has never been satisfactorily explained.

Mr. GARFIELD. This is the explanation of it. It has never been questioned before.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not know I shall insist upon my motion to strike out. I withdraw it.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I should like to ask for my own information what fees are paid to clerks of courts by the Post-Office Department?

Mr. GARFIELD. Fees on whatever cases may be entered by the Post-Office Department in the courts.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. In criminal cases?

Mr. GARFIELD. In whatever cases the Post-Office Department feels it necessary to bring.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Suits on official bonds?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes; and in whatever other business of the Department in reference to which the Department needs to bring suit.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish the gentleman the next time we have up a bill making appropriation for any other Department will point out any item corresponding to this one. I think my friend from Ohio will find it difficult to find any, unless it be in the appropriations for the Department of Justice.

Mr. GARFIELD. I can point it out at once. In the appropriation for the Internal Revenue Bureau there is an appropriation of $125,000 for the trial and bringing to punishment of persons accused of crime or charged with crime against the Internal Revenue Bureau. That appropriation goes to pay all this class of charges.

Mr. HOLMAN. But this class of fees is not mentioned.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is simply because the appropriation is not itemized.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Let me put another question to the gentleman. Is not this necessary in consequence of the mode of keeping the books between this and the other Departments?

Mr. GARFIELD. That is all.

The Clerk read as follows:

For engraving, printing, and binding drafts and warrants, $3,000.

Mr. BECK. I move to strike that out. I want to get the attention of the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads for one moment. The suggestion I wish to make does not bear specifically on this particular item, but the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads seems to be so well informed I wish to ask him this question: There has been a large amount of money drawn by the Post-Office Department from old appropriations. I find by looking over the Book of Estimates, and I have been unable to ascertain how they were able to do it under the law, of the amount of appropriations made for 1871, at the beginning of the current fiscal year there remained $2,938,000 in the Treasury, of which $500,000 were drawn out before the 1st of September. The House adopted a resolution requiring the Secretary to advise it how much had been drawn out up to the 1st day of April, and he advised us that the Post-Office Department had drawn out of that money up to the 1st day of April $1,510,000. If the chairman of the committeee can tell us under what orders or by what authority that money was drawn, I would like to know it.

Mr. TYNER. The gentleman from Kentucky addressed his inquiry to the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office. I do not know whether he meant me or not. I do not happen to be serving in that capacity.

Mr. BECK. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TYNER] is the gentleman I addressed.

Mr. TYNER. Then if the gentleman addressed his inquiry to me, I will give him the best information I can. There is no question but the circumstance about which he speaks was in clear violation of the law. It was drawing $500,000 from an expired appropriation, but it was done wholly by the mistake of a new officer in the Post-Office Department. The present Third Assistant Postmaster-General, Mr. Barber, had recently been installed in the duties of his office. In making up his warrants on this appropriation he inadvertently and without a knowledge of the law drew upon this appropriation the sum of $500,000. The payments were made and the entire transaction was completed before the Postmaster-General himself knew anything about it.

Mr. BECK. But this remarkable fact existed on the 1st day of September last that $500,000 was drawn, and on the 1st day of April the Secretary certified that $1,510,000 was drawn. How did it happen that after the 1st day of September there was $1,010,000 drawn in addition to that $500,000?

Mr. TYNER. I will simply reply to that by saying that if anything of that kind did occur I am unable to explain it.

Mr. BECK. Then I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For miscellaneous items, $2,500.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I offer the following amendment:

At the end of line 93, add the following:
That the postage to be charged on each copy of the Annual Report of the Department of Agriculture shall not exceed ten cents.

Mr. Chairman, permission was given by the House, by a vote of about 3 to 1, to move that as an amendment to the pending bill. And while I have no doubt that the House was in favor of adopting this amendment, I wish in moving it to call the attention of the committee to what seems to me a matter of importance in dealing with it. It is known to the members of the House, especially to those representing agricultural districts, that this particular document is the most in demand of any which Congress sends out to the country. It is desirable, of course, that it should be sent to the constituencies that wish to receive it; but the present rate of postage is excessive for a work which is sent out in such great quantities. Now, I am informed by the Post-Office Department that the Department can afford to send it at ten cents per copy; that with that rate of postage the expense of sending it will be fully defrayed. If, therefore, this amendment be adopted it will give an opportunity to our constituents and to ourselves to have that document sent out at a very moderate rate and at the same time make it profitable to the Government.

Now, there is a caution which I wish to address to the House. If an attempt is made to amend this motion by introducing other documents or by affecting in other ways the sending out of documents, or papers, or letters from the House, by anything looking to the restoration of the franking privilege, or by including other documents, we stand a chance of losing this particularly valuable provision. I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that a separate bill, making general regulations for the sending out of documents, embodying, as it seems to me, very equitable and reasonable provisions on that subject, is now pending before the Senate, reported by the Post-Office Committee. But we are not certain that that bill will pass. If we were, undoubtedly this amendment would not be necessary.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts state what are the provisions of that bill?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I have merely read the bill over hastily. It provides for the sending out of documents stamped, &c., on reasonable terms. It makes a general provision in regard to this subject. But, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that it seems to me that it is advisable to secure for this particular document which is so much a subject of interest to the country this especial provision in case no general measure shall be passed. I think the committee should refuse to jeopardize the success of this amendment by incorporating any other subject-matter with it.

Mr. SHANKS. I send to the Clerk's desk an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "ten cents" and insert "one cent."

Mr. SHANKS. I think that we ought to do what I propose in my amendment. I think if there is anything we ought to do it is to send these books to the people as nearly free as possible. That is all I have to say about it.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. SHANKS, there were—ayes 92, noes 47.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I wish to inquire of the Chair if a quorum voted.

Several MEMBERS. Too late.

Mr. MILLS. I offer the following substitute for the amendment as amended:

Provided, That all printed matter ordered to be printed by either House of Congress shall be transported through the mails free of charge.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order on that, that it changes existing law.

Mr. MILLS. The Speaker decided the other day that it would be in order to offer an amendment like this.

Mr. RANDALL. The Speaker made that decision on Monday.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to make the point broadly without argument, simply that the amendment is not germane and that it changes existing law.

Mr. RANDALL. On Monday when the rules were authorized to be suspended to permit the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] to offer this amendment, the question arose whether an amendment to restore the franking privilege would be germane to that amendment, and the Speaker declared, in the presence of the House, that it would.

Mr. CLYMER. Yes, sir; he did.

Mr. MILLS. It was because of that decision that I offered my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the resolution offered on Monday by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR.]

The Clerk read as follows:

That it shall be in order to move as an amendment to the bill making appropriations for the Post-Office Department as follows:
That the postage to be charged on each copy of the Annual Report of the Department of Agriculture shall not exceed ten cents.

Mr. CLYMER. There was a colloquy in reference to the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that perfectly well. The Chair has read the RECORD. The Chair is of opinion that an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, regulating the price of postage on this document whether at five cents or at one cent, would be germane to the amendment and in order; but that it is not germane to this amendment to move that any other report than the Agricultural Report be included in it. It would not be in order to move that the Agricultural Report be stricken out and Hayden's report or any other report substituted in lieu of it. The Chair thinks that all amendments that are not practically pertinent to the Agricultural Report per se are not in order.

Mr. RANDALL. From that decision I appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that no other document can be included in this amendment under the resolution which has been read.

Mr. RANDALL. The decision of the Chair would prevent the offering of any amendment in reference to any other book or document, and I appeal from his decision.

The question was taken on the appeal, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee? and on a division there were—ayes 112, noes 35.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. MILLS. I offer my amendment in a modified shape, so as to refer to the Agricultural Report only.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts by inserting after the word "annual" the words "monthly and tri-monthly," so that the provision if adopted shall apply to all the reports of the Department of Agriculture.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] already pending.

Mr. MILLS. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts as amended by striking out the words "not exceeding one cent" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "shall pass free through the mails."

Mr. HALE, of New York. I rise to oppose the amendment. I trust the committee will not act hastily on this matter. I beg to say that I have always advocated the restoration of the franking privilege pure and simple, believing that its repeal was a mistake. I am always ready in any straightforward manner of legislation to support a proposition for its restoration.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I rise to a point of order. I submit that, the House having adopted the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. SHANKS,] it cannot be stricken out by another amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is certaintly not in order to strike out what the committee has already inserted.

Mr. HALE, of New York. That is not a point of order made upon me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the amendment is in order, and the gentleman from New York will proceed.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Now, I beg gentlemen who desire the restoration of the franking privilege to try and do it by a direct and straightforward vote and not otherwise. I will not for one, under the guise of favoring a particular interest or a publication in the interest of a particular class, undertake to do indirectly what the House has refused to do directly. I shall therefore vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, and I should desire to vote against the amendment reducing the amount of postage upon this book proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, which was offered as a legitimate and fair rate of postage at which the Department can afford to carry the book. So long as we propose that everything shall pay postage, I think that the Agricultural Report, like everything else, should pay its fair share, and the statement being made that the Department thinks it can be carried for ten cents, I hope the House will fix that as the rate of postage, leaving the question of the restoration of the franking privilege until we come to it in a direct form.

Mr. POTTER. If the House is determined to send the reports of the Agricultural Department through the mails without any substantial payment of postage, we may just as well say that they shall go free as that the postage shall amount to only one cent, which would occasion as much trouble in stamping them as if full postage on them was paid, and yet give no real return for the service.

In this connection I wish to say that I quite agree with my colleague [Mr. HALE] in regretting the introduction of the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR.] I do not agree with him, however, that the franking privilege ought not to have been abolished. On the contrary, I thought that it ought to be abolished, and labored for that result. But I thought then that some method should be substituted for it, by which the documents printed by Congress could be circulated throughout the country. Unless we make some such provision there is no use in printing these documents. And now that Congress has refused to make any such provision, I think it will result as well if it shall result in the documents being no longer printed for free circulation. It will, I believe, be better to supply those persons who want public documents at cost rather than to furnish them free to any particular and favored class as heretofore, even though selected by members of Congress.

There is a bill for that purpose pending in the Senate, a bill which provides for printing such documents as may be of public interest, and allowing them to be sold for their cost. In my judgment that will be the fairest and best way to dispose of them.

But if there is any class in this community that ought not to be favored in respect of postage it is exactly the agricultural class, which is the best able of all classes in the country to pay postage, being in the aggregate far the richest class among us. They are besides as a whole quite as intelligent as any other class, and just as competent to appreciate the wisdom and propriety of requiring every man to pay for the documents he wants instead of having them charged upon the rest of the people. In the third place, the farmers are in my judgment as fair and right-minded as any other class and as quick to perceive and as ready to decide justly upon a measure which seeks to put the postage which they ought to pay upon the documents they need, instead of upon the general public.

I do not represent any city district; I represent a great agricultural district, that had until lately not a single city in it. I represent a great agricultural district, and yet I have never heard from my constituents any sort of objection to paying postage or expressage upon their quota of Agricultural Reports. I distribute all of these reports that are allotted to me, and I purchase more every year to distribute, and yet have had no demand to have them go free through the mails. I do not believe the farmers of the country demand this change, and I regret this proposition the more because it is an entering-wedge toward getting back again to the system of free circulation of public documents, which is a system of injustice and one that ought not to be restored.

Mr. SHANKS. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of saying, in answer to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER,] that the time for him to object to this proposition because it was restricted to a single document, was when the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] introduced it. It is rather too late now to object upon that ground; that objection should have been made when the proposition was submitted to the House.

In answer to the other gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] I desire to say that he seems to indorse the position taken by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] to put the postage upon this document at ten cents. Now, according to the present rates of postage, I cannot send one of the Agricultural Reports for less than from thirty-six to forty cents postage. If there is any justice in requiring postage to be paid, it should be left as it is now. That is, if there is any justice in the complaint of putting the postage down to one cent, upon principle it would apply to putting it down to ten cents; and he should object as much to the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts as to the other.

I hope the House will not longer delay this matter, because it is perfectly clear that the fact that we have been deprived of the franking privilege has kept away from the community the very documents they need the most. We have been running a great printing establishment here at great expense without benefit to the people. I hope the amendment I propose will be sustained.

Mr. POTTER. The only objection which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SHANKS] has advanced to the argument I made was that I did not make it at the proper time. All that I have to say is that I made it as soon as possible.

Mr. TYNER. I rise to a point of order. Perhaps I should have made it before. It is that it is not competent for the committee to strike out what has been inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. Other words are included in the motion to strike out.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say a word in response to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. SHANKS.] I very greatly regret that this proposition has been brought in here. I ask the committee to consider for a moment the most ridiculous attitude in which this House will be placed by selecting one of the dozens of documents published by order of Congress and making it an exception, and saying that the postage upon it shall be put down to one cent, or even to ten cents, below the postage on other documents of the same weight. And it is to be put down for no other reason on earth than because it is the farmers who particularly want it, and they ought to be made a specially favored class in regard to the rate of postage which they shall pay.

Mr. MYERS. I wish to say——

Mr. GARFIELD. I have the floor. I represent, in proportion to the whole number of my constituents, as many farmers as any other man on this floor. I will not insult the intelligence and manhood of my constituents by saying to them that I will treat them as a lot of paupers, and come here and ask for them peculiar privileges in the use of the mails. If a schoolmaster has a report of the Bureau of Education sent to him, he has to pay forty-two cents for it. But if a farmer has an Agricultural Report sent to him he has only to pay one cent for it.

Mr. SHANKS. I want to ask——

Mr. GARFIELD. And if a miner has a report of a geological survey sent to him he pays half a dollar postage on it.

Mr. SHANKS. Let me ask a question——

Mr. GARFIELD. While the farmer alongside of him is to pay but one cent for his document.

Mr. SHANKS. I want to ask the gentleman whether his constituents are to pay the postage on those documents, or whether he intends to pay it himself? I supposed the member must pay the postage.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman thinks he can make any capital out of that, he is welcome to it.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to say——

Mr. SHANKS. I will say——

Mr. GARFIELD. There are tomahawks flying all around. If gentlemen will stay their hands, and keep back their knives for a moment, I will relieve them, and they can then throw their tomahawks as much as they please. I ask members of the House as a matter of fair, manly, and equitable justice, whether they are willing in this indirect way to open up the restoration of the franking privilege? I agree on this point with the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE.] If the frank is to be restored say so; let it be restored to members of Congress and to all the Departments of the Government as well. That is a proposition which is consistent with itself, and if gentlemen believe in it let them say so, and vote for it. But to begin with a single document, to pinch one leaf off the tree as a means of destroying it rather than cut it up by the roots, is not in my judgment an honorable and frank way of legislating. I hope—no; I wish I could hope—that this proposition will be voted down. I believe it will be adopted; but I call attention to it as an indirect method of restoring the franking privilege—a method which ought not to be adopted in our legislation.

Mr. SHANKS. The House voted upon this question some days ago.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Mr. Chairman, the defense of this proposition against the arguments of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is that it is exactly right, and I challenge him to rise in his place and say that it is not right to reduce the postage on the Agricultural Report—from forty cents to thirty cents of which is sheer profit to the Government, the charge being more than the transportation costs in proportion to other mail matter—to ten cents.

I am one of those who opposed by vote and by speech the abolition of the franking privilege. I am not one of those who voted to abolish it while they thought it ought to be retained.

Mr. GARFIELD. Nor am I.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I do not intimate that any member of the present House did so; but it is a matter of history that in the House which voted to abolish the franking privilege a large majority yielded to what they knew was a clamor.

But the franking privilege is abolished, and will in my opinion remain abolished until the public sentiment which governs this country is changed. That having been abolished, it is our duty to make the postal laws which we frame on another system just and reasonable; and it is just and reasonable, if the information we get from the Post-Office Department is correct, that this document should be charged no more than ten cents, because that is all its transportation through the mails costs.

But it is asked, "Why do you single out this one document and reduce the postage upon it, leaving the Report of the Commissioner of Education, the Report on Commercial Statistics, and other like reports untouched?" I answer it is because this is the one chief and principal document in which the people are interested. Two hundred and fifty thousand copies of this document are published; and it is a document in which every district in the country is largely represented. It is a document sought by persons who, on the average, are in very moderate circumstances. Although the farmers taken together may be well off, the man who engages in farming for a living has to consult the little economies; and thirty cents is an important item to him in the form of postage on a book.

The Educational Report is sent to libraries; it is sent to towns and cities for their school superintendents; it is sent to professional and literary men; the Commercial Statistics are sent to merchants; and although I agree that it is just to reduce the postage at a proper time on these documents also, yet the reduction now proposed, so just in itself, should not be embarrassed by undertaking to frame a general provision for all the documents published by the Government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KASSON. I rise to a point of order. It is that for some time past the debate has been out of order. The question first is on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR;] then there is an amendment in the second degree by the gentleman from Texas. Debate was exhausted on that, when some one else moved a third amendment, on which all this debate has proceeded.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address a remark to my friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] who dreaded the scalping process. There was one point in his remarks I did not like. He became very enthusiastic and very much excited, and appealed to the committee to act in a "straightforward, manly, and honorable manner." Why, sir, he with others on this floor prevented an amendment which would have placed other books in the same category. Let him be fair in this matter. He desired that no other amendment should come in. Many of us here wished to have all these books placed in the same category; for there is no more reason why one should be fixed at a certain limit than others. Some people of the country are interested in one class of books, some in another; and they all have equal privileges. I will say, with the greatest deference to the Chairman, that I think he was mistaken in his ruling; and I believe the Speaker intimated a different ruling a few days ago, although of course he had no right to decide the question for the chairman of the Committee of the Whole after gentlemen like the gentleman from Ohio have prevented us from offering an amendment which would cover the whole question; it is not fair, or manly, or honorable, to throw in our faces the fact that this amendment relates to a single document only, and to ask why all these documents should not be put on the same footing.

Now, sir, I was one of those who voted against the abolition of the franking privilege. I believed then what subsequent events have shown, that it would be no saving to the Government; and even if it was, I believed that the people of this country who desire information and believe that Congress should legislate for the benefit of the whole people do not want any such measure.

The Post-Office Department, whose head I honor very much, comes here and admits that large numbers of books seek distribution by means of the express company instead of being sent through the mails as it was supposed they would be.

Now it appears it would be a good thing to reduce the postage. In my judgment we ought to allow the franking privilege again. At all events we ought now to proceed as rapidly as possible to reduce the postage on books. It is not for our benefit, as it entails upon members of Congress a great deal of trouble, but for the benefit of the people for whom we come here to legislate. I should not have risen if it had not been for the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment to the amendment moved by Mr. MILLS.

Mr. COBURN. The gentleman from Texas withdraws his amendment and I renew it.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman from Pennsylvania yields me whatever time he has remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. There are two minutes of the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania remaining.

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to do a little example in arithmetic for the benefit of the gentleman from Ohio and those who agree with him. The postage is now five cents a quarter on newspapers which do not exceed four ounces in weight. Thirteen copies weigh fifty-two ounces; that is three pounds and a quarter. They go through the mail for five cents, or one cent and seven-thirteenths a pound. The Agricultural Reports, which do not weigh quite two pounds, cost from thirty to forty cents postage, and the gentleman fights the proposition here to send them for ten cents, nearly four times as high as newspapers are charged.

The gentleman says his constituents do not ask for this discrimination. I say Mr. Chairman, I should like an amendment for all public documents printed by authority of Congress to go the same as these documents, but as I cannot get it as I want it, I am willing to do the best I can. This is a step in the right direction; half a loaf is better than no bread, so let us at least send Agricultural Reports through the mails for as little postage as we do the same weight of newspapers, which would be not quite three cents for each book.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. RICE. I move to strike out the last three words.

The CHAIRMAN. Further amendment is not in order.

Mr. COBURN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] withdraws his amendment, and I will renew it.

The CHAIRMAN. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Objection was made.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment to the amendment cannot be withdrawn, objection being made.

Mr. COBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it not the practice here for gentlemen who have made motions to amend to withdraw them without unanimous consent? Has it ever before been decided that an amendment cannot be withdrawn unless by unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is unable to answer the interrogatory of the gentleman from Indiana. He is only able to rule as he understands the parliamentary law.

The question recurred on Mr. MILLS's amendment to the amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 114, noes 56.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to insert before the word "annual" these words, "monthly and," so it will read "monthly and Annual Reports of the Department of Agriculture shall pass free through the mails."

The amendment was agreed to.

The question next recurred on the amendment of Mr. G. F. HOAR as amended.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I move to strike out the first word.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to make one observation. Some time ago the Committee on Agriculture reported a resolution making provision for the printing of the Agricultural Report. That passed through the House and went to the Senate, and it is no secret, unless some provision is made hereafter whereby that report can be sent through the mails the Senate absolutely refuse to pass the resolution providing for the printing of that report.

Mr. SHANKS. I call the gentleman to order. He has no right to call attention to the proceedings of the Senate.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I think those gentlemen over there should learn how to keep order before they call me to order. Now, sir, I do not believe in sending any document through the mail without having it pay just what it is worth to carry it. If I know anything about the farmers of my district, I do not believe they ask anything but what is just and fair. They are willing to pay postage, but, sir, we cannot have this document at all unless we make some provision, and I am compelled to vote for it rather than not have the document.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I believe I am about the only farmer in this House, and I should like to have the attention of the House.

Mr. COX. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The greatest farmer is the chairman of the committee, for he farms out the whole of our time.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. The business of farming has been a family business in my family for several generations, and I am never ashamed of it except when I get in company with a lot of lawyers and politicians, who look upon it as the mendicant business of the country. I scout the idea the farmers of this country, by far the most numerous and the richest people of the country, want this little pittance of benevolence and favoritism at the hands of the American Congress.

We are taxed for other interests in every possible way. If there is any interest that we wish to support, you rely on imposing taxes on the farmers to support that interest, and it is proposed to pay us back by giving us a poor book that we do not ask for.

What is the proposition? It is that you print two hundred and fifty thousand books to be distributed among millions of farmers. One man out of twenty may get the book while all the rest have to pay for it; and this is to be distributed by members of Congress for the purpose of adding to their popularity at home. It is to be distributed as an electioneering document to the people of this country. The farmers are not asking for this book. They do not want it published at the public expense and distributed to them. But gentlemen in Congress want to gratify a few of their friends by showing them the distinction of sending them this book. I beg this House of Representatives not to put this insult upon the farmers of this country. If you publish this book, distribute it just as you distribute other public documents. If the cost of distributing public documents is too high for this and others, reduce the cost of all of them. But I ask you on behalf of the profession of which I am a member not to insult us by sending us this big volume at one cent.

The amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. COX and Mr. ELDREDGE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] is recognized.

Mr. COX. I renew the amendment for the purpose of saying a word or two, after the remarks of my agricultural friend. My friend over there from Ohio [Mr. SMITH] is a farmer pure and simple he thinks. I desire to know of my honorable friend whether he has not held office for the last fifteen years, or for half that time? I do not want an answer. I want to know of that gentleman whether he is not ready to come back to Congress again by the aid of the farmers.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. Do you want that question answered?

Mr. COX. No; I never put those questions with the view of being interrupted by having them answered in a five-minute speech. For myself, Mr. Chairman, I represent the cosmopolitan interest as well as the metropolitan, and I am ready to die on the altar of my country as well as these gentlemen who speak for the farmers. I am a granger on the principle of rus in urbe; on the principle of my honorable friend from New York [Mr. POTTER] who spoke so well a while ago, who is a sort of amphibious gentleman—half the time in Hell Gate and half the time in the city.

But my very honorable friend struck one point that may not have attracted the attention of the committee. I know well what he means by this matter of favoritism. When I represented the central district of Ohio for many years and was speaking for the farmers, I labored against favoritism in this matter of taxation, and I would gladly welcome him into the pale of the good old free-trade men who represent farmers more especially. When they pay for harness, when they pay for their sugar, when they pay for all they buy, even for the very Bible out of which they get their inspiration and their religion, they are taxed by you. And the point we at all times made for them was, no favoritism. We have ciphered up again and again the number of mechanics, contrasting them, in the paucity of their numbers, with the great bulk of the farming people; but in vain. The gentleman's party have always voted against the farming interest.

I have noticed, however, a peculiar sort of squirming on the part of the republicans in this House. They dodge responsibility. They have had power since in 1860. They have had power to modify taxation. They have had power to carry anything they chose by a two-thirds majority. But when we get them down to the harrow, when we get them down to hard work, how is it? They say, O, we are the party of reform; and yet they have had all the responsibility of this bad business here for the last ten or twelve years. Is it not true? Have you not had power? And yet have you reformed anything? Are you not even now talking about reforming things which you did last year? I was amused and instructed by hearing gentlemen say, O, we are lowering the appropriations this year; we are trying to be good this year. Is not that a humble confession that you have been bad for ten years?

I wish to say a word on this franking-privilege question, and then I will stop. There are three kinds of men who voted to repeal the franking privilege. Some of them were strict partisans, and had a platform made at Philadelphia which they had to comply with. They vaunted a great deal what they did, and now they are the very men who wish to restore it in part. They wish to favor a portion of the people at the expense of others, and have departed from the principle they vaunted.

Then there were good men who voted to abolish the franking privilege, very good men. I was one of them. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. PARKER] was another. We voted on the principle of taking off this extraordinary burden on the mails. But there was another class of tolerably good men who voted for it in the expectation that it would not pass. I know that was so. Some voted for it with the expectation that the Senate would not pass it, or that if the Senate did pass it the measure would be vetoed. Is not that true? You know that that is true. You stand now before the American people confessing that there was no principle in the repeal of the franking privilege.

A MEMBER. The bill came from the Senate.

Mr. COX. I know it came from the Senate. We had it as a sort of shuttle-cock between the two Houses; but the bill never passed until your wonderful platform was adopted. Then there is another class of men who never vote for anything in the shape of reform, men who are a good deal like the old colored man down South, who, when he was called before the court and was interrogated by the judge as to his qualifications as a juror and asked if he was a freeholder, said that he was, that he took everything he could get and held on to it freely. That is the third class of men. Now, cannot we be honest and either restore this privilege in toto or abolish it entirely?

[Here the hammer fell.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 218) to enable the Secretary of the Interior to make final settlement with the Pottawatomie Indians of Michigan and Indiana under treaty stipulations existing with them; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union then resumed its session.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I did think that I had something to say upon the subject that has been under discussion; but I perfectly well knew when the Chair recognized the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] that all that could be said would be said by him; that all that would listen would listen to him; and that nothing more would be either desired or expected.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I oppose this amendment; I do not know precisely what it is, nor do I care what it is. I was not one of the gentlemen referred to by the gentleman from New York; I voted against the abolition of the franking privilege. I believed when it was proposed that it was one of the most consummate humbugs and pieces of demagogism that was ever started in this country, and I believe so now. It cost so much to get up public sentiment upon this subject that nothing has been saved to the people in the way of postage. The Postmaster-General knows perfectly well that he expended more money in the printing of circulars, and in forcing his underlings to get signers to petitions and send them back here to Congress, than has ever been saved in the way of postage. I voted against it in the interest of the people. The franking privilege was never the privilege of members of Congress. It only imposed upon them a great burden which, in the exercise of their duty, they endeavored, I believe, in general to perform faithfully. I do not agree with the gentleman from New York in regard to the wishes of the farming interest. I do agree with the remark that was made here that the chairman is the greatest farmer here, for he might claim to be the only farmer, because he farms out all the time here in the House to speak on this subject.

But it is no insult to the agriculturist to send to him agricultural documents, and I will say to the gentleman that I know that the farmers of the country desire this document. I appeal to members of this House if they do not get more letters requesting Agricultural Reports than for any other documents published by Congress. And it is not so great an injustice, as is generally supposed, to distribute these documents. If you send one of these Agricultural Reports into an agricultural neighborhood to one man, the whole people in the neighborhood read that report; it is worn out in the service and use of the farmers, and they desire it, and gentlemen know that they desire it. This idea that it costs the Government something to send it out, and that the farmers do not want it because it does cost them something, is simply a part of the humbug of which I have spoken. The farmers do want it. Let me say further that it is also a piece of demagogism to try and make the people suppose that it costs anything to send this report to them. It does not cost the country anything. The report goes free, and we have had sufficient evidence brought before us to-day to show us that the mails are not sent one cent cheaper because you keep this report from the people. The contractors do not carry the mails any cheaper because these documents are kept out of them. The carrying of the mails costs just as much to-day as it cost before the abolition of the franking privilege. It was only the cry that was got up in the circulars that were sent out and in the electioneering that was required to be done by the underlings of the Postmaster-General throughout the country that created a false sentiment, and the farmers and the people generally are cheated out of the documents they desire, and for which they are constantly writing to us, because of this piece of false practice and demagogism that was practiced by the Postmaster-General in getting the franking privilege abolished.

Mr. HEREFORD. I move, pro forma, to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I had occasion some time ago to express to this House what my view was on this subject, and that is that the Agricultural Reports and other documents published by Congress for the benefit of the people should be sent to the people free of all charge. And it has appeared to me that this is about what this matter comes to: that the express companies have more advocates on this floor than I had expected. Every member of Congress knows that the great bulk of the documents sent from this city do not go through the mails. How are they sent? They are sent by the express companies in most cases, so that the Post-Office Department is not benefited by the repeal of the franking privilege, but the express companies are. And the revenues which it was claimed would result to the Post-Office Department by the repeal of the franking privilege are not received by that Department, but the express companies of the country receive increased revenues because of that repeal.

Every gentleman whose constituents live along the line of a railroad over which these express companies carry their freight knows very well that he sends these documents to his constituents through the agency of an express company and not of the Post-Office Department. Therefore I say that in the interest of the farmers and in the interest of economy I am in favor of reducing the postage on this document to ten cents, or to one cent, or even to send it free through the mails, as I would send free of charge to the people every other document published by authority of Congress.

This is one of the many ways under our form of government in which we educate our people. We educate them through the press, through the publication of documents by order of Congress, through the debates in either House of Congress, and through the debates in the Legislatures of the various States. I am in favor of making that education as free as light or air to the people. And for that reason I am in favor, as I said before, of sending all these documents free through the mails. We know practically that any other method of distributing these documents is in the interest of the Adams Express Company and the other express companies of this country.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope we will now have a vote.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I am opposed to this amendment, not merely because I am not myself a farmer, and have not a single farmer in my district, but because I do not think any distinction should be made or favoritism shown on behalf of the Agricultural Report over the many other documents which are published by authority of Congress. In the document-rooms of this Capitol are documents of far more importance, in my opinion, than the document which is issued by the Agricultural Department, documents which it is more necessary to distribute throughout the different sections of the country for the education of the people.

This distinction which it is proposed shall be shown in favor of the Agricultural Report is repudiated upon this floor by many of those from different sections of the country who represent farmers. No good reason has been given for this, no reason at all that I can understand, except one which I am told has been urged upon the attention of many members upon this floor. That reason is that the grangers in the different sections of the country desire to have these documents, and they require them from their Representatives here. And those members, rather than be themselves at the expense of sending them, desire to impose that expense upon the Government, or rather upon other classes of the community who are not benefited by the distribution of that document. I have understood that letters by the hundred have been sent here to different members of Congress from granges all over the West and Southwest, calling upon them for fifties and hundreds of this document. I may say, for it is no secret, that I have seen those letters.

I understand that was brought about in this way: some irresponsible clerk in the Agricultural Bureau sent a misstatement, in the form of a circular, throughout the entire West to the effect that members of Congress now had these documents ready for distribution, and asking the granges to call upon them for them. It is in response to that call that this cry is now made for a reduction of the postage on this particular document.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] as now amended be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the Monthly and Annual Reports of the Department of Agriculture shall pass free through the mails.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. Would it be in order to move to amend the amendment so as to provide that all the agricultural newspapers of the country shall go free through the mails?

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. TREMAIN.) That would not be in order upon the pending amendment.

The amendment, as amended, was then agreed to upon a division—ayes 101, noes 58.

Mr. KASSON. Before passing from this first section, I move to amend it further by adding the following:

And provided further, That no money appropriated in this section shall be paid as compensation to special agents exceeding seventy in number.

Mr. TYNER. Does the gentleman propose this as an amendment to the paragraph making an appropriation for special agents?

Mr. KASSON. That clause was passed before I could offer this amendment. I now move it as an amendment to the section.

Mr. TYNER. I must raise the point of order on this amendment. The item in relation to special agents was passed by the Committee of the Whole some time ago, and it is not in order to offer this amendment now.

Mr. KASSON. It must be evident that the point of order is not well taken, for my amendment provides that none of the money appropriated in this section shall be expended for the purpose of paying compensation to more than seventy special agents.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that the amendment is in order.

Mr. KASSON. There are now employed nominally ninety-four special agents. Of that number eighteen are persons employed, in one way or another, about post-office business and not paid out of this fund. There are seventy-six who are paid out of this fund which we now make $160,000. Now, it is a fact known to nearly all of us that there are men thus employed who ought not to remain in the service, because they are not beneficial to it; and in my judgment by reducing the number we shall do a great favor to the Postmaster-General, by enabling him to dispose of some half-dozen who are practically in the possession of sinecures. In the very moderate reduction which I propose I endeavor to keep within the range which I believe to be reasonable and just. There is now no limit by law as to the number of those who may thus be paid as agents; and I submit to the Committee on Appropriations as well as the Committee of the Whole that by fixing the limit at seventy we shall do the Postmaster-General a favor by enabling him to dispense with certain persons whose retention is urgently pressed upon him. I say this from general information only and without any desire to commit the Postmaster-General, for I profess no authority to speak for him.

Mr. TYNER. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] designs by his amendment to limit the expenditure of this appropriation of $160,000 to the number he has named, then I desire to say to him that only fifty-six are paid out of this specific appropriation.

Mr. KASSON. The list which the gentleman handed me shows seventy-six who are paid as special agents; eighteen are marked as otherwise employed, though commissioned as special agents.

Mr. TYNER. I desire that the gentleman from Iowa and I shall understand each other fully. Does he mean that no portion of this appropriation of $160,000 shall be paid for the employment of more than seventy agents?

Mr. KASSON. My point is that no more than seventy persons shall be appointed and paid as special agents of this Department.

Mr. TYNER. Only fifty-six are paid out of this appropriation.

Mr. KASSON. How about the others?

Mr. TYNER. The other special agents are paid out of other appropriations.

Mr. KASSON. And this amendment is designed to cover those other appropriations. I will put it in any form to accomplish the purpose. I do not want to raise any question of difference about details.

Mr. TYNER. I will state the number of these special agents and how they are paid. There are fifty-six paid out of the special agents' fund; two out of the free-delivery fund; three out of the money-order fund; fifteen out of the mail-depredations fund; and one out of the supply-division fund, making in all seventy-seven; and there is authority under the law to pay these agents out of each of these funds.

Mr. KASSON. If the amendment were put at the end of the first section would it not cover all those funds?

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the gentleman to put it at the end of the bill.

Mr. TYNER. I do not wish to be understood as saying that there are seventy-seven special agents permanently employed by this Department. There happen to be seventy-seven in the service just now. But it must be remembered that the Postmaster-General has very frequently occasion to call upon some special agent to serve temporarily, as no gentleman will understand better than my friend from Iowa. There is one special agent now at the Galveston post-office, having been sent there by reason of certain charges made against the postmaster there. When special agents are thus required, the Postmaster-General cannot take an agent away from his regular and legitimate duties to send him off on a matter of emergency, such as this. Hence the seventy-seven agents now on the list are not to be understood as constantly employed, many being employed only now and then for temporary service.

Mr. KASSON. That being the case, it is decidedly safe for us to limit the number to seventy. The gentleman appears to have knowledge of the operations of this Department; and I am frank to say to him, from my experience in the same Department, that I have never seen an occasion under any circumstances when seventy agents, all told, for all purposes, were not ample to do the work required.

Mr. TYNER. I was a special agent in the Post-Office Department for some time; but I hope it will not be considered that I have any undue partiality for this class of officers when I say that they are the eyes through which the Postmaster-General sees; they are as it were his right arm; they are his personal representatives. I believe that every special agent performing his duty honestly and faithfully saves to the revenues of the Department five times the amount of his salary. If there were two special agents to every State of the Union, paid out of a regular appropriation for that purpose, besides those charged with specific duties, I believe it would be beneficial to the public service.

Mr. KASSON. I appreciate the importance of this branch of the service; and in what the gentleman has just said he has almost quoted the precise language of one of my former reports, in which I pronounced them the "eyes and ears of the Department." But the further fact must be borne in mind that many special agents are not voluntarily chosen by the Postmaster-General, but are urged upon him, and are not like my friend from Indiana and others whom I could name who have served in that capacity. My friend must know that many of these officers are appointed by the Postmaster-General under a sort of moral compulsion and ought not to be in the employ of the Department. With the number which my amendment proposes, if they are but the proper men, the work of that office can be efficiently done.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 32, noes 98.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk proceeded to read the second section.

Mr. TYNER. I move the committee rise.

Mr. RANDALL. O, no; let us finish the bill to-night.
Mr. TYNER. I withdraw the motion.
Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I renew it.
The committee divided; and there were—ayes 91, noes 77.
So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PARSONS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration a bill (H. R. No. 3094) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. O'NEILL. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report a bill (H. R. No. 3421) making appropriations for payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1875.

The bill was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, ordered to be printed, and made the special order in committee immediately after the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move that the bill be printed in the RECORD.
The motion was agreed to.
The bill is as follows:

A bill making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1875.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875:

For Army pensions to invalids, widows, and dependent relatives, revolutionary pensions and pensions to soldiers of the war of 1812, and for furnishing artificial limbs or apparatus for resection with transportation or commutation therefor; also for compensation to pension agents and the expenses of the several agencies, and for fees for preparing vouchers and administering oaths, as provided for by the acts of April 24, 1816; July 4, 1836; May 13, 1846; February 20, 1847; February 2, 1848; July 21, 1848; July 29, 1848; February 3, 1853; June 3, 1858; July 14 and 17, 1862; June 30, 1864; June 6 and July 25, 1866; July 27, 1868; June 17 and July 8 and 11, 1870; February 14 and June 8, 1871; February 20, 1872; and March 3, 1873; and all other pensions provided by law, $29,500,000.

For Navy pensions to invalids, widows, and dependent relatives, and pensions to sailors of the war of 1812, and for furnishing artificial limbs or apparatus for resection with transportation or commutation therefor; compensation to pension agents, expenses of agencies, and fees for preparing vouchers and administering oaths, as provided by the acts of April 23, 1800; February 20, 1847; August 11, 1848; July 14 and 17, 1862; June 30, 1864; June 6 and July 25, 1866; March 2, 1867; July 27, 1868; June 17 and July 8 and 11, 1870; June 8, 1871; February 21, 1872, and March 3, 1873; and all other pensions provided by law, $480,000: Provided, That the appropriation aforesaid for Navy pensions and the other expenditures under that head shall be paid from the income of the Navy pension fund so far as the same may be sufficient for that purpose: Provided further, That the fees for preparing vouchers and administering oaths which are now by law thirty cents in each case shall hereafter be twenty cents for the same, and no more.

NOTE.—The total sum recommended by this bill is $29,980,000.

E. D. LANE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of May 20, 1872, the claim of E. D. Lane for Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

JUAN MONTAYO.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of May 29, 1872, the claim of Juan Montayo for Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE YAZOO RIVER.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to House bill No. 102, granting to the Memphis and Vicksburgh Railroad Company the right to build a bridge across the Yazoo River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PROJECTILES, ETC.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to an appropriation for the procurement of carriages, projectiles, and other materials, labor, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CAPTAIN HURTT.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of March 10, 1874, in relation to the case of Captain Hurtt, assistant quartermaster, United States Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire and report whether in their judgment Major N. H. McLean, late assistant adjutant-general United States Army, was not unjustly treated on the trial of Captain Hurtt, late quartermaster volunteers United States Army, and on his retirement from the Army; and whether the facts disclosed in the record submitted to the House do not call for his reinstatement; and that to this end they are also empowered to send for persons and papers.

AMERICAN SHIP-BUILDING.

Mr. NEGLEY, by unanimous consent, presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, in favor of fostering in every manner the building of American ships by American mechanics of American materials; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM A. HOLLOWAY.

Mr. BARBER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3419) granting increase of pension from four to eight dollars per month to William A. Holloway, late a soldier Second Regiment Wisconsin Cavalry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MOUTH OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. SAWYER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3420) to provide for deepening the channel at the mouth of the Mississippi River; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER stated that Mr. DAWES would call the House to order to-morrow morning.

And then, on motion of Mr. KELLOGG, (at five o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ADAMS: The memorial and accompanying papers of John J. Anderson, surviving partner of Anderson & White, for compensation for cotton taken for fortification purposes in the late war, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. BARRERE: The petition of S. H. Thompson & Co. and others, wholesale grocers of Peoria, Illinois, for the passage of the bill defining a gross of matches, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BECK: The petition of Joseph Wilson, of Paris, Kentucky, for reference to the Court of Claims of his claim for damages for breach of contract by the Government of the United States, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. BURCHARD: The petition of citizens of Galena, Illinois, of similar import, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of John Smallwood and others, of Stephenson County, Illinois, for the construction of the Continental Railway and passage of the House bill therefor, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. COBB, of Kansas: A paper relating to the claim of Michael Knauber, of Council Grove, Kansas, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. FIELD: The petition of merchants and citizens of Detroit, Michigan, for the passage of the bill defining a gross of matches and providing for uniform packages, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. SAWYER: The petition of grange organizations of Winnebago County, Wisconsin, for the construction of the Continental Railway and passage of the House bill therefor, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. WARD, of New Jersey: A petition of soldiers and sailors, for an amendment of the soldiers' homestead law of 1872 so as to secure homesteads in the manner provided by the tree-culture act, to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. WHITE: The petition of Perry Underwood and others, for relief to the sufferers from the late flood in the State of Alabama, to the Committee on Appropriations.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 21, 1874.

The Senate met at one o'clock p. m., pursuant to adjournment.
Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read, wherein appeared the following entry, the motion to which it refers having been made after the doors were closed for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of executive business:

On motion by Mr. CAMERON,

Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns it be to meet at one o'clock p. m. to-morrow.

Mr. TIPTON. I rise to a correction of the Journal. I find that the Journal states that the Senate adjourned until one o'clock to-day. I find no reference at all to that adjournment in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The inference would be, therefore, on account of the general and universal accuracy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, that the Clerk in making up the Journal of the Senate must be mistaken in saying that the Senate adjourned until one o'clock to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator that the Journal is correct. The Senator should move to correct the RECORD.

Mr. TIPTON. If, then, the Journal is correct and this occurred, though time is so precious, I move to correct the Journal, because it is not on account of any ordinary circumstance that we have lost the hours from eleven o'clock until one o'clock. I therefore add to that record in regard to the motion to adjourn, that we adjourned until one o'clock "on account of a marriage in the family of the President of the United States which is to be consummated at the hour of eleven a. m. to-morrow." I move that that be added to the entry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska moves to amend the Journal. The amendment will be reported from the desk.

The Chief Clerk read the words proposed to be added to the Journal entry, as follows:

On account of a marriage in the family of the President of the United States, which is to be consummated at the hour of eleven o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

Mr. HAMLIN. I believe when the motion to adjourn to this hour was made that there was no reason given.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. None whatever.

Mr. HAMLIN. By what power the Senator from Nebraska defines the object and motive of all other Senators and means to make them say what never was said in the Senate, I do not understand. That may have been the object; Senators may have had that object in view; I do not know; but inasmuch as no Senator said such was the motive in adjourning to this hour, I do not know how the Senator can get at the result of his amendment.

Mr. TIPTON. I did not hear that motion to adjourn, and finding the other House in session at the usual hour of eleven o'clock I had to infer that something very unusual had occurred and been stated to the Senate explicitly, and as there is an utter absence of it from that RECORD which is authority here, as well as our Journal, I came to the conclusion that the Senate was enlightened on that subject and did deliberately do that which the country will suppose they did do when it understands how certain facts have occurred. If I am mistaken and no such statement was made to the Senate, I suppose I might be found in a minority in a vote to amend the Journal. But I inferred that the statement was made or the Senate would not at the present period of the session, when the time is so precious, have adjourned until one o'clock.

Mr. FENTON. I only wish to suggest to my friend from Nebraska that in view of the statement from the Chair that there was no explanation made when this motion was made, he had better withdraw his amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to amend the Journal.

Mr. HAMLIN. As that amendment can only express the opinion of the Senator who introduced it, I move that it lie on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, presented the petition of Francis Guilbeau, a citizen of San Antonio, Texas, praying compensation for the occupation by the Government of certain buildings owned by him; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SCOTT. I present a resolution passed by the Legislature of Pennsylvania upon the subject of the proposed cancellation of a contract made by the Postmaster-General for the carrying of the mails to China and Japan. I ask that the resolution be read and printed.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF PENNSYLVANIA, May 11, 1874.

Whereas by an act of Congress approved June 1, 1872, the Postmaster-General was directed, after due advertisements, to contract with the lowest bidder for additional monthly mail service to China and Japan, requiring the construction of four thousand ton iron steamships, in which only American labor and material should be used; and whereas the Pacific Mail Steamship Company were the lowest and accepted bidders, with whom a contract was made by the Government, and which company immediately proceeded to have ship-yards provided, and the vessels built in good faith, and each of one thousand tons burden in excess of their agreement, investing millions of dollars upon faith of the contract with the United States Government, and have now nearly ready for service two vessels, larger and faster than any now afloat in the world, and have meanwhile performed the desired service in other vessels, the Government sustaining no loss by the unavoidable delay in building the new ships; and whereas the violation of said contract by the Government would be to abandon the commercial control of the Pacific to the heavily subsidized lines of England and France, and seriously cripple, if not break up, the iron ship-building industry in this country, which, though in its infancy, gives employment to thousands of American mechanics and consumes millions of pounds of American coal and iron: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Legislature of Pennsylvania, in favor of the fostering in every manner of building American ships by American mechanics of American materials, hereby instructs its Senators and requests its Members to oppose any cancellation of the contract made by the Postmaster-General for the carrying of the mails to China and Japan, if it be shown there has been due diligence used in the construction of the required ships.

RUSSELL ERRETT,
Chief Clerk Senate.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, May 12, 1874.

The foregoing resolution was concurred in by the house of representatives.

WILLIAM C. SHURLOCK,
Chief Clerk of House of Representatives.

The resolution was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented the petition of L. L. Lomax, of Virginia, praying the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FENTON. I present the memorial of a committee appointed by the white settlers on the Allegany Indian reservation, in the State of New York, who pray for legislation by Congress to define their position on said reservation. This memorial refers to a bill which is now before the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I move that it be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FENTON presented the petition of Caleb White, of Baton Rouge, Louisiana, in behalf of his wife, E. A. White, who is sole heir, and for the co-heirs of Major Peter Catlett, deceased, praying indemnity for spoliations committed by the French prior to the year 1801; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of merchants of Buffalo, New York, praying for the passage of a law defining a gross of matches, and to provide for uniform packages; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of the trustees of the Reform School of the District of Columbia, praying Congress to grant such relief to that institution as may be deemed proper; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MITCHELL presented the petition of William Ira Mayfield, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of E. S. Joslyn, praying compensation for the use of his land as an Indian reservation; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Oregon, praying for the establishment of a mail-route between Upper Ochaco and Bridge Creek, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented the petition of George W. Hume, of Astoria, Oregon, praying the passage of an act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to direct the issue of an American register to the French brig Sidi, of Havre, recently wrecked at the mouth of the Columbia River, such registry to issue in the name of the "Sea-waif;" which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of Salmon B. Colby, praying the passage of a law referring his claim for compensation for timber taken from his land by the Government to the Court of Claims; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ALCORN presented the petition of Dr. J. J. Gibson, of Corinth, Mississippi, praying compensation for medical stores taken for the use of the Army during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WRIGHT. Yesterday I submitted the report of the committee of conference on the subject of the exportation of distilled spirits, and gave notice that I should call up that report this morning. It was ordered that the report be printed, and laid on the tables of Senators. I find the report has not been printed and is not here, and I therefore feel constrained not to call it up this morning, but give notice that I shall call it up to-morrow morning.

BILLS RECOMMITTED.

Mr. SCOTT. An adverse report was made a short time since by the Committee on Pensions on the bill (H. R. No. 2791) granting a pension to Franklin Stoner because of a defect in the evidence. That defect has been supplied; and I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was postponed indefinitely, and that it be recommitted, with this additional testimony, to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. The Committee on Pensions recently reported adversely upon the bill (H. R. No. 2214) granting a pension to Ann Humphreys, of Philadelphia, and it was indefinitely postponed. Since that time additional testimony has been received, and I desire to move a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I move now that the bill be recommitted, with the additional testimony, to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO AN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MITCHELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 3030) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1873 and 1874, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. JOHNSTON, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the memorial of Joshua H. Butterworth, praying for an extension of his patent for bank and safe locks, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was adopted.

Mr. BOGY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 638) for the relief of Joseph Dunlap, a settler on the Kansas Indian lands, in Kansas, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 748) to transfer to the Secretary of the Treasury all stocks and evidences of indebtedness due and held in trust by the Secretary of the Interior on account of the Creek orphan fund, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill

(H. R. No. 3088) to extend the time for completing entries on Osage Indian lands in Kansas, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1193) for the relief of the estate of Cornelius S. Underwood, late major and additional paymaster, United States Army, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely;

Mr. PRATT. The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Patrick Murphy, and several others, in which they pray for an amendment to the law of 1873 so that those soldiers who have lost a leg above the knee may be placed on the pension-rolls as of the second class, and receive twenty-four dollars a month, have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to report them back to the Senate, and ask to be discharged from their further consideration, upon the ground that the law gives twenty-four dollars a month to such soldiers as have lost their limbs above the knee.

The committee was discharged from the consideration of the petitions.

Mr. PRATT. The same committee, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Wyandotte, Kansas, praying that the law of March 3, 1873, granting bounties under the act of July 22, 1861, to colored soldiers, may be amended so as to authorize the payment of such bounty to the heirs of such as were borne on the muster-rolls as slaves, have directed me to report the same back with the recommendation that it be sent to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Susan M. Mallett, widow of Abel W. Mallett, late private Company G, Seventeenth Connecticut Volunteers, praying for leave to employ and pay for services necessary in the prosecution of her claim for pension, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT. I am instructed by the same committee to make a similar report on the petition of Adreanah Banks, of Bridgeport, Connecticut, praying the passage of a law enabling her to make such a contract as she may see fit for necessary services in obtaining her pension, upon the ground that if it be proper to amend the law which provides for the compensation of attorneys in pension cases at a maximum of twenty-five dollars, it should be amended so as to apply to all cases and not in individual cases.

The committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas Duff, of Hendricks County, Indiana, late corporal Company H, Seventh Regiment Kentucky Infantry, praying the passage of a special act giving him arrears of pension from the date of his discharge on surgeon's certificate of disability, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT. The same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of John Mabry, praying that he may be restored to the pension-rolls, he having been a soldier in the Mexican war who was dropped from the rolls under the act of 1862, have had the same under consideration and have directed me to report the same back and to move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition on the ground that the committee have already reported a general bill on that subject.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PATTERSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 790) for the relief of Mrs. Catharine Perry, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. M. B. McCulloch, praying a reconsideration of her claim for a pension, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 412) granting a pension to George H. Mellan, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of citizens of Michigan, praying that soldiers in the late war who have lost a leg above the knee shall be entitled to the same increase of pension as is allowed by law to those who have lost an arm above the elbow, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. WEST, from the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 178) to provide for the construction of the Fort Saint Philip Canal and its maintenance as a national public highway, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 577) for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2925) granting a pension to Dorothea Irons, mother of Lieutenant Joseph F. Irons, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Mary Jane Ball, widow of James P. Ball, late of the Second Kentucky Artillery, praying to be allowed a pension, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of F. A. Moore, late captain Company G, Second Iowa Infantry Volunteers, praying for an increase of pension, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Elizabeth H. Hartwell, praying for an increase of pension, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I am also instructed by the Committee on Pensions to report back, without prejudice, the petition of George Bagnall, of Kansas, asking for a pension. The committee consider that the petitioner has perhaps a good claim, but his testimony is insufficient, and they therefore instruct me to advise that the papers remain on the files of the Senate, so that they may be withdrawn.

The committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition, and leave given to withdraw the petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

JENNET H. NISBET.

Mr. PRATT. The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2181) granting a pension to Jennet H. Nisbet, have had the same under consideration, and directed me to report it back without amendment; and I ask that the bill be considered at the present time.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which is an instruction to the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll the name of Jennet H. Nisbet, mother of Thomas Nisbet, late a drummer in the Forty-fourth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. RAMSEY (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 835) for the relief and reappointment of Captain Thomas B. Hunt, assistant quartermaster in the United States Army; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 836) granting a pension to William Ira Mayfield; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 837) for the relief of E. S. Joslyn; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 838) for the relief of William J. Healy, late assistant paymaster in the United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. FENTON. I desire to introduce a bill without previous notice, and to remark that it is pretty nearly Senate bill No. 13. There are a few modifications of that bill embraced in this draught, and I ask leave to introduce it and to have it printed and referred to the Committee on Finance, who now have, on the reference of the bill from the House yesterday relating to moieties, the whole subject before them, and I present this bill to be printed so that it may facilitate their consideration of the subject.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 839) to establish the compensation of certain customs officers, to regulate the service in the collection of customs at the various ports in the United States, and the disposition of fines, penalties, and forfeitures incurred under the laws relating to customs, and for other purposes; and it was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALCORN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 840) for the relief of Dr. J. J. Gibson, of Corinth, Mississippi; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

QUARTERMASTER'S CORPS.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask permission to call up a bill that was objected to yesterday morning, for the purpose of passing it. It is the bill (H. R. No. 3116) to correct the date of commission of certain officers of the Army.

The bill was read.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported an amendment to amend the preamble by striking out in the fourth line the words "was entitled to be" and insert "would have been," and in the fifth and sixth lines to strike out "from which he was excluded by reason of" and insert "for," and in the last line to strike out "erroneously" and insert "previously;" so as to make the preamble read:

Whereas a vacancy of major in the Quartermaster's Department existed on the 18th day of January, 1867, to which Captain William Myers, of the Quartermaster's Department, would have been promoted under the laws then in existence, but for an appointment in said Department previously made. Therefore.

Mr. BOREMAN. I should like to have some explanation of that bill. I understand there are some officers who say this bill will do them injustice. I do not understand it precisely myself, and I should like to have some explanation of the necessity for the bill, how it will affect them.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will submit the question to the Senate on proceeding to the consideration of the bill which has been read.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the President to nominate and promote William Myers to be major and quartermaster, to date from the 18th day of January, 1867, to take place on the Army Register next below Major J. G. Chandler; but no officer in that Department is by the act to be reduced from his present rank, nor is any additional pay or allowance to be made to any officers by virtue of it.

Mr. LOGAN. This bill passed the House a few days ago and was agreed to by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs. As one of the members of the committee desires to make some suggestion in opposition to the bill, I will briefly state, as I do not wish to detain the Senate, that in 1866 a law was passed reorganizing the Quartermaster's Department, under which there were additional officers to be appointed by the President. The law provided that those additional officers should be appointed in the list of captains, who were to be assistant quartermasters. They were appointed, however, in the list of majors and lieutenant-colonels instead of as the law directed, which shut the senior captain out from his majority who but for that would be now at the head of the list, or nearly so, of majors. This bill is for the purpose of giving him the rank that he would have if he had been promoted at that time in accordance with the provisions of the statute. But at the same time that it gives him the same rank that he would have had then, it gives him no pay except of the rank he has now, which is that of major. It only puts him up on the Army Register; and it does not interfere with the rank or pay of any other quartermaster in the Department. That is the whole of the bill. It only gives him the rank he should have; it does not displace any officer, however erroneously he may have been appointed. It leaves them holding the same rank they hold now, and gives him the rank he would have been entitled to, according to my view of the law. That is the bill.

Mr. BOREMAN. I ask the Senator if this bill does not require the promotion of this officer above those who are above him at present? Does it not give him precedence of those who are above him at present.

Mr. LOGAN. It does, as a matter of course. He is now a major. It gives him rank as major, but puts him up on the file, as it is called, of the Army Register, to that point to which he would have been entitled under the law of 1866. I say it does not degrade any officer, but it puts this gentleman up so far as the file is concerned. That is to say, he will remain a major with the same rank that he has now, but he will rank other majors whom he does not rank at the present time under the appointment. That is the bill precisely.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. WADLEIGH] desires to give his reasons why this should not be done. I will first hear the reasons that he has to assign, and then I will give my reasons in brief why the bill should be passed.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, in 1866, after the declaration of peace, a reorganization of the Army became necessary, and an act was passed to fix it upon a peace basis, and that act increased the number of officers over those previously in existence. Among the other increases which it made in the various departments of the Army, the organization of the Quartermaster's Department was increased by three in the grade of colonel, six in the grade of lieutenant-colonel, and seven in the grade of major. That was a re-establishment of the Army upon the new peace footing, and that act created these vacancies.

The claim of this officer is that under and by virtue of that act these vacancies should have been filled by those persons who belonged to the regular Army, that they should have gone up in regular gradation according to their seniority, and that if the President and Senate desired in 1866 to fill these vacancies as they did do, by the appointment of meritorious and deserving officers of the volunteers, we shall now declare that action void and put him over the heads of the officers thus appointed and let him outrank the whole of them.

I have here a very extraordinary document presented by this "William Myers, major and quartermaster, of the United States Army," in which he asserts that he was overslaughed by the President and Senate in 1866 in violation of all law and of all precedent, and that vacancies created as these vacancies were had always been filled by promotion by seniority. I say that that assertion on his part in this paper, presented by him I suppose to every Senator, is entirely untrue and incorrect. The rule has been from 1811 down to this time, as I understand, that original vacancies, that is, vacancies created by statute, should be supplied or filled by selection, but accidental vacancies occurring in established regiments, or in established corps, should be filled by promotion by seniority; and such is the purport of the Army Regulations. The Army Regulations of May 1, 1813, provide as follows:

> Original vacancies will be supplied by selection; accidental vacancies by seniority excepting in extreme cases.

The same rule was repeated in precisely the same language in the regulations of 1814, 1815, and 1821. The Army Regulations of 1825 provide as follows:

> The Executive will fill original vacancies when created by selection; accidental vacancies below the rank of brigadier-general, by promotion according to seniority except in extraordinary cases.

The Army Regulations of 1841 provide that—

> Original vacancies will be supplied by selection; accidental vacancies to the rank of colonel, by promotion in the order of seniority except in extraordinary cases.

The Army Regulations of 1847 are precisely the same.

The Army Regulations of 1857 provide:

> All vacancies in established regiments and corps to the rank of colonel shall be filled by promotion according to seniority, except in cases of disability or other incompetency.

Under that clause in the Army Regulations of 1857 this quartermaster claims that the appointment of these volunteer officers to the rank which they now hold was in violation of law. But, sir, that rule provides that all vacancies in established regiments and corps shall be filled by promotion according to seniority. That is not this case. Here was not an established corps, with its officers appointed. There were vacancies created by law, vacancies created upon a reorganization of the Army, and offices to be filled according to the rules in the Army Regulations which have always existed, by selection by the President. And, sir, it was right that that should be so. To the volunteer force there came during the war very many men as well qualified to hold offices in the Army when it should be reorganized as the men who belonged to the regular Army; and the debates will show that one object of passing this law in the shape in which it was passed was to give the President and Senate an opportunity, if they saw fit, to appoint to these offices deserving officers among the volunteers, and not to compel the President to fill them all by promotion by seniority from those who belonged to the regular Army.

In 1866 the President made the appointments of those officers, over whom it is now attempted to set this Mr. Myers. Some of them were appointed from the volunteers. They were men who had earned their appointments by arduous service. One of them comes from my own State. At that time it was believed by the President and by the Senate that all these vacancies should not be filled, and that they were not obliged to fill them, by men who had been in the regular Army, but that they might go into the ranks of the volunteers to fill them. Accordingly those appointments were made which it is now attempted to outrank. They came before the Senate for confirmation. They staid before the Senate a period of forty days, when the whole question could have been investigated. The same Senate which passed that law confirmed the appointments of these officers; and now, seven years after that, comes in this Mr. Myers and claims that the President was wrong, that the Senate which helped pass the law was wrong, that everybody was wrong, and that only he, Mr. Myers, is right; that there was a violation of law which he now comes forward and asks Congress to redress and to make right.

Mr. President, this bill, if passed, will be a great injustice to the men who were appointed to these offices from the volunteer service. It will be in effect saying to them, and to the people of this country who furnished millions of men to the Army, when appointments are made to fill vacancies according to the old and long-established rules governing such appointments in this country from the volunteers, they shall not be allowed to hold their places; that only men who belong to the regular Army shall be allowed to fill offices in the Army created by Congress.

Sir, this assumption is a most impudent one. It is impudent in any individual to come in here after a lapse of seven years and say that appointments made in 1866 and confirmed by the Senate, which helped pass the law of 1866, were made in violation of that law and confirmed in violation of that law, and that the Senate that did that in 1866 committed a wanton violation of the law which they helped pass.

Furthermore, Mr. President, this same officer, as I understand, came here at the session of 1872, and to quiet this whole matter, as a compromise, the act of June 3, 1872, was passed, by which he was allowed to hold the rank which he now holds without having the grade which he now seeks to obtain. I understand that that was a compromise of this whole matter; that he agreed that if that act should be passed he would not claim anything more.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, if I can have the attention of the Senate for a moment, I desire to lay before them the law as it really is in this case, irrespective of what may have been the law in 1812.

Before coming to that, however, let me refer to the fact that my friend from New Hampshire lays great stress on the fact that this bill changes not the rank, but the relative positions on the Army Register of some volunteer officers and regular officers. I desire to say that there is no man in this country, in my judgment, who has been more devoted to the interests of the volunteers who are in the Army than myself. I have defended them on all occasions; I have stood by them, and am still ready and willing to do so. But when a question is presented to me as a legal proposition to decide, I must decide it irrespective of whom it may affect; and with all my prejudices in favor of the volunteer officers of the Army I have decided this question, so far as I am individually concerned, upon what is, in my judgment, the correct construction of the law under which these men were appointed.

Now let me see if I am correct. I state the proposition, first, that Mr. Myers is entitled by law—if he is not, I do not want him to have it—to the position that is provided for him in this bill. I will not go back so far as my friend from New Hampshire, but I will take the Army Regulations of 1861. Paragraph 19 of article 4 of the Army Regulations of 1861 provides that—

All vacancies in established regiments and corps to the rank of colonel shall be filled by promotion according to seniority, except in case of disability or other incompetency.

This article of the Army Regulations is by act of Congress continued in effect until otherwise provided by law. When new regulations were presented to the Congress of the United States some two years ago, these regulations were continued in existence until otherwise provided by law. Hence I start out with the proposition that under the regulations of 1861 all promotions in the Army up to the rank of colonel are to be made according to seniority. That, then, is the starting point. We find by going back to the laws of 1838 a provision in reference to the Quartermaster's Corps especially, and not applicable to any other corps. In 1838 in the organization of the Quartermaster's Corps it was provided:

That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate—

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to this language—to add to the Quartermaster's Department not exceeding two assistant quartermasters-general, with the rank of colonel; two deputy quartermasters-general, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel; and eight assistant quartermasters, with the rank of captain; that the assistant quartermasters now in service shall have the same rank as is provided by this act for those hereby authorized; and that the pay and emoluments of the officers of the Quartermaster's Department shall be the same as are allowed to officers of similar rank in the regiment of dragoons: Provided, That all appointments in the Quartermaster's Department shall be made from the Army, and when officers taken for such appointments hold rank in the line, they shall thereupon relinquish said rank, and be separated from the line of the Army—and that promotion in said Department shall take place as in regiments and corps.

And here is the particular point—

The law providing that in regiments and corps all promotions and appointments should be made by seniority. Thus in providing for the Quartermaster's Department in 1838, providing for two additional colonels and for eight additional quartermasters, Congress declared that they should be appointed from the Army and that they should take rank according to the law providing for regiments and corps. That law stood upon the statute-book until 1866 and was the law under which all appointments and promotions were made in the Quartermaster's Corps.

My friend from New Hampshire suggests—a strange point to me, but it is certainly relied on by him—that this law of promotion applies to organized corps. I admit that; but does my friend say that the Quartermaster's Department was not an organized corps in 1866? It certainly was an organized corps in 1866, and the law of 1866 only added to a corps already organized. If he admits that the Quartermaster's Department in 1866 was an organized corps, his whole argument loses its base and substratum; it falls to the ground, for upon that the whole question turns in his judgment. If there was no Quartermaster's Department in 1866, and then by a new organization a provision of law was made that allowed appointments from any other place except that corps itself by promotion, his argument would be correct; but if the corps was organized, as it was and has been for fifty years and over as a corps of the Army, I ask what effect does an addition to the corps make? It does not disband the corps; it does not disorganize the corps; it does not degrade the officers; but it is merely adding to a corps in the Army, and that addition is to be made according to the provisions under which the law says it shall be made, by the appointment of the President.

That being the fact, that this was an organized corps of the Army, it is well for us to look at what the law of 1866 is under which these appointments and promotions were made; and if I cannot satisfy the Senate that these promotions and appointments in that corps were made erroneously, then I hope the Senate will vote down this bill; but I think I can do so. The Quartermaster's Corps being then in existence, there was a reorganization of the Army as it was called; that is to say, there was a change after the war was over; there was a reduction of regiments and of corps. A reduction of all departments of the Army was provided for in the law of 1866; and in doing that a provision was made in reference to the Quartermaster's Department especially. What is that provision?

That the Quartermaster's Department of the Army shall hereafter consist of one Quartermaster-General, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier-general, six assistant quartermasters-general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of cavalry; ten deputy quartermasters-general with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant-colonels of cavalry; fifteen quartermasters, with the rank, pay and emoluments of majors of cavalry; and forty-four assistant quartermasters, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of captains of cavalry.

Up to that point there is no provision at all for the appointment of any one outside of the Quartermaster's Corps or outside of the Army. Up to the point of the forty-four captains, the law stands just precisely as it did in 1838, that these appointments should be made from the Army and that the promotions should be according to seniority. But here comes in a proviso, and it is under this proviso that these appointments to which there is objection were made:

And the vacancies hereby created in the grade of—

What?

in the grade of assistant quartermasters—

Mark you, the assistant quartermasters were captains, the quartermasters were majors, the assistant quartermasters-general were lieutenant-colonels and colonels—and the vacancies hereby created in the grade of assistant quartermaster shall be filled by selection from among the persons who have rendered meritorious service as assistant quartermasters of volunteers during two years of the war.

These assistant quartermasters of volunteers who were to be appointed under this section must first in order to qualify them have been volunteers in the Army of the United States; they must have been assistant quartermasters; they must have served for the period of two years with distinction. If they had served the period of two years in the volunteer service, then they were entitled to be appointed in the Quartermaster's Department; but to what rank and grade? To the rank and grade of captains and assistant quartermasters, but not to the rank and grade of major, lieutenant-colonel, or colonel——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, which is Senate bill No. 1.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask leave to go on a few minutes and have this matter disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from Illinois proceeding?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. In this connection I ask the Senator if he will allow me to call up a rule that has been reported from the Committee on the Revision of the Rules extending the morning hour one-half hour? There is so much crowding the Calendar——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I object to that now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from Illinois being allowed to complete his remarks? The Chair hears none.

Mr. LOGAN. Now let us see where the fault lies in these appointments. If President Johnson had appointed these men as captains in the Quartermaster's Department, he would have complied with the law. If these men were entitled to the grade of lieutenant-colonel and major, then we must say, first, that Congress has no right to direct how promotions shall be made in the Army; but if Congress has that power under the Constitution—and I presume no one will deny that—Congress has directed in this law of 1866 how these men should be appointed. They were to be appointed to the rank and grade of captain in the numbers of forty-four assistant quartermasters, and not in the rank of major, lieutenant-colonel, or colonel. But the facts are that they were appointed, one of them, I believe, lieutenant-colonel, and three or four as majors. By these appointments, I say the law itself was violated, for they were not entitled to be appointed except in the grade of captain. But we passed a law two years ago providing that these men, however erroneously they might have been appointed, should not be degraded. We now provide that they shall retain the places they have been appointed to, whether erroneously or not; but this bill provides for putting in his proper position a certain officer who then belonged to the grade of senior captain, who was entitled to be promoted to the rank of major and these men were entitled under this law to be appointed behind him and below him in file, but they were appointed above him in file in violation of the law.

As I said, I have as much respect for these men as any one. My sympathies are with them. They always go out to the unfortunate, especially toward a volunteer soldier; but these men were, in my judgment, improperly appointed under the law. This man that we ask the bill to be passed for, so that he may take rank according to the law itself under which the appointments were made, has served a series of years as quartermaster; and the fact that he was in the regular Army is no reason why he should not have the law administered to him as honestly and justly as if he belonged to the volunteer force. It makes no difference, so far as the law is concerned; it should be administered justly to all; and you cannot make the distinction between a regular officer and a volunteer officer under the law. He has served for a great many years in the Army, and I have a certificate here from the Department showing that during his service of some twelve or fifteen years, up to the time of this appointment, he had disbursed nearly $200,000,000, and had as good a record as any man in the Army. If a man has a good record in the Army and has done his duty faithfully, that is no reason at least why the law should not be fairly administered unto him as to a man who is just appointed by the President under the law.

I will say further that if any Senator will read that section of the law of 1866 under which these men were appointed, and will assert that the President had a right then to appoint them to a higher rank than that of captain, I will give up the case and agree that I am wrong; but I cannot read the law in any other way myself.

Mr. SCOTT. I desire to understand this case, and if the Senator will permit me, I should like to put a question to him. As he states the law, the passage of this bill would only give to the officer named in it the rank to which he would have been entitled if the former law had been observed.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCOTT. And will not take from any of the other officers below whom he is now placed any rank or pay to which they would have been entitled if the law had been observed at that time?

Mr. LOGAN. Exactly. It leaves every one in the department just as he is now. Instead of putting these men down as captains, as the law provided that they should be appointed, it leaves them as lieutenant-colonels and as majors; but this man having the rank of major now, the bill gives him no additional rank, no additional pay. It does not give a cent to anybody; it does not degrade any one; it does not take one cent of pay from any officer; but merely gives this one officer the rank in file that he would have had at that time, without adding to his pay and without diminishing the pay of anybody else. In other words, it leaves the number of quartermasters in the rank of major just as they are to-day; it does not change them at all; but it takes this man from his file below three or four others and puts him up three or four files, so that in grade he will outrank them by seniority merely, although they are equal in rank. That is all the bill will do. I think that it is fair and ought to pass.

Mr. BOREMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The unfinished business is Senate bill No. 1.

Mr. LOGAN. Will this other bill come up in the morning hour to-morrow as the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no unfinished business of the morning hour. It will require a motion to take up the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. It will take but a few minutes to dispose of it now, and I hope it will be disposed of.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I consented that the Senator should finish his remarks. I have no doubt the bill will lead to further discussion. I must ask for the regular order.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to lay aside all other business temporarily for the purpose of disposing of this bill.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I desire to be heard upon the question of law involved in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois moves to lay aside all prior orders and continue the consideration of the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senate will agree that we can take it up to-morrow morning in the morning hour, I shall make no objection to its going over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I take it for granted the Senator on reflection will withdraw the motion. The motion is not in order to lay aside the civil-rights bill temporarily; it is to lay it aside entirely.

Mr. LOGAN. I will withdraw the motion at present, but I say that I will attempt at least to call up the bill to-morrow morning.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 3094) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3421) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1875.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2078) for the benefit of occupying claimants.

CIVIL RIGHTS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to protect all citizens of the United States in their civil rights, and to furnish the means for their vindication," passed April 9, 1866.

Mr. MORTON. I am entitled to the floor on this bill; but the Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] desires to leave on the three o'clock train, and wishes to address the Senate before he goes. I therefore yield to him.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I am obliged to the Senator from Indiana for his courtesy. I do not propose to discuss the civil-rights bill at length. I only desire to say a few words in regard to one feature of the bill, and that is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] to strike out of the first section of the amendment of the committee these words: "and also of common schools and public institutions of learning or benevolence supported, in whole or in part, by general taxation."

I wish to tell the Senate what the State of Virginia has done in regard to the education of the colored people, to give some brief account of her common-school system, and then to endeavor to show what effect this bill, with that feature in it, would have upon that system.

If there is anything that the people of the Northern States, and especially of the New England States, boast of and are proud of, it is their common-school system. They are in the habit of boastfully pointing the world to what they have done in the way of educating their people. That they are entitled to great credit for the benefits of their common-school system I will not dispute; and when it is a question relating to that part of the country which contains an immense number of people who are not able to educate themselves they ought to be very careful in adopting any measure that would have the effect of destroying the system, especially where it is needed so much as in the South.

The last census exhibited a large degree of illiteracy in the Southern States, that illiteracy being almost entirely among the colored population. Some Senators seem to think that the southern whites are inflamed with hatred of the colored people, that they desire nothing so much as to destroy them, deprive them of every right, impose upon them every burden. Mr. President, there can be no greater mistake than that. The southern people ought to be credited at least with a reasonable degree of common sense; and it would be the last extent of stupidity for them, knowing well that the colored people are citizens, knowing well that they have the right of suffrage and of holding office, and that the fate of the black and white races in the Southern States is bound inextricably together, not to desire to educate the colored people and give them every opportunity of making good citizens. The fate of the whites is to some extent in their hands. Upon their knowledge, upon their good sense, upon their good conduct, depends the destiny of the government and of society in several of the Southern States to a very great extent; and that the white people should desire this race, who have so much to do with their own condition and future, to be savages and brutes is not to be thought of. The southern people have every desire to treat them with the last degree of justice, and to give them every opportunity of attaining the highest civilization possible for them to reach.

It is not worth while for me to tell the Senate what the condition of the State of Virginia was at the termination of the war. Everybody knows that that State was the theater of the war; that there was scarcely a county in it that was not trodden by soldiers; that from the beginning to the end large hostile armies were always in it, occupying a large portion of its territory, and marching over its whole extent. Of course, when the war ended the people were reduced to the depths of poverty. They had neither money nor anything else. In 1867 they held a constitutional convention and adopted a new constitution. That instrument provided that by the year 1876, or nine years after the convention was held, a common-school system should be put in operation in the State. Although the convention adopted the constitution in 1867, the State was not admitted and the constitution did not go into effect until 1870, when the representatives of the State were admitted to this floor and the floor of the other House. The Legislature assembled then under the new constitution, and had a majority of conservatives. They had the option to postpone putting the common-school system into effect until 1876, and if they had felt toward the colored race as it is represented they did and do, they would not have legislated upon the subject until the last moment, and they had abundant excuse in the condition of the people of the State. To build the school-houses, to pay the teachers, and incur the other necessary expenses, required the raising by taxation of a very large sum. That had to be raised from the whites almost entirely. The colored people had then, and have now, little or no taxable property; and nearly all the taxation of the State for common schools and every other purpose is paid by the whites. When the conservative Legislature had six years within which to put this common-school system into operation, and had the excuse of the utter prostration and poverty of the people of the State, certainly if they had been inclined to deny the colored man the privilege of the sort of education the common schools give him, they had then the opportunity by postponing action until 1876. But one of the first things the Legislature did after its organization was to provide by law for the establishment of these very common schools. They appointed a State superintendent, who proceeded at once to act with great energy and ability. The State was admitted the latter part of January, 1870. By July the county superintendents were appointed, and all the organization of the system was planned and put into practical operation. This was all done within six months after the admission of the State, when they had six years in which to do it.

Now, in order to show the appreciation by northern men of education and position of what the State has done, I will read a short extract from a statement made by General S. C. Armstrong, who is the principal of the Hampton Normal and Agricultural Institute, devoted entirely to the education of colored people.

General Armstrong says:

> I have wondered that, under the circumstances, human nature was capable of such active, hearty effort for the colored people as Virginians have shown, especially for their education and for the fullness and fairness of opportunity accorded them.

That is the testimony of a northern man, president of a colored college in the State of Virginia. And in connection with that college, to show still further how just and how kind the people of the State are to the colored race, I may mention that when the land fund given by Congress for agricultural colleges was to be bestowed in the State of Virginia, there was a contest as to where part of it should go, but every man in the Legislature conceded that one-third of it should be given to this Hampton Normal and Agricultural School, which is a school devoted entirely to the education of the colored people. The contest was long and protracted over the distribution of the other two-thirds, but that one-third was given to the colored people by universal consent.

The State having commenced its operations as soon as it was admitted into the Union and as soon as the Legislature organized under the constitution in January, 1870, before the end of that year the schools had increased to more than twenty-nine hundred, with about one hundred and thirty thousand pupils, and more than three thousand teachers.

Then in the year 1872 the State raised by taxation for public education $993,318.59. In that year the number of pupils was 166,377, and the number of teachers 3,695. In 1873 the receipts for school purposes were $1,015,054.31, and the value of school property $524,637.98. The whole number of public schools in the State in 1871 was 3,047; in 1872, 3,695, and in 1873, 3,696.

Our system provides that the schools of the white and colored people shall be kept separate; but except in that particular they are the same. They employ good teachers in both. They give the same proportion of public money to each. They build the same sort of school-houses for both, and the colored people are provided to the same degree precisely by this common-school system that the white people are. The schools are kept separate, and they are kept separate because the people of the State well know that that is the only way to make them successful. On that point I think there is but little difference of opinion in the State of Virginia.

In the last canvass, in October, 1873, for governor in that State, one of the most exciting that ever took place, and one which was regarded as settling definitely the political status of the State, whether it should be republican or conservative, when every party issue was made, and the people came forward to the polls and an unprecedentedly large vote was cast, Governor Kemper, the candidate of the conservative party, on every occasion opposed mixed schools, and Mr. Hughes, the candidate of the republican party, did the same thing. Upon that point there was no issue between them. They both took distinct and decided grounds upon the hustings and everywhere else against mixed schools. I heard no cause of complaint against Mr. Hughes on that score from his party in the State. On the contrary, his party supported him; and in order to show the views of the republican party in the State I desire the Secretary to read some extracts from the State Journal, the leading republican paper of Virginia, published at Richmond.

The Secretary read as follows:

We spent some little time yesterday in visiting our public schools, in company with the committee of the city council, and it is but justice to say that we were more than ever gratified at the evidences of improvement which were everywhere shown. The whole corps of instructors seemed to be imbued with the same spirit of advancement which has been shown in the supervision of the schools by Superintendent Binford, who has allowed no new methods of instruction to escape his observation, in his more recent visits to the schools in our larger northern cities. He is fully up to the demands of the day in matters of drill and discipline, and evidently keeps a sharp eye on the instructional corps under him, to see that his own suggestions, and those of the best practical educators in the land, are effectively carried out in the Richmond schools.

We doubt if there is a man of intelligence in our city who would desire to see the present economical and well-organized system of instruction in our public schools abandoned. The results of its brief trial are too marked and satisfactory, and its practical working too manifestly advantageous, to allow the system to be contracted or narrowed in its influence upon society. By extending the facilities of instruction to all classes of the community, the moral and intellectual character of our youth is improved, the standard of intelligence advanced, and industry, thrift, and general happiness and good order promoted. The whole community is feeling the benefit of these schools under their present admirable management. Destitute children are especially the recipients of their great benefits. The instruction they receive imparts a permanent impression to their minds, even though it be of only a few months' duration, and so far molds their character and shapes their destiny for the future, that the influence of ignorance and vice, twin companions that always fraternize in crime, is overcome, and society thereby receives a much greater benefit than it confers in the way of paternal blessing.

The public schools of Richmond are among the best to be found anywhere, and the time is soon coming when, if not tampered with by the meddling interference of outside legislation, they will be sought in preference to any other for the instruction of our youth of all classes, ranks, and conditions. We can imagine how their usefulness would be entirely destroyed, and the money now expended upon them be worse than thrown away, by legislating them into practical machines for the use of demagogues a thousand miles beyond our own borders. Here is the danger to the whole system of popular education in the South, and the sooner our members of Congress learn to attend to their legitimate duties under the Constitution, and let the domestic matters of the States alone, the sooner will the South and the whole country come up to the standard of educational advancement desired of them. The people of Virginia have made no distinction in the quality and quantity of education imparted to the white children of the State over its colored children. And especially is this true of our city schools under the superintendence of Mr. Binford. We think that if the visiting committee showed any preference in their attention to the schools yesterday, it was manifested in those of the colored children, where their stay was relatively longer, and greater commendation was bestowed.

The colored people of this city ought to petition Messrs. Sumner and BUTLER, of Massachusetts, to keep their meddling hands off the public-school system under which so many thousands of the brighter-faced children of their race are now being gratuitously educated. If they do not do this, but encourage such unconstitutional interferences as is now sought, they will wake up one of these mornings to find the doors of every public-school house in the State barred to all educational advantages for their own and white children alike.—Evening State Journal, Richmond, December 19, 1873.

THE CIVIL RIGHTS BILL AND THE SCHOOLS.

The colored people of Virginia have to-day a magnificent opportunity to show their good sense and their real interest in the permanent welfare of this Commonwealth. An ill-judged measure is now before Congress which may compel the education of white and colored children. We do not care to discuss any abstract principle involved in this measure. The practical results which are absolutely certain to follow its adoption alone concern us. We know as well as any future consequence of present action can be known that the attempt to combine the two races in the schools will result in breaking up the schools altogether. We recognize this fact as caused by prejudices and antipathies which we have no power to uproot. It is enough that we see a great and beneficent system imperiled by an attempt to reduce an abstraction to immediate practice. Let us appeal to the practical common sense of every intelligent colored man to say if he really believes that his people will get better educational privileges by attending the same schools with the whites. Will that state of feeling be engendered which leads men to give generously to the common cause of education? Will the contact of the children thus enforced be such as to encourage the hope of higher attainments and more fraternity of sentiment as they grow up?

Let it be considered that the colored race, though large in numbers, constitute a minority of the whole people. Acting with the greatest unity possible, they have no power to compel concessions from the whites. Whatever they get must come as the free gift of the majority. It is therefore wise to be very careful about insisting upon that which can do no practical good to either race, but is sure to bring confusion and ruin to the most precious and most truly conservative institution of our modern society—the free schools. Let our colored people at once ask Congress to desist from any legislation which enforces mixed schools, and they will have established a new claim to respect and confidence.—Evening State Journal, Richmond, January 6, 1874.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, those extracts indicate the sentiment of the republican party in the State of Virginia on this subject. I think the gentlemen in the Congress of the United States who support this bill do not know the sentiments of the colored people of the South quite as well as we who live there. They see none of that class but agitators, politicians, and adventurers from our section of the Union. They do not see the kind, docile, and friendly negro at home on the plantation. They know nothing of him; they know nothing of his wishes; they know nothing of the good feeling that subsists between him and his white neighbor. They only see a few men who come here as a general thing to agitate, to excite, and to make mischief. The large body of the colored people are not disposed to be anything but home-staying and quiet and peaceable. This large body of colored people living on the farms and on the plantations of white men, knowing well how this thing is, desire to let the present school system, under which they are obtaining such advantages, to remain exactly as it is. They oppose change as much as the white people. They oppose it because they know they are unable to educate themselves, and because they know that the whites are voluntarily taxing themselves for the education of the colored people. They know well that whenever the whites withdraw their support from the system, they have no further chance of education. We have the spectacle of the whites in the State of Virginia, composing more than half of the population and holding all, or nearly all, the property of the State, voluntarily taxing themselves $1,000,000 annually in their impoverished condition for education, and bestowing a proper proportion of that sum upon the colored people with perfect and entire impartiality.

That is the system which prevails now, and the system which this bill, if passed as it stands, will break up. The Congress of the United States is asked to deprive the colored people of a great benefit now accruing to them, of the only chance they will have of making themselves citizens competent to exercise the rights which Congress has given to them. In the face of remonstrances from some of their own party who know the facts, in the face of the information conveyed in sincerity and candor to them, that the result will be as we have said, the republican majority of this body propose to insist upon the passage of a law which shall destroy this system which is such a benefit to the colored race.

As an indication of the feeling of the white people of the State of Virginia on this subject, I desire to read a short extract from the inaugural message of Governor Kemper. Speaking of the colored race, he says:

Non-residents, whatever their claims to eminence, ability, or philanthropy, can never understand the character and circumstances, or wisely administer to the wants of our colored population. Ourselves and no others are qualified to perform the task assigned us by Providence. If not restrained and thwarted by superior power, we will perform it resolutely and effectually by promoting the best interests of both races. We intend to perform it by scrupulously guarding the newly-acquired rights of the colored man; by affording him liberal facilities for education, and inciting him to use them; by developing his best qualities and capacities, and interesting him in the preservation of order and the enforcement of justice; by shielding him against devices of the vicious and thriftless; by habitually according him the kindness, forbearance, and sympathy which his comparative dependence and weakness invite, and by cultivating such relations of active co-operation and mutual trust and common interest between the races as will combine both in recovering the general prosperity, and make each an indispensable instrumentality for that end.

That extract expresses clearly and properly the feeling of the whites of the State of Virginia toward the colored people. If let alone, the interests of the colored men are safe in their hands. If Congress takes them out of our hands we shall not be responsible for the result.

[Mr. MORTON addressed the Senate. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, a few days since I submitted to the Senate an amendment to the first section of the bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary. As I then foresaw, a difference of opinion has arisen touching the construction of that portion of the first section which it is the purpose of my amendment to strike out. The words are these: "That all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of common schools"—omitting what is said of theaters—"and public institutions of learning or benevolence supported in whole or in part by general taxation." Those words I ask the Senate to strike out, and to insert in their place these:

And also of every common school and public institution of learning or benevolence, endowed by the United States, or that may hereafter be endowed by any State, or supported, in whole or in part, by public taxation.

Mr. ALCORN. Will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Certainly.

Mr. ALCORN. I would inquire why the Senator inserts in his amendment the word "hereafter?" I shall move to strike out the word "hereafter," and I desire to give the Senator an opportunity of explaining the reason why he inserts there the word "hereafter."

Mr. BOUTWELL. If I could see my way clearly in a legal view to strike out these words and to open every institution of learning in the country that has been endowed by any State, I certainly should be in favor of following the suggestion made by the Senator from Mississippi; but, after consideration, I thought that proposition open to so many objections that it was not wise for me to undertake to support it. As regards the future, I think it clear if we have power to legislate in the direction proposed by this bill, that we have power to open every institution that may hereafter be endowed by any State, and, of course, to open every institution that has been endowed by the United States or that may hereafter be endowed by the United States.

Dividing the provisions of this bill into two classes, those which relate to institutions of learning in one class, and all the other institutions into another class, the advantages of the class of institutions of learning are so far superior to all the others that I consider all those others comparatively unimportant.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] yesterday, in commenting upon the political aspect of this bill, was pleased to say that Senators on this side the Chamber it was likely would support this bill because it secured the suffrages to their party of seven or eight hundred thousand colored voters in this country. Sir, he underestimated vastly the political advantages, not to the party but to the ideas which that party has entertained for the last fifteen or eighteen years, to which it is pledged, on which the new government has been constructed, and which every party that claims power in this country in the future and maintains that claim by any considerable lease of power will be obliged to accept. Opening the public schools of this country to every class and condition of people without distinction of race or color, is security, not for the votes of seven or eight hundred thousand negroes now living in this country and entitled to the right of suffrage, who are bound to the republican party by ties which they cannot sunder, but it is security that through the coming generations so long as the history of this time shall remain and the great deeds in which we have participated shall have influence on public affairs, the rising generation in each of these generations will advance to manhood with the fixed purpose of maintaining these principles. Intelligence is the security for the principles in which we believe, and ignorance is the protection of the principles and the policy we oppose. A system of public instruction supported by general taxation is security, first, for the prevalence and continuance of those ideas of equality which lead every human being to recognize every other human being as an equal in all natural and political rights; and the only way by which those ideas can be made universal is to bring together in public schools, during the forming period of life, the children of all classes, and educate them together.

The public school is an epitome of life, and in it children are taught so that they understand those relations and conditions of life which, if not acquired in childhood and youth, are not likely afterward to be gained. To say, as is the construction placed upon so much of this bill as I propose to strike out, that equal facilities shall be given in different schools, is to rob your system of public instruction of that quality by which our people, without regard to race or color, shall be assimilated in ideas, personal, political, and public, so that when they arrive at the period of manhood they shall act together upon public questions with ideas formed under the same influences and directed to the same general results; and therefore, I say, if it were possible, as in the large cities it is possible, to establish separate schools for black children and for white children, it is in the highest degree inexpedient to either establish or tolerate such schools.

The theory of human equality cannot be taught in families, taking into account the different conditions of the different members and the families composing human society; but in the public school, where children of all classes and conditions are brought together, this doctrine of human equality can be taught, and it is the chief means of securing the perpetuity of republican institutions. And inasmuch as we have in this country four million colored people, I assume that it is a public duty that they and the white people of the country, with whom they are to be associated in political and public affairs, shall be assimilated and made one in the fundamental idea of human equality. Therefore, where it would be possible to establish distinct schools, I am against it as a matter of public policy.

But throughout the larger part of the South it is not possible to establish separate schools for black children and for white children, that will furnish means of education suited to the wants of either class; and therefore in all that region of country it is a necessity that the schools shall be mixed, in order that they shall be of sufficient size to make them useful in the highest degree; and it is also important that they should be mixed schools in order that, when the prejudice which now pervades portions of our people shall be rooted out by the power of general taxation, they will be able to accumulate in every district those educational forces by which the public schools shall be made useful to the highest degree for which there is capacity in the public will with the power of general taxation.

On the one side, then, is a prejudice which is founded in no real distinction except the distinction of color; and on the other is a public policy founded with the institutions of our country and essential to their perpetuity; and between prejudice on the one hand and a wise public policy on the other, I think the time has passed when we ought for a moment to hesitate as to the course we should take. Therefore I have in this amendment endeavored to make that certain about which there is some doubt, derived from the language used by the committee in their report.

My chief object, Mr. President, is already accomplished in what I have said upon this point; but the remarks made by the Senator from Ohio yesterday led me to consider whether the committee that prepared the fourteenth amendment and the Congress that submitted it to the country were altogether mistaken as to the scope and power of that amendment. I do not rely chiefly upon those provisions of the fourteenth amendment to which attention has been called in the Senate. I rely more largely upon the first clause of that amendment which the Senator from Ohio yesterday read, and in passing from it was pleased to say, "This is merely a definition." The words are these:

> All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

Two things are here declared: first, that certain persons classified are citizens of the United States; and secondly, they are citizens of the State in which they reside. They may have been so; but in contemplation of this provision of the Constitution they are not made citizens of the State in which they reside by the laws or constitution of that State, but made so by the power of the United States, exercised through Congress and through the requisite number of States composing the Union, and made so, as in the State of Kentucky for example, in defiance of the will of the State. It was an exercise by the General Government in a constitutional way of the highest power known to our system of government in taking all the people of the State of Kentucky, and, in defiance of the will of that State and of the people residing in that State, declaring that they were at the same time citizens of the United States and citizens of the State of Kentucky; and the Senator from Ohio calls that a "definition!"

Now, then, what is the effect of this? First, they are citizens of the United States; and secondly, they are citizens of the State in which they reside. First and best, the most comprehensive, indeed the only definition of citizenship, is equality of rights. You need no other definition. Therefore, citizens of the United States residing in the State of Kentucky by this amendment to the Constitution of the United States are made equal to each other in all their rights, privileges, and immunities; and of course one of the first rights, not of the citizen of the State, but of the citizen of the United States, is that in the State in which he chooses to reside he shall be the equal of any other citizen in that State. That is his first immunity, his first privilege; and therefore he claims as a citizen of the United States every privilege and immunity of citizenship in the State in which he resides; and therefore it is that I say, with all deference, the Supreme Court of the United States made a great mistake when they gave the opinion or intimated in the Slaughter-house cases that there were two classes of rights appertaining to citizens of the United States: those derived from the Government of the United States, and those derived from the States. As a citizen of the United States, the first right of the citizen of the State is that he shall enjoy all the privileges and immunities of a citizen of the State; and therefore as citizens of the United States, no State can make a distinction between the citizens of the State over which it has jurisdiction.

If there were nothing substantive in the Fourteenth amendment except this single sentence to which I have called attention and the fifth section, that "The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provision of this article," would it not be ample for all these purposes? Could any State distinguish among its citizens in the matter of education, in the matter of the enforcement of the laws? Could it say that one class of its citizens should be subject to certain laws and other classes exempt from them? Could it bestow upon certain classes privileges and immunities derived from the legislation or the constitution of the State which were denied to other classes or to other citizens? Is there not in this single sentence, with the legislative power attached to it, authority in the General Government to interfere and secure to the citizen of every State all those privileges and immunities which belong to, or are enjoyed lawfully by, any other citizen of the same State by virtue of the fact that that citizen is, first, a citizen of the United States, and secondly, made a citizen of the State by virtue of the power of the General Government? And therefore the power of the General Government extends equally to the security of privileges and immunities to the citizen as a citizen of the State as to the citizen as a citizen of the United States, because he is a citizen of the United States and a citizen of the State by virtue of the same Constitution, framed by the same authority, and ratified by the same competent number of the States of the Union.

I say, then, Mr. President, without going further, that I find in this provision a sufficient foundation on which to rest this bill. Public instruction is a privilege. It appertains to certain citizens of the State by virtue of the laws of the State. If it appertains to certain citizens by virtue of the laws of the State, under this provision of the Constitution every citizen has a right to the enjoyment of the same privilege.

I did not rise to discuss the constitutional question, but rather to lay before the Senate the reasons, in brief, which have led me to propose the amendment on which I hope to have the favorable judgment of the Senate before the vote is finally taken on the passage of the bill.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, I have something to say upon this bill; but before proceeding with my remarks I ask the Secretary to read the bill, or rather the substitute reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The bill will be reported if there be no objection.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, agreed to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause and to insert the following in lieu of the matter stricken out:

That all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of inns, public conveyances on land or water, theaters, and other places of public amusement; and also of common schools and public institutions of learning or benevolence supported, in whole or in part, by general taxation; and of cemeteries so supported, subject only to the conditions and limitations established by law, and applicable alike to citizens of every race and color, regardless of any previous condition of servitude.

SEC. 2. That any person who shall violate the foregoing section by denying to any citizen, except for reasons by law applicable to citizens of every race and color, and regardless of any previous condition of servitude, the full enjoyment of any of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, or privileges in said section enumerated, or by aiding or inciting such denial, shall, for every such offense, forfeit and pay the sum of $500 to the person aggrieved thereby, to be recovered in an action on the case, with full costs; and shall also, for every such offense, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $1,000, or shall be imprisoned not less than thirty days nor more than one year: Provided, That the party aggrieved shall not recover more than one penalty; and when the offense is a refusal of burial, the penalty may be recovered by the heirs at law of the person whose body has been refused burial: And provided further, That all persons may elect to sue for the penalty aforesaid or to proceed under their rights at common law and by State statutes; and having so elected to proceed in the one mode or the other, their right to proceed in the other jurisdiction shall be barred. But this proviso shall not apply to criminal proceedings, either under this act or the criminal law of any State.

SEC. 3. That the district and circuit courts of the United States shall have, exclusively of the courts of the several States, cognizance of all crimes and offenses against, and violations of, the provisions of this act; and actions for the penalty given by the preceding section may be prosecuted in the territorial, district, or circuit courts of the United States wherever the defendant may be found, without regard to the other party. And the district attorneys, marshals, and deputy marshals of the United States, and commissioners appointed by the circuit and territorial courts of the United States, with powers of arresting and imprisoning or bailing offenders against the laws of the United States, are hereby specially authorized and required to institute proceedings against every person who shall violate the provisions of this act, and cause him to be arrested and imprisoned or bailed, as the case may be, for trial before such court of the United States or territorial court as by law has cognizance of the offense, except in respect of the right of action accruing to the person aggrieved; and such district attorneys shall cause such proceedings to be prosecuted to their termination as in other cases: Provided, That nothing contained in this section shall be construed to deny any right of civil action accruing to any person, whether by reason of this act or otherwise. And any district attorney who shall willfully fail to institute and prosecute the proceedings herein required shall, for every such offense, forfeit and pay the sum of $500 to the person aggrieved thereby, to be recovered by an action on the case, with full costs, and shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000.

SEC. 4. That no citizen possessing all other qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law shall be disqualified for service as grand or petit juror in any court of the United States, or of any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and any officer or other person charged with any duty in the selection or summoning of jurors who shall exclude or fail to summon any citizen for the cause aforesaid shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined not more than $5,000.

SEC. 5. That all cases arising under the provisions of this act in the courts of the United States shall be reviewable by the Supreme Court of the United States without regard to the sum in controversy, under the same provisions and regulations as are now provided by law for the review of other causes in said court.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, I approach the consideration of this question with a feeling of solemnity and sadness which I can hardly express to you or the Senate. When I see a bill of this character urged upon the Senate as it is by a vote so united, so constant, so persistent, as to show manifestly that it is the result of a caucus movement; when I see great questions of this kind that involve the very fundamental doctrines of our Government, the life, the liberty, the happiness not only of all who live here now, but of generations to come, urged by such a vote and discussed in an empty Senate; and when I know that the fiat has gone forth, that the republican caucus has acted, and that the legislation of the Senate is ascertained, I must say that I approach the consideration of the subject solemnly and sadly. But one thing I can do, sir. One thing no power can deprive me of doing. I can express to the Senate in a few brief words my views in reference to this bill and my apprehensions for the future of this country if the bill should ever become a law.

Mr. President, when my colleague presented this bill to our consideration in a speech characterized by his usual ability, he appealed for the support of the doctrines of the bill to a recent decision of the Supreme Court in what is known as the Slaughter-house case; when the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] addressed the Senate this morning he appealed to the same high authority; but when the Senator from Massachusetts who has just taken his seat [Mr. BOUTWELL] arose he frankly and candidly stated to you, as none others have yet done, what this bill meant and what was desired to be accomplished by it; and then he told you that the Supreme Court had erred in the very decision cited by the leading advocate of the bill, cited by the gentleman who has it in charge, cited by that great and distinguished lawyer, the Senator from Indiana, in support of the bill. That decision the Senator from Massachusetts regrets and he finds it wrong. The Senator from Massachusetts was not only frank and honest in telling us what was meant by the bill, but his acute mind failed not to see that the Slaughter-house case had been cited so absurdly in defense of the propositions of this bill that no man could stand upon it.

Such, Mr. President, are the circumstances under which this bill comes before us. An amendment is offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to provide for equality in public schools "supported in whole or in part by public taxation." If there was no frankness in stating the exact objects and purposes of this bill, if the decisions of the Supreme Court were cited here to maintain propositions the very reverse of which they decided, worse than that is the flimsy disguise under the words, "supported in whole or in part by public taxation." Does the Government of the United States tax the citizens of a State for the public schools of that State? That is the inference to be derived from the bill. That is what is claimed, that you can control and regulate the public schools; that they are your creatures, because your money goes to support them. No such thing is true; and none know better than the men from New England, where started the very foundations of the common-school system which spread throughout this Union, North and South, that they came from individual and State enterprise and are still local institutions. "Public taxation!" The term is misused; there is no public taxation for the benefit of schools.

When my neighbors and fellow-citizens assemble in front of a public house in the streets of the town in which I live, and elect a presiding officer, and are called upon to vote how much money they will raise that year for roads in that township; when they are called upon to vote how much money they will raise in that township for public schools; when they are called upon to vote whether John Smith or Henry Green shall be the school superintendent for that year, they are members of a corporation; they are voting away their own money; they are doing that by the law that governs this country, the law of the majority; and when two or three persons who desire to compel that school superintendent to put the two sexes in one room or people of different color in the same room, who desire to deny to that school superintendent, under the direction of the majority who elected him, the right of managing the discipline of that school, come and get an edict from Congress, and Congress takes charge of that school, a private institution established by me and my friends, controlled by the majority, as all other institutions in this country ever have been from the foundation of the country, what do they do? They break down the law of majorities; they give to a minority the power of controlling the local institutions of this country, and by an arbitrary edict from Congress, from Washington, they absolutely destroy the fundamental doctrine of the Government, which is the government of majorities.

Mr. President, is this law asked for the benefit of South Carolina? No, sir. When the minority, the oppressed race now in South Carolina went to the other House begging that Congress might look into affairs there to see whether some help could not be given to them, to see whether at least a commission could not be sent down there to inquire if they were not being robbed and plundered, you could not interfere with the majority in South Carolina, but you can interfere with a majority in New Jersey; you can interfere with a majority in New York; and if the oppressed white people of South Carolina who are crying to you for help to-day were colored people, you would listen to their request beyond peradventure.

So, Mr. President, if it is not for South Carolina, which can regulate its own schools and make them equal, that this thing is demanded, if it is demanded for New Jersey, and for New York, and for other States, does it not prove that it is to control the majority of the people? Why does not my colleague go to the Legislature of his native State? Why does he not go to the Legislature of New Jersey? That is nearer home; that is nearer to our people; that is nearer to our common schools; that is nearer to the parents, nearer to the children to be educated. He has praised over and over again our noble common-school system. We all love it. Why should that be broken down? Why not go to the State, that was able to create those institutions, the State that has nourished and cherished them, the people who vote their money to educate white and black? Why not go to that Legislature and ask for a law of the State compelling what this act of Congress proposes to compel them to do? Because the Legislature of New Jersey, composed as it may be of one party or the other, never would pass any such law. They know that their constituents do not desire it. They know that it is not right. Then, because they will not do it, because the school districts desire to exercise their ordinary rights, we are suddenly to be found guilty of violating a provision of the Constitution of the United States, the fourteenth amendment, an amendment whose object was to secure, and whose words do secure, to all citizens without distinction of race or color equality before the law; an amendment which has attached to it the phrase that Congress may make appropriate laws to carry its provisions into effect. No State shall pass any law abridging or denying equality. The Constitution of the United States said no State shall pass any bill of attainder or any ex post facto law, and contained other provisions of a similar character. Was it ever contended that that gave power to Congress to legislate over the citizens of a State in reference to the relations between them and the State, in reference to the relations between them and the boroughs, the cities, the townships, and the counties, and their civil rights arising from their local laws? Was it ever contended that the deprivation to a State Legislature of the power to pass bills of a certain character gave power to Congress to legislate over the citizens of that State? Has that ever been suggested?

In reply to an argument of a similar kind of the Senator from Ohio yesterday, it was asked, what is the meaning, then, of the clause in relation to "appropriate legislation?" The meaning of the clause, if it had any meaning at all, was such legislation as would enable any person so aggrieved by such a law of a State to bring that case before the Supreme Court, to have that law declared unconstitutional, as the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] well said in a question he put to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] this morning. That was the purpose of that clause. The Senator from Indiana said he was a part of that legislation, of that enactment. I know he was a very important part, and there may have been some design in his mind or in the mind of some one else to give some great power, a power greater than the Constitution itself could give to Congress, under this provision in regard to appropriate legislation; but to my mind I can see no meaning in it whatever but power to carry out by law the denial and deprival of the power of the State to pass any legislation which should abridge or deny the rights intended therein to be protected.

But, Mr. President, it may be more proper, as my remarks shall be directed mainly to an examination of some legal propositions that have been raised upon this measure, to consider for a moment what this bill is. This bill provides——

Mr. COOPER. If the Senator from New Jersey will permit me I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Before that motion is put—of course I wish to accommodate my colleague in every way that I can—I desire to say to the Senate that to-morrow I hope it will be agreeable for them to come to a vote on this question. While I wish to economize time, I desire that all may have an opportunity of being heard who propose to speak upon the bill; and to-morrow I shall ask the Senate to stay here until a vote is arrived at.

Mr. STOCKTON. I desire to say to my colleague and also to the Senate that the motion to go into executive session is not made at my instance. Before I got up to speak, gentlemen on the other side asked me if I had any objection to going into executive session, and I told them that I left it with them. The Senator sitting on my right [Mr. COOPER] made the motion at their request. I do not desire an executive session, nor do I desire to prevent it. I shall be very happy to agree to the motion if gentlemen on the other side desire it. I am ready to speak now or to-morrow, just as it may be convenient to the Senate.

Mr. ALCORN. I wish to say that I attempted to get the floor immediately after the Senator from Massachusetts; and I trust I shall have an opportunity to speak on this question. I hope my friend from New Jersey will not press a vote upon it until we can have a full discussion; not a waste of time, but a sufficient discussion.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to say in this connection that there are several gentlemen who intend to make speeches on this subject; and I do not think, for one, that I can agree to allow this bill to come to a vote without making a protest against it. While I have no speech prepared on the subject, and therefore cannot say how much of the time of the Senate I may consume, yet I cannot consent that a vote shall be taken upon it without at least entering a protest against the passage of the bill, and I know there are other gentlemen who desire to speak. I do not wish to consume any more time than I consider proper.

Mr. HAMLIN. If there is no Senator who desires to address the Senate on the pending question, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion is now pending; but before submitting it the Chair will lay before the Senate bills from the House of Representatives for reference.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

A bill (H. R. No. 3094) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3421) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1875.

AMENDMENT TO AN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MITCHELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 2343) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes; which, with the letter accompanying it, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. COOPER. I renew the motion to go into executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and twenty-three minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 21, 1874.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m., Mr. DAWES in the chair as Speaker pro tempore. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. POLAND obtained the floor, and yielded to Mr. ORTH.

TOTAL ABSTINENCE IN SERVICE OF UNITED STATES.

Mr. ORTH. I desire to present a petition signed by over 2,000 ladies of Indianapolis. I ask that it may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

The undersigned, members of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Indianapolis, Indiana, do most earnestly and respectfully, in consequence of the great and growing evil of intemperance, spreading, as it does, crime, pauperism, ignorance, and other miseries through all grades of our American society, petition your honorable body to so amend the oath required of all officers in the service of the United States as to require them to abstain from the use of intoxicating drinks as a beverage during their term of office. This we ask because of the representative character of the persons whom the people have placed in such official positions, and because of the salutary and beneficial influence such requirement and consequent conduct would exert upon the young men of the nation; and also believing that such an amendment to the oath of office, with penalty of removal for its violation, would annually save millions of dollars to the Government. We therefore most earnestly pray you to grant our request by laying down such rules of sobriety for the government of those whom the people have placed over them as will secure our request.

Mr. ORTH. I ask that the memorial may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and that it be referred to the Committee on Civil Service Reform.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL BENJAMIN S. ROBERTS.

Mr. WOOD. I ask unanimous consent to submit for present consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War and the General of the Army be directed to furnish, for the information of this House, copies of all the orders, letters, communications, and telegrams on the files of their offices relating to the retirement from active service of Lieutenant-Colonel Benjamin S. Roberts, Third Cavalry, United States Army, embracing not only the letters of said Roberts, but the letters of any other party or parties relating to such retirement, and the answers to the same.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BECK. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. What is the regular order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] is on the floor, and is yielding to gentlemen for the transaction of business by unanimous consent.

Mr. BECK. On what question is the gentleman from Vermont entitled to the floor?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the bill in relation to the Sanborn contracts.

Mr. POLAND. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. MCCRARY.]

OCCUPYING CLAIMANTS.

Mr. MCCRARY. I ask that by unanimous consent the bill (H. R. No. 2078) for the benefit of occupying claimants be taken from the Speaker's table and that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in. The amendments are merely verbal.

There was no objection; and the bill was taken from the Speaker's table.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

In line 4, after the word "entitled," insert the words "in the Federal courts."

In line 8 strike out the words "emanated from," and insert in lieu thereof the words "been granted by."

Mr. CROUNSE. I would like to hear the bill read as thus amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

That when an occupant of land, having color of title, in good faith has made valuable improvements thereon, and is, in the proper action, found not to be the rightful owner thereof, such occupant shall be entitled in the Federal courts to all the rights and remedies, and upon instituting the proper proceedings such relief as may be given or secured to him by the statutes of the State or Territory where the land lies, although the title of the plaintiff in the action may have been granted by the United States after said improvements were so made.

Mr. KASSON. That is all right.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. MCCRARY moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. POLAND. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, who have leave to report at any time, to report back the bill (H. R. No. 3097) for present consideration.

Mr. BECK. I call for the regular order.

Mr. POLAND. I apprehend that this is the regular order.

Mr. BECK. The regular order is the unfinished business, which is the bill relating to the Sanborn contracts.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the title of the measure which the gentleman from Vermont desires to report will be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order of business, if insisted on, is the unfinished business of yesterday, which under the rules takes precedence of other business; and that is the bill in relation to the Sanborn contracts.

Mr. TYNER. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, to resume the consideration of the post-office appropriation bill. I have no objection, however, to having the bill which has just been presented by the gentleman from Vermont read.

Mr. BECK. That is not the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pending the call for the regular order, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TYNER] moves to suspend the rules, which would give precedence over the unfinished business, and to go into Committee of the Whole on the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. BECK. What does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] say?

Mr. FOSTER. I am willing to yield for the motion of the gentleman from Indiana if the post-office appropriation bill is not likely to occupy more than ten minutes, as that gentleman assures me.

Mr. BECK. Then I do not object.

The motion of Mr. TYNER was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the absence of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PARSONS,] the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] will take the chair in Committee of the Whole.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SCOFIELD in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3094) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the third section, as follows:

SEC. 3. That if the revenues of the Post-Office Department shall be insufficient to meet the appropriations made by this act, then the sum of $5,634,842, or so much thereof as may be necessary be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply deficiencies in the revenue of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1875.

Mr. TYNER. I offer the following amendment:

In line 6 strike out "$5,634,842" and insert in lieu thereof "$5,497,842."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the committee proceed to consider the bill (H. R. No. 3421) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1875.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of pensions for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1875:

For Army pensions to invalids, widows, and dependent relatives, revolutionary pensions, and pensions to soldiers of the war of 1812, and for furnishing artificial limbs or apparatus for resection, with transportation or commutation therefor; also, for compensation to pension agents and the expenses of the several agencies, and for fees for preparing vouchers and administering oaths, as provided for by the acts of April 24, 1816; July 4, 1836; May 13, 1846; February 20, 1847; February 2, 1848; July 21, 1848; July 29, 1848; February 3, 1853; June 3, 1858; July 14 and 17, 1862; June 30, 1864; June 6 and July 25, 1866; July 27, 1868; June 17 and July 8 and 11, 1870; February 14 and June 8, 1871; February 20, 1872; and March 3, 1873; and all other pensions provided by law, $29,500,000.

For Navy pensions to invalids, widows, and dependent relatives, and pensions to sailors of the war of 1812, and for furnishing artificial limbs or apparatus for resection, with transportation or commutation therefor; compensation to pension agents, expenses of agencies, and fees for preparing vouchers and administering oaths, as provided by the acts of April 23, 1800; February 20, 1847; August 11, 1848; July 14 and 17, 1862; June 30, 1864; June 6 and July 25, 1866; March 2, 1867; July 27, 1868; June 17 and July 8 and 11, 1870; June 8, 1871; February 20, 1872, and March 3, 1873; and all other pensions provided by law, $480,000: Provided, That the appropriation aforesaid for Navy pensions, and the other expenditures under that head, shall be paid from the income of the Navy pension fund, so far as the same may be sufficient for that purpose: Provided further, That the fees for preparing vouchers and administering oaths, which are now by law thirty cents in each case, shall hereafter be twenty cents for the same, and no more.

The total sum recommended by this bill is $29,980,000.

Mr. O'NEILL. In regard to this bill, I wish to state to the Committee of the Whole that I was instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to prepare it with this last proviso changing the amount of fees charged for preparing vouchers and administering oaths from thirty to twenty cents in each case. Individually I am opposed to that reduction, for the reason that it reduces inordinately the salary of many of the pension agents, most of whom disburse large sums of money, some of them as large as $1,500,000 a year, and many of whom under this proviso would receive salaries of less than $2,000 each for that immense responsibility. Hence I propose to offer an amendment to this bill in the form of an additional proviso which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BUNDY. I would suggest to the gentleman to make the fees twenty-five cents in each case, and that will be satisfactory.

Mr. O'NEILL. I prefer the amendment I propose, for it makes an absolute and positive compensation.

The Clerk read as follows:

And be it further provided, That the net compensation of pension agents who disburse over $900,000 per annum shall be $4,500 per annum.

Mr. HOLMAN. That, I believe, is not an amendment authorized by the Committee on Appropriations. I make the point of order upon it.

Mr. KASSON. So do I; but I will reserve my right to raise the point of order until an explanation is made.

Mr. O'NEILL. I am very glad the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] is going to make a point of order on this proviso of the bill and the additional proviso which I propose to add to the bill, as I am opposed to the reduction to twenty cents.

Mr. KASSON. I say I will reserve my right to raise a point of order until an explanation is made.

Mr. O'NEILL. The object of the committee in reducing the amount charged for these vouchers is to reduce the compensation of the pension agents and consequently reduce the general expense to the Government of paying pensions. I have examined this matter very thoroughly; I have looked into all its details. I am satisfied that by reducing the fees from thirty cents to twenty cents you will cut down the pay of many of these men, who have as great responsibility upon them as have any officers of the Government anywhere, in a very unreasonable degree, making their compensation entirely inadequate to the unceasing duties performed by them.

My idea would have been for the Committee on Appropriations to have made the charge for preparing these vouchers twenty-five cents in each case, if compensation was to have been fixed by the charge upon vouchers. In that way the salary of no agent throughout the country, and there are fifty-eight of them, would have been more than $5,000, save two, and theirs would have exceeded that sum but slightly. A few of them would have received less than $4,000, and many of them would have received less than $3,000, thus ranging down to but a few hundred dollars, which I consider an inadequate compensation for the services performed by them. I believe a fixed amount is the better plan. Although I am not in favor of paying large salaries, and although I think several pension agents of the country now receive too much compensation, yet I am for paying men liberally for performing the services which are required of them by the Government. Nowhere in any of the Departments of the Government will you find officers who have more responsibility upon them, who are kept more constantly occupied, and who are generally paid less remuneration and salary than are most of the pension agents. The compensation they receive runs up from the trifling sum of less than $100 in a few instances to more than $7,000 in one instance, which is, save in another agency where the amount is over $6,000, in my opinion the only instance of too much salary. Most of them receive from $1,000 to $2,000, and a few $3,000 a year.

The proviso which I propose to add to the bill would make the compensation of about nine pension agents in the country $4,500 per annum. Out of the fifty-eight pension agents, some of them disbursing nearly $1,500,000 of pensions, if this proviso of mine be adopted there will be not more than nine of them whose compensation will be $4,500 a year. I propose that those who disburse over $900,000 per annum shall receive that compensation and no more. That is to say, the salary of such agents shall be $4,500, and the entire expense of carrying on their offices to be paid by the Government.

Mr. BUNDY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. O'NEILL. Certainly.

Mr. BUNDY. As I understand the gentleman's proviso it will affect only those who pay out $900,000 a year, while all those who pay out less than that amount will receive the twenty cents a voucher as proposed by this bill. Am I correct?

Mr. O'NEILL. I will explain that the agents who disburse less than $900,000 a year would receive a compensation much larger in proportion than those disbursing over that amount; they must, however, pay out more than $350,000 to entitle them under the present law to receive $4,000 salary.

Mr. DAWES. I did not hear the proviso of the gentleman distinctly, but I would inquire whether it is intended that they shall receive the fees now provided by law, not exceeding $4,500 a year?

Mr. O'NEILL. A net compensation of $4,500; not above that amount.

Mr. DAWES. And that compensation is to be derived from these fees?

Mr. O'NEILL. From the fees for preparing vouchers, and from the amount appropriated by this bill. In other words, the Government under the proviso I have offered will pay these men $4,500 a year as their own pay.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must insist upon the point of order, that the proviso of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. TREMAIN. And I raise the same point in regard to the last proviso of the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is too late.

Mr. O'NEILL. I understand that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] made his point of order not only on my amendment but on the last proviso of the bill.

Mr. TREMAIN. That was so stated, or I would have raised it myself.

Mr. KASSON. My point of order was intended to cover only what was proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] as an amendment to the bill. I did not intend to make a point of order against the last proviso of the bill itself.

Mr. O'NEILL. Then I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] will raise the point.

Mr. TREMAIN. I raise the point of order. It was stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] that the point made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] covered the proviso to the bill.

Mr. O'NEILL. The gentleman from Iowa certainly rose to make the point of order.

Mr. FORT. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] is too late. The amendment has been discussed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I submit that it does not make any difference as to the time when the point is raised. There was an order made some weeks ago, on motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] that an amendment changing the method of paying pension agents should be in order upon this bill; and therefore what the committee has put on the bill is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will decide the question. At the time when the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] made his point of order the proviso in the bill had been read; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] had risen to offer an amendment to that and had discussed it before the gentleman from Iowa rose at all; so that even if the gentleman from New York had at that time made the point of order which he supposed the gentleman from Iowa had made, it would have been too late.

Mr. KASSON. It is due to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that I think he understood me as covering the proviso by my point; but in the confusion I thought he referred to another proposition to which he had offered an amendment. Both being in manuscript, I went to the Clerk's desk to examine the bill and found that I had been in error.

Mr. O'NEILL. I will state, in fairness to the committee, how I understood the point of order to have been raised by the gentleman from Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] propose an amendment?

Mr. O'NEILL. I proposed an amendment to the proviso which has been read—a proviso which had not been acted on. Of course the gentleman from Iowa was in time to raise a point of order on the proviso itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order was made by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] and the Chair sustained the point.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the committee now rise and report the post-office and pension appropriation bills to the House.

Mr. O'NEILL. Is my proviso pending?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana raised the point that it was new legislation, and the Chair sustained the point of order.

Mr. O'NEILL. I may perhaps discuss the proviso itself after the bill comes into the House.

Mr. FORT. If the gentleman from Iowa had not been understood to raise the point of order, other gentlemen would have done so.

Mr. KASSON. But the Chair has decided that I should have been too late myself.

Mr. O'NEILL. I understand the Chair has decided the proviso offered by me is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has so stated. The point was made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and sustained by the Chair. The pending motion is that of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that the committee rise and report this bill and the post-office appropriation bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. DAWES having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SCOFIELD reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 3094) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, and the bill (H. R. No. 3421) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1875; that the Committee of the Whole had directed the former bill to be reported with sundry amendments, and the latter without amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the pension appropriation bill just reported from the Committee of the Whole will be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move to amend by striking out "thirty cents"——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there is to be debate on this bill the Chair will first call up the post-office appropriation bill, which is first in order.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TYNER. I call the previous question on the post-office appropriation bill and the amendments thereto reported from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to know whether the amendment adopted yesterday in Committee of the Whole providing that the Agricultural Report shall be sent free through the mails may be amended by substituting a provision that that document shall be sent for a sum not exceeding ten cents.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the previous question should not be sustained that amendment will be in order.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TYNER] to yield to me that I may offer such an amendment and have it pending.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana moves the previous question on this bill and the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No amendment is in order pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] will be permitted to state his amendment.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I hope the amendment may be read, and I trust the gentleman in charge of the bill will allow it to be offered.

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point of order that no amendment is now in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point is well taken. The question is on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the previous question should be voted down, would it be in order to move an amendment providing that no greater price shall be paid for the transportation of the mails than that allowed prior to March 3, 1873?

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask a parliamentary question as to the effect of seconding the demand for the previous question—whether it will not cut out the proposed amendment suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE?]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is ready to answer any parliamentary question within his knowledge. The gentleman from Indiana must be aware, having been a member of this House for very many years, that the effect of voting down the previous question is to open the bill to amendment.

Mr. LAWRENCE demanded tellers on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. TYNER and Mr. LAWRENCE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 102, noes 36.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered.

The amendments of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union were concurred in, except the following, on which a separate vote was demanded by Mr. SMITH, of Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the first section the following proviso:

Provided, That the Monthly and Annual Reports of the Department of Agriculture shall pass free through the mails.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio, demanded the yeas and nays,

The House divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 98.

Mr. RANDALL demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SMITH, of Ohio, and Mr. RANDALL were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 31—more than one-fifth of those present.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the House——

Mr. RANDALL. I object to debate.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not propose to debate, but to move to lay aside this bill for the purpose of allowing the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] to proceed with the Sanborn contract matter.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. While the previous question is operating, that can only be done by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes; I object.

The question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 134, nays 71, not voting 85; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albright, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Averill, Barry, Beck, Bell, Biery, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg Buckner, Bundy, Burchard, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Caldwell, Cannon, Cason, John B. Clark, jr., Clements, Clymer, Stephen A. Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Woodford, Woodworth, and Pierce M. B. Young—85.

So the amendment was concurred in.

During the vote,

Mr. DURHAM stated that his colleague, Mr. BROWN, had been called home by sickness in his family.

Mr. HOOPER stated that he was paired with his colleague, Mr. E. R. HOAR, who, if present, would vote in the negative, while he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. MERRIAM stated that his colleague, Mr. HALE, was paired with Mr. BROWN.

Mr. DANFORD stated that his colleague, Mr. ROBINSON, was necessarily detained from the House.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, stated that his colleague, Mr. WILLIAMS, who was detained from the House by sickness, would, if present, vote in the affirmative.

Mr. SHANKS stated that his colleague, Mr. WILSON, was absent by leave of the House on the business of the House.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by its Secretary, Mr. GORHAM, notifying the House that that body had concurred in the House resolution fixing the day of final adjournment for June 22 proximo; and also that it had agreed to the conference asked for on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the naval appropriation bill, and had appointed Mr. SARGENT, Mr. MORRILL of Maine, and Mr. DAVIS as managers of said conference on its part.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs on ordering the post-office appropriation bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion. If the House does not order the bill to be engrossed, I understand it will then be open to an amendment to restrict these charges by railroads for transportation of the mails.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. TYNER. Mr. Speaker, if upon the passage of the bill I am entitled to the floor, I desire simply to make a correction, which I failed to do yesterday for want of time, in regard to the circular to which the attention of the Committee of the Whole was then called by my colleague, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

The House will remember that during the debate yesterday my colleague [Mr. HOLMAN] called attention to a circular which had been sent out by Giles A. Smith, the former Second Assistant Postmaster-General, to the officers of the several railroad companies of the country, asking them to enter into a contract with him, by which he was to have a certain per cent. if he should secure for those companies an increase in the rate of compensation for carrying the mails. My colleague called attention to that circular and had it read at the Clerk's desk.

I had not time yesterday, although I referred to the fact, to have read at the desk a repudiation of that pretended contract on the part of one of the leading railroad officials of the country, and I now rise merely to set that matter right, and for no other purpose. I will ask the Clerk to read the passage I have marked in the Congressional Globe, from a report of the Senate proceedings of March 7, 1872.

The Clerk read as follows:

RAILROAD MAIL TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. CAMERON. While I am on my feet, I desire to present a telegram which I received last night of a somewhat personal nature; and I ask to have it read, so that it may appear in the Globe.

The Secretary read as follows:

NEW YORK, March 6, 1872—9.10 p. m.

Allow me to thank you for prompt response on my behalf to a circular read in Senate to-day at the instance of Senator MORRILL, of Vermont. No such use of my name was ever authorized. I heard of it in Washington in January last, and called upon Mr. Smith for explanation, when he assured me that no such application had been or would be presented to either House of Congress.

THOMAS A. SCOTT.

Hon. SIMON CAMERON,
United States Senate.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that this telegram lie on the table with the paper which was presented yesterday.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TYNER. The name of Thomas A. Scott, vice-president of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, was read in the Senate of the United States on the 6th of March, 1872, as one of the parties who had entered into a contract under the circular referred to by my colleague yesterday. This is a statement on the part of Colonel Scott that he repudiates this pretended contract, and that he never entered into it.

About the same time I received myself a private letter from David Macy, the general superintendent of the Indianapolis, Peru and Chicago Railway, whose name also appeared as one of the parties who had entered into a contract, authorizing me to state to the House if an opportunity should offer, that he never signed such a contract, and knew nothing about it. I think I am therefore justified in saying that so far as the use of these two names is concerned it was entirely unauthorized. And I think I may also add that Giles A. Smith had no such contract with any railroad officials in the country.

I now demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before the previous question is called I wish to say a word.

Mr. TYNER. I will yield for an inquiry, if my colleague desires.

Mr. HOLMAN. My colleague has given two single instances of a repetition of this contract. Has my colleague authority for saying that the other persons named by Giles A. Smith in his letter did not assent to this proposition of his?

Mr. TYNER. O, no.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does he say that Jay Gould did not agree to that arrangement?

Mr. TYNER. O, no. I presented two names only, Thomas A. Scott and David Macy, as parties who disclaim having entered into any such contract. And I will say to my colleague that I have no authority from any other gentleman whose name appeared there for saying that he did not enter into such a contract.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then up to this time, though this exposure was made on the 6th of March, 1872, and although the legislation contemplated by that law has actually passed through Congress, yet only two out of the twenty or thirty officials of railroad companies mentioned by Giles A. Smith, in his letter, have disclaimed entering into that arrangement.

Mr. TYNER. I know of no others who have disclaimed it. My colleague will bear in mind that this circular was read on the 6th March, 1872, in the Senate, and that the law increasing the compensation to railroads did not pass until nearly one year thereafter.

Mr. HOLMAN. It was passed on the 3d March, 1873, a year after the exposure. Within a year after the exposure, the very kind of legislation contemplated by Giles A. Smith was carried through Congress, and, up to this time, the increase under the rates secured to these railroad companies is a little rising a million and a half of dollars.

Mr. TYNER. That is my colleague's statement about it.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is the increase to these corporations. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] stated, when that bill was being passed through this House, as an amendment to an appropriation bill of last Congress, that these railroad companies would make a half-million by it. Instead of that they have made almost a million and a half of dollars, up to this time, under the operation of that law.

Mr. TYNER. I desire to present this one other point only, and I shall then call the previous question. It is this: that if two gentlemen, two of the best-known railroad officers, whose names were read to the Senate on that occasion, have declared publicly or privately within a year that they were not parties to that contract, it is sufficient to throw a shade of suspicion around the whole matter.

Mr. HOLMAN. How does it happen that these other distinguished gentlemen who were mentioned have not repudiated the use made of their names?

Mr. TYNER. I cannot answer for them more than my colleague.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not one of the others has ever disclaimed that conspiracy against the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. TYNER. I now call the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. TYNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MERCY ANN HALL.

Mr. SCOFIELD, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs a bill (H. R. No. 3422) for the relief of Mercy Ann Hall, widow of Captain Charles F. Hall; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. O'NEILL. I now call for the previous question upon the pension appropriation bill reported from the Committee of the Whole without amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. O'NEILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I ask leave to print, as a portion of the debate, some remarks I have prepared upon this pension appropriation bill just passed.

Leave was accordingly granted. (See Appendix.)

COLLECTION OF MONEYS DUE THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. FOSTER. I now call the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the unfinished business coming over from yesterday, the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the title, as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 3256) to repeal so much of the act approved May 8, 1872, entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1873, and for other purposes," as provides for the employment of persons to assist the proper officers of the Government in discovering and collecting moneys withheld, and for other purposes.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to enter a motion to recommit this bill.

Mr. BECK. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion until I can submit an amendment and have it pending.

Mr. FOSTER. I will do so.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I ask that the bill be read. It has not been read yet.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Have we a right to object to the withdrawal of the motion to recommit?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has the floor, and is entitled to withdraw the motion to recommit, which he does for the purpose of allowing the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to move an amendment.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Can another amendment be offered?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That depends upon whether the motion to recommit is renewed.

Mr. POLAND. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he intends to bring this matter to a conclusion to-day?

Mr. FOSTER. That is my intention.

Mr. POLAND. On yesterday the consideration of the matter was postponed because of the illness of the gentleman from Massachusetts from the Essex district, [Mr. BUTLER,] who, we all know from what has taken place in this House, has some feeling and interest in this matter. I understand that he is still confined to his house by sickness and unable to be here. I am not authorized from him to ask for any postponement of this matter, but it occurs to me that if his presence yesterday was necessary or proper or any fairness to him required that the bill should then be postponed, that consideration is equally operative to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair desires to state to the House that this matter was postponed yesterday upon his request. He is informed that his colleague, because of whose illness it was postponed, is no better to-day.

Mr. FOSTER. I am advised by the friends of General BUTLER that he will not be able to be out for some time, and that it is their desire that this matter shall be considered now.

Mr. POLAND. As I stated before, I have no authority from General BUTLER, or anybody else speaking on his behalf, to ask for any postponement of this bill. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] feels authorized to say that it is to be proceeded with with his assent and concurrence, I have no remarks to make.

Mr. FOSTER. I have the best authority in the world for saying what I do.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

SECTION —. That no Senator, Representative, or Delegate to Congress shall, after his election or during his continuance in office, act as agent, attorney, proctor, advocate, solicitor, or counsel, for any person against whom suits or proceedings other than criminal may have been or are about to be commenced for violation of the revenue laws, or who has any claim for drawbacks or reclamations for duties, taxes, or excises paid or demanded, or for the United States, or any agent, employé, informer, officer or officers of the revenue or customs service of the United States, in any suit or proceeding relating to the customs dues, excises, or taxes; nor shall he receive any compensation, gift, or reward from such persons or officers for any service, advice, counsel, or aid afforded such person or persons, officer or officers, agent, informer, or employé. And any person offending against this provision shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, and imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten years, at the discretion of the court trying the same, and shall be forever thereafter incapable of holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States. And any person who shall pay, or cause to be paid, to any Senator, Representative, or Delegate, or to any person for his use or benefit, directly or indirectly, any sum of money or other thing of value because of such service or advice, relating to any of the matters aforesaid, shall have the right at any time to bring suit for the recovery thereof or its value, in any court of the United States, against such Senator, Representative, or Delegate, or the person or persons who received the same, or may unite all such persons in the same suit.

Mr. FOSTER. I now renew the motion to recommit.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I call for the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1873, and for other purposes," approved May 8, 1872, as provides for the employment by the Secretary of the Treasury of not more than three persons to assist the proper officers of the Government in discovering and collecting any money belonging to the United States, when the same shall be withheld by any person or corporation, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to revoke and annul all contracts for the collection of such taxes made under and by authority of said act.

SEC. 2. That the Court of Claims shall have no authority to consider or decide upon any claims for damages by reason of the discontinuance of the contracts aforesaid, or for any profits or percentages under them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that at half past one o'clock a bill, which has been made the special order to the exclusion of all other orders, will take the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] from the floor.

Mr. GARFIELD. Allow me to suggest that it might now be arranged that the special order fixed for half past one should be postponed long enough to allow this bill to be concluded.

Mr. FOSTER. I prefer, Mr. Speaker, that this bill should be disposed of to-day; and I give it as my opinion that the whole question can be disposed of in two hours. If the special order just referred to could be postponed for an hour, we could finish the bill.

Mr. MCKEE. That would not leave time enough for the disposition of the special order to-day, which is the bill for the admission of New Mexico.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The special order when it is reached will be under the control of the majority of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I regret the absence of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER;] and did I know that he could be present within a reasonable time, I would yield to the postponement. I trust that he may soon be restored to his usual health and vigor, and should he desire to reply to the remarks I make, I hope the opportunity may be given him.

Mr. Speaker, while I know that the bill under consideration is practically without opposition, yet in view of the fact that the Sanborn contracts have been the subject of inquiry by resolution of this House and also of a wide-spread and deep feeling throughout the country against them, I beg your indulgence for the purpose of showing the House and the country something of the legislation of the Forty-second Congress on this subject, the manner in which the law has been administered, and the effect of the law as administered upon the officers of the Government; all of which, in my judgment, show unmistakably that the law was unwise, and that its administration justly subjects the Treasury Department to severe criticism.

The system of spies and informers has been distasteful to the people of all countries and in all ages. They have always been especially distasteful to the people of this country, and at the present time they are so obnoxious as to arouse the just indignation of the mercantile interests of the country to such an extent as to cause them to send here representatives from their various organizations demanding the unconditional repeal of all laws authorizing the appointment of such officials. The record of the outrages that have been committed by these creatures of the law are perfectly astounding, the revelation of which has been so startling as to convince the Ways and Means Committee, before whom they were made, that all this class of laws should be promptly modified or repealed.

The Forty-second Congress, responding to the wishes of the people, did, as they supposed, repeal this system so far as the Internal Revenue Department was concerned, and the House did by an overwhelming vote, on the motion of the then gentleman from Pennsylvania, Judge Mercur, now the honored judge of that State, pass a resolution sweeping the whole system of spies and informers from the statute-books. Such laws, in my opinion, cannot be justified; but the attempt has been made on this floor to justify them, on the ground that spies and informers make merchandise of their information, and that public morals are so low as to justify the purchase.

The Forty-second Congress supposed they had repealed the laws authorizing the purchase of the merchandise of spies and informers; but, through the practice of permitting legislation of a general nature to be included in appropriation bills, the law which we now propose to repeal was inserted by the Senate as an amendment to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill of 1872, and it was the subject of two conferences. So obnoxious to the House was this Senate amendment, that it came within ten votes on the call of the yeas and nays of defeating the whole bill. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, as well as the gentleman from Indiana, now a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, both members of the conference committee on the part of the House, yielded to the demands of the Senate conferees solely for the purpose of saving the bill, but not until they had so amended the proposition as to relieve it, as they thought, of its objectionable features.

The net result, then, of the legislation of the Forty-second Congress on this subject was the repeal of the law making merchandise of the information of spies and informers, and substituting in lieu thereof a monopoly of the business in three persons, of whom John D. Sanborn has become the chief, and so valuable have these wares been to him, that for them have been paid over $200,000.

The following is the provision of law passed by the Forty-second Congress; placing the monopoly of the informers' business in the hands of three persons:

And from and after the passage of this act the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power to employ not more than three persons to assist the proper officers of the Government in discovering and collecting any money belonging to the United States whenever the same shall be withheld by any person or corporation, upon such terms and conditions as he shall deem best for the interests of the United States but no compensation shall be paid to such persons except out of the money and property so secured; and no person shall be employed under the provisions of this clause who shall not have fully set forth in a written statement, under oath, addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, the character of the claim out of which he proposes to recover or assist in recovering moneys for the United States, the laws by the violation of which the same have been withheld, and the name of the person, firm, or corporation having thus withheld such moneys; and if any person so employed shall receive, or attempt to receive, any money or other consideration from any person, firm, or corporation alleged thus to have withheld money from the United States, except in pursuance of the written contract made in relation thereto with the Secretary of the Treasury, such person shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $1,000 or imprisoned not less than two years, or both, in the discretion of any court of the United States having jurisdiction; and the person so employed shall be required to make report of his proceedings under such contract at any time when required to do so by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Under this provision of law contracts were made, the first of which bears date the 8th of June, 1872, and was made with William H. Kelsey, late a member of Congress from New York, who appears to have been actively engaged in securing the passage of this law.

Kelsey's contract embraced a number of passenger railways in the city of Philadelphia. He made but little progress, and on the 3d of August, 1872, requested that his contract be revoked, and that Malcolm Campbell should succeed him. Accordingly on the 9th of August, 1872, said Campbell obtained a contract, which was virtually a transfer from Kelsey; and Campbell, making but little progress, surrendered his contract on the 23d day of November following, when J. Nicholson Elbert succeeded him, obtaining a contract on the 25th of the same month; Kelsey retaining an interest through the several successions.

Under date of July 29, 1873, John Clark, of Philadelphia, made application for, and on the 1st of September following obtained, a contract, out of which some $3,000 have been collected.

It appears by the correspondence submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury that grave charges were made by gentlemen in Philadelphia against Clark. So impressed was Solicitor Banfield with the gravity and truthfulness of these charges, that he suggested to his superiors that Clark's contract ought to be annulled, but it was never done.

It also appears that the collections made under the foregoing contracts amount in the aggregate to about five thousand dollars, and the two last-named contracts are yet in force. The foregoing covers all the contracts made under the law of May 8, 1872, except that of John D. Sanborn.

John D. Sanborn, a resident of Massachusetts, who is represented as having been personally well acquainted with Secretaries BOUTWELL and Richardson, who is also represented in the testimony of Collector Simmons, of Boston, as being a general "lobbyist" in the Legislatures of Northern New England; and that he "fixes things" in these Legislatures for the railroads and great corporations of Maine, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts; and who is further represented by the same authority as the "mysterious man of Massachusetts," on the 15th of July, 1872, applied for, and on the 13th of August following obtained, a contract, which is signed by W. A. Richardson, Acting Secretary of the Treasury, for collection of taxes illegally withheld by thirty-nine distillers, rectifiers, and purchasers of whisky in the city of New York.

At this time Sanborn was in the employment of the Government as a special agent of the Treasury Department, his service as such agent commencing in the year 1869 and ending May 31, 1873.

The very cases put into this first contract were worked up by one Warwick Martin, who was employed by Sanborn in his capacity of special agent of the Treasury Department, Martin being paid for his services by Sanborn, who took for such payments vouchers which were allowed to Sanborn as a part of his expense account and were paid by the Government, the amount thereof being about $3,000. As a result of the work of Sanborn and Martin, or for other reasons unknown, many if not all the parties whose names appear in this first contract were indicted in the United States court for the district of New York in March, 1872, some four or five months before this contract was made.

The identical cases so worked up by Warwick Martin and paid for out of the public Treasury and against whom indictments were found we now find in this first contract subsequently made with Sanborn.

This first contract, then, was made up of cases the discovery of which was made by the "proper officers of the Government," who in the discharge of their duties had caused the parties to be indicted, and subsequently Sanborn obtained a contract which gave him one-half of the gross sum collected from them. Can the defenders of Sanborn tell me when and how he discovered, within the meaning of the law, that the parties whose names appear in this contract had withheld taxes? Can any gentleman inform the House why this contract was made in the face of facts the knowledge of which from their very nature must have been in the possession of the proper officers of the Government, which should have placed these cases beyond the subject of contract? With these facts known to the Treasury officials, why was the contract made? Sir, these are some of the questions to which the committee cannot obtain satisfactory answers from any one connected with the Treasury, and it has been found impossible to place this gross dereliction of duty where it directly belongs. On the 25th of October, 1872, Sanborn made application to have added to his contract the names of seven hundred and sixty persons alleged to have withheld taxes imposed on legacies, successions, and incomes, and on the 30th of October following they were added to his contract, the additional contract being also signed by Acting Secretary Richardson.

Sanborn applied for on the 19th of March, 1873, and had added to his contract on the same day the names of some two thousand persons alleged also to have been guilty of withholding taxes imposed upon legacies, successions, and incomes, including the names of about three hundred and fifty foreign residents. On the 1st of July, 1873, Sanborn again asked to amend his contract; this time appearing in person and asking that the names of five hundred and ninety-two railroad companies be added to his contract, alleging that these railroad companies were indebted to the Government "for taxes upon dividends and interest paid upon bonds."

Sanborn testified to the committee that the five hundred and ninety-two railroads which were added to the contract at this time were taken from Appleton's or some other railroad guide or manual, and that it comprised the names of all the railroad companies found therein, including some that were simply organized and which could not by any possibility have owed the Government. Then he advised Secretary Richardson that he had knowledge that only one hundred to one hundred and fifty had been examined with a view to ascertain their liability to the Government; and that he had no knowledge whatever in regard to such liability on the part of the remaining four hundred to four hundred and fifty; and that the Secretary, with full knowledge of this state of facts, told him to "put them all in," and thereupon he made oath that they were all indebted to the Government; and they were accordingly added to this contract.

The following is a transcript of the entire proceedings from the records of the Treasury Department, by which this now remarkable contract was attached to the original contract of Sanborn:

BOSTON, July 1, 1873.

SIR: I have the honor herewith to inclose a list of railroad corporations doing business in the United States which are indebted to the Government for taxes upon dividends and interest paid upon bonds, which they have heretofore withheld and refused to pay.

I would respectfully ask that the inclosed list be added to my said contract made with the Secretary of the Treasury, said contract bearing date August 13, 1872, and as amended October 30, 1872.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN D. SANBORN.

Hon. WM. A. RICHARDSON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Subscribed and sworn before me, a legally appointed notary public for the city and county of New York, this 3d day of July, in the year 1873.

[SEAL.] WM. H. STINER,
Notary Public, (239.)

[Indorsements.]

Respectfully referred to the Solicitor of the Treasury.

WM. A. RICHARDSON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

JULY 7, 1873.

I recommend that the within list be added to and made a part of Mr. Sanborn's contract.

E. C. BANFIELD,
Solicitor of the Treasury.

Approved:

WM. A. RICHARDSON,
Secretary.

By the testimony of Supervisor Hawley, of New York, it is shown that as early as the month of May, 1873, he, acting upon the written instructions of the Treasury Department and the verbal version thereof given to him by Supervisor Simmons, of New England, detailed two of his subordinates, Stiner and Stowe, to make examinations of railroads alleged by Sanborn to have withheld taxes, Sanborn advising him that he had a contract for the collection of taxes so withheld. Among the examinations made by these persons detailed by Hawley under the instructions of Simmons was that of the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad Company.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it appears that two months after this detail of Stiner and Stowe was made, two months after Mr. Sanborn had told Hawley that he had a contract, this extraordinary railroad contract was obtained by Sanborn, and included in this contract were the names of railroads worked up by Stiner and Stowe, and so worked up while under pay of the Internal Revenue Department.

Thus Sanborn, availing himself of information paid for by the Government, he himself at the time an employé of the Government, obtained contracts for the collection of claims thus found to be due the Government. In fact Hawley testifies that in no case did Sanborn furnish information beyond saying that the parties named owed the Government; that Sanborn was at no expense whatever in collecting, and he was unable to tell whether or not his department had any knowledge of the liability to the Government of any party included in Sanborn's contracts. He simply obeyed Sanborn, and felt bound to do so, under the written orders of the Treasury Department, as explained and expounded by Simmons, who professed to have seen both the Secretary and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Simmons saying to Hawley that both of these officers fully understood the matter, and that it was Hawley's duty to obey Sanborn as he might request.

The following is a copy of the contract between the Secretary of the Treasury and Kelsey, being the first one made under the law:

An agreement made this 8th day of June, A. D. 1872, by and between GEORGE S. BOUTWELL, Secretary of the Treasury, party of the first part, and William H. Kelsey, of Geneseo, in the county of Livingston, and State of New York, party of the second part:

The said party of the second part having been designated by the Secretary of the Treasury as one of three persons to assist the proper officers of the Government in discovering and collecting moneys belonging to the United States, withheld by certain persons or corporations, under one of the provisions of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill approved May 8, 1872; and the said party of the second part having fully set forth, as therein required, in a written statement, under oath, addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, and filed in his office, that he proposes to recover or assist in recovering for the United States from the following horse-railroad companies in the city of Philadelphia, a large sum of money, to wit, the sum of about $100,000, which the said party of the second part claims to be due to the United States, as and for internal-revenue taxes which have been withheld by said corporations, to wit, taxes due under and by force of sections 103, 109, and 122 of the act of June 30, 1864, and sections 15 and 17 of the act of July 14, 1870:

Now it is agreed by and between the said parties—

First. That the said party of the second part may proceed to collect the said taxes so alleged to be due to the United States by the said corporations.

Second. That in case any legal proceedings are required to be had in the premises, the same shall be conducted by the proper United States attorney, but no such proceedings shall be taken without the written consent of the Secretary of the Treasury first being obtained.

Third. No settlement of such claims shall be made, except under the provisions of section 10 of the act of March 3, 1863.

Fourth. All the costs and expenses which shall be incurred by the party of the second part in investigating and prosecuting the said claims, of every name or nature, shall be paid and borne by said party of the second part, and no part of the same shall be paid out of that portion of whatever shall be realized from said claims under this agreement which is to be retained by the United States.

Fifth. The said party of the second part shall, whenever required by the Secretary of the Treasury, make a full report in writing of all his acts and proceedings under this contract.

Sixth. Whenever any money shall be collected from said corporations, upon said claims, either by legal proceedings or by settlement or compromise of said claims, such money shall be paid by said corporations to the credit of the Secretary of the Treasury, and out of any money so collected and received there shall be paid to said party of the second part, in full for his services, and for all the costs and expenses of such collection, a sum equal to 50 per cent. of the gross sum so collected and received, which said 50 per cent. shall be paid to the party of the second part as fast as the money is collected and paid to the credit of the Secretary of the Treasury, the balance of said money to be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Seventh. This contract may be revoked at any time at the pleasure of the Secretary of the Treasury.

In witness whereof the said parties have hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year above written.

GEO. S. BOUTWELL,
Secretary of the Treasury.
W. H. KELSEY.

[Seal of Treasury Department.]

All the subsequent contracts were exactly similar in their provisions.

It will be noticed that the law provides for the employment of "three persons to assist the proper officers of the Government in discovering and collecting," while the contracts provide for the collection only, thus ignoring entirely the proper offices who under the law were to be assisted.

All the contractors were allowed one-half the gross sum collected.

I call attention to the fact that the law provides that no person shall be employed who shall not have fully set forth, in a written statement under oath, the character of the claim out of which he proposes to recover or assist in recovering the money for the United States, the laws by the violation of which the same have been withheld, and the name of the person, firm, or corporation having withheld such moneys. Under this provision Secretary BOUTWELL on the 8th of June, 1872, issued the first order of the Treasury Department in relation to the employment of persons under this act, which directed that parties applying for contracts shall, to his satisfaction, set forth in writing, under oath, to be filed in his office, the character in detail of the claim, the name of the person, firm, or corporation withholding the money, the laws by the violation of which the money has been withheld, and the evidences by which the claim is to be supported; upon doing which a written contract will be made upon such terms and conditions as he shall deem best for the interests of the United States.

This requirement of the Secretary was undoubtedly in conformity with the law, but in no case from first to last was the law or the conditions as set forth by the Secretary complied with.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, permit me to call the attention of the House to the fact that no power was given beyond the authorization of the employment of "three persons by the Secretary to assist the proper officers of the Government," &c., on certain well-defined and restricted conditions, and as a matter of course under the laws then in force. There is not a single thing that the three persons can do but what can be done and was being done by the Internal Revenue Department when these contracts were made.

As the taxes to be collected under the Sanborn contracts were imposed under the internal-revenue laws, and as this class of taxes are only collected by the Internal Revenue Bureau, (except the tax on banks,) it clearly follows that this department was meant when the words "proper officers" were used.

The Secretary of the Treasury being the nominal head of the Internal Revenue Department, it was proper that he should be empowered to employ the "three persons," but it was never contemplated that the power given him was intended to exclude this Bureau from any and all participation in making the contracts or in collecting the taxes so contracted to be collected. Now, Mr. Speaker, neither the Commissioner, nor any officer under him, was consulted at the time or since the contracts were made, or was he or they ever advised as to the making of the contracts, or of the character of the claims to be collected.

No communication passed from the Secretary's office to that of the Commissioner; no consultation with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, on the part of the Secretary, was ever sought or had; no order on the subject was issued through the Commissioner's office, nor was any report of the collections or action of his subordinates reported to him until after action was taken in this House calling upon the Secretary for information in relation to the collections. In fact, the first knowledge of these contracts came from his subordinates in the country, who were faithful to their duty to him and the Government whose sworn officers they were; and when at last the true nature of the manner of executing the law was made known to him through his faithful subordinates, he wrote a letter (dated October 1, 1873) to the Secretary, protesting against the manner in which the collections were being made, which has never been answered.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, this very important officer to whom belongs exclusively the collection of these very taxes appears to have been intentionally ignored by the officers of the Treasury Department, and without the knowledge of the Commissioner his subordinates were directed to assist these contractors, and were even, without his knowledge, directed not to collect taxes from parties embraced in Sanborn's contract. And in no case, or anywhere, or in any way, have the proper officers of the Government been assisted by Sanborn or any of the contractors.

The whole outside power of the Internal Revenue Bureau as well as the entire machinery of the Government for the collection of taxes were placed at the disposal of Sanborn, as the following proofs, as interpreted by Supervisors Hawley and Simmons, conclusively show.:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 3, 1873.

SIR: You are requested to assist John D. Sanborn, esq., of Boston, in the examination of official records, in reference to such cases of alleged violation of the internal-revenue laws as he may ask for your co-operation.

Mr. Sanborn is acting under an appointment from me, and may need some information from the offices of collectors and assessors for the purpose of verifying his claims.

Very respectfully,

GEORGE S. BOUTWELL,
Secretary of the Treasury.

TO SUPERVISORS AND COLLECTORS OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, October 15, 1873.

To Supervisors and Collectors of Internal Revenue:

You are requested to assist John D. Sanborn, of Boston, in the examination of such cases of alleged violations of the internal-revenue laws as he may ask for your co-operation.

Mr. Sanborn is acting under an appointment from the Treasury Department, and may need some aid and information from your district for the purpose of verifying his claims.

Please render him such assistance as he requires.

Very respectfully,

WM. A. RICHARDSON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Supervisors Hawley and Simmons both testified that they regarded these orders as requiring them to assist Sanborn at all times and to the utmost of their ability. True, Supervisor Hawley seemed to have some doubts as to the meaning of these orders, but if at any time his official conscience troubled him, it was quieted and the propriety of this new order of collecting taxes made plain to him by the version of the matter given by Supervisor Simmons. Supervisors Hawley and Simmons placed at the disposal of Sanborn the officers under their control in the pay of the Internal Revenue Bureau, who did collect while in such employ and under such pay a very large percentage of the total amount credited as collected by Sanborn, and of which he received one-half the gross sum collected.

The fact is, the $300,000 or more collected in New York and New England was mainly collected by the agency of George Bliss, United States district attorney in New York and Supervisors Hawley and Simmons, and to my mind it is impossible that any large expense could have been incurred. If money was expended to any considerable extent, it must have been paid to secret partners or internal revenue officers, or both, and in my opinion money has been expended for both of these purposes.

To further aid Sanborn, his agents who operated in the West were furnished with special letters to the supervisors and collectors of internal revenue, directing them to aid these agents in any way they might require, and this too, as admitted by Assistant Secretary Sawyer, without the least authority of law. And to still further arm them with power, these agents of Sanborn were furnished with secret-service detective commissions by the Solicitor of the Treasury. These agents, represented themselves to the internal-revenue officers and the railroad companies from whom they proposed to collect taxes as special agents of the Treasury Department, in some instances saying they were sent out by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to make collections after he had ascertained the delinquency. When interrogated as to their connection with Sanborn, they denied all knowledge of him or his contract, or any contract. These agents by the means of the agencies furnished them by the Treasury Department, collected over one hundred and twenty thousand dollars, every dollar of which should and would have been collected by the proper officers of the Government.

Contracts were made for the collection of legacy and succession taxes, which under the law are not proper subjects of contract. They are not of the class of taxes undiscovered, even if the internal-revenue officers did not do their duty as required by law and as directed by the instructions of that Department. These taxes were matters of record in all the probate and surrogate offices of the country, and thus could not be subject to discovery. Kelsey, who claims to have secured the passage of the law, said to the committee that it was not the intention of the law, as he understood it, to embrace this class of taxes in the contracts. Of this class of taxes about one hundred thousand dollars have been collected.

A careful examination of the applications for contracts discloses the fact that no contracts were made for taxes imposed under schedule C, and yet there have been collected of this class about $10,000, all of which was collected by Supervisors Hawley and Simmons.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] said, when this matter was under discussion on a former occasion, that he wanted no better case to defend Sanborn upon than that of the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad Company. Now, what is this case? Supervisor Hawley tells us that in May, 1873, and while Sanborn was an employé of the Government, he came to him, saying that this road owed the Government, and that he had a contract for collecting what was due from the company to the Government, and that this was all the information furnished by Sanborn. Hawley then, after learning his duty from Simmons, acting under authority of the Treasury Department, detailed two of his officers to "work up" the case.

Hawley never sought to ascertain whether his officers had any knowledge of the indebtedness of the company, and cannot now tell whether or not his officers had such knowledge. Now it appears that the officers detailed for the purpose of working up the case did "work it up," under pay of the Internal Revenue Department, and no doubt knew all about the case before commencing to "work it up," and some three months thereafter Sanborn came to Washington and secured his famous railroad contract in which this identical road appears. Mr. Odell, treasurer of the company, says that the liability of his company in an unascertained amount was known to the Internal Revenue Department; that there was a difference of opinion between him and the officers as to the amount, but owing to the decisions of the courts and the rulings of the Internal Revenue Department, the amount was undetermined; and in consequence of this difference of construction, the collection was delayed until the decision of the Supreme Court last summer affirming the right to tax railroads for the first seven months of 1870; that he made the final settlement with the very same officers whom he had known all the time the matter was in dispute, and that his company had passed nearly the entire amount of the tax to the credit of the Government.

Can the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] now tell us how it happened that Sanborn obtained a contract for this collection three months after the case had been worked up by the officers of the Government? Can he tell us why the information secured by the officers of the Government should properly be made a subject of contract? Can he tell us why Sanborn represented to Hawley that he had the contract some three months before the contract was made? A truthful answer to these questions would throw some light upon a subject that is now more or less mysterious.

Another matter that is mysterious connected with this Delaware and Lackawanna Railroad case is the fact that Treasurer Odell remitted his check in payment of the tax directly to the Secretary of the Treasury on the 6th day of January, 1874. This remittance was made without the knowledge of any one save the clerk who wrote the check. It was received on the 7th, next day, in Washington by the Secretary of the Treasury. On the 8th following Sanborn writes from New York, giving the amount of the remittance and the character and number of the check. The amount of the remittance he might possibly have ascertained from internal-revenue officers, but he could only have learned of the number of the check from Washington. This circumstance is one among many others that go to show that some one in the Treasury Department kept close watch of the collections, and who must in this case have promptly advised Sanborn of the particulars in relation to this remittance.

Take another case to illustrate the manner in which these collections were made—the case of Hon. WILLIAM WALTER PHELPS, executor, who paid some $14,800 as a succession tax on the estate of John J. Phelps. A. M. Coughlin, who is a constituent of my associate on the Committee on Ways and Means, the distinguished gentleman from New York City, [Mr. WOOD,] had, until May 20, 1873, held the office of assistant assessor, and was assigned to the special duty of the collection of legacy and succession taxes in the city of New York. Now, Mr. Coughlin sent Mr. PHELPS a notice, Form 96 of the Internal Revenue Department, which was not dated, and which was received by Mr. PHELPS in May, 1873, the notice being signed officially by Coughlin as assistant assessor for legacies and successions; this notice, no doubt, was only one of many similar notices sent out by Coughlin immediately prior to his retirement from office on the 20th May. Now, Mr. Speaker, Coughlin, on his retirement from Government service, enters into the employment of Sanborn, receiving for his services 12½ per cent. of the sums he collected. Coughlin followed up the case; Mr. PHELPS believing all the while that he was an internal-revenue officer, and finally about the 1st September settled with Mr. PHELPS, accepting his statement as to matters that were unsettled, and received from him $14,800 of which Sanborn got one-half. Mr. PHELPS all the while believed that Coughlin was an officer of the Government and never knew to the contrary until he saw his name in the list contained in the Secretary's report to this House.

It would be an easy matter to go on by the hour detailing the history of each case manipulated by this mysterious man, Sanborn.

Why, Mr. Speaker, if this law is not repealed and the contracts are to remain in force, the contractor, armed with all the power of the Government for the collection of taxes that they now possess, will collect all the taxes due the Government under repealed laws. These taxes amount to millions of dollars, and this misplaced power will take it all out of the hands of the proper officers of the Government, virtually displacing them by the creation of a new Bureau for the collection of back taxes, with some such person as the "mysterious man of Massachusetts" at its head, and at the cost of one-half this large sum.

The theory of the law is that the three persons employed shall assist the proper officers of the Government. The practice as administered has been to compel the proper officers of the Government to assist the contractors, thereby completely reversing the intent of the law.

It is impossible to arrive at any other conclusion than that much of the information furnished Sanborn must have come from internal-revenue officers. As yet I have not been able to find a single collection made by Sanborn to which the word discovery can possibly apply; and I give it as my opinion that at least six-sevenths of the collections were of a class and kind that could and would have been easily collected by the proper officers of the Government without other cost than their salaries.

While there is no direct evidence going to show that any officer of the Government had a corrupt connection with Sanborn, yet the facts are that certain internal-revenue officers were not only willing to obey the orders of Sanborn, but did so with such zeal and success as would have rendered them subjects of complimentary comment had they employed these valuable qualities directly for the Government whose sworn officers they were. When thus so successfully laboring for Sanborn they did not communicate with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, although they were not only in daily communication with him, but they made frequent visits to Washington where they met him. In none of their correspondence, nor in any other way, did they allude to the fact of their zealous and successful labors for Sanborn.

The continuance of such a system must, as a natural consequence, result in the demoralization of the outside working force of this important Bureau.

In striking contrast with these sworn officers of the Government, shown to have been derelict in duty, it is a pleasant and just tribute to a worthy and meritorious officer to refer to the fidelity of Supervisor Tutton, of Pennsylvania, and of his faithfulness not only to the Internal Revenue Department but to the best interests of the Government he was sworn to protect. It so happens that every one of these marauding contractors undertook to make collections in his district, but by his faithfulness and vigilance they secured but about $5,000, and probably this sum may be considered as properly collected, at least he believed so, else they would have failed even in this.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, when this subject was first before the House, said that the reason why all the contractors except Sanborn failed was because they were unfitted for the work they undertook, but that "Mr. Sanborn, who for years had been the trusted agent of Adams Express Company, who had gone all over the country looking up their business," was peculiarly fitted for the work, "with the energy that distinguished his character, and with the skill with which he had done private business, he was enabled to discover these taxes." Now what are the facts? All of the contractors, including Sanborn, undertook to make their collections in Pennsylvania, where Supervisor Tutton did supervise the collection of taxes, and after all of the rest had failed Sanborn undertook to apply his skill in this same locality, and he too, with all his energy, failed also. Why? Because Supervisor Tutton was true to the high trust imposed in him. He was faithful to his oath. Neither cajolery nor threats could swerve him a hair's breadth from the line of his duty. The "mysterious man of Massachusetts" failed here, and one of his witnesses (Belsterling) was forced to admit that if Supervisors Hawley and Simmons had been as faithful to duty as was Supervisor Tutton, Sanborn would have failed to make collections in their districts; in other words, the "proper officers" of the Government would have made all these collections.

Supervisor Tutton, ever true to his high trust, steadily resisted these contractors, foiling them at every step, and, aided by his subordinates, has during the continuance of these contracts collected large amounts of taxes of the very class, and in some instances the very cases, for which contracts have been made. Of this class of cases he has collected in the district of my very able associate in the Ways and Means Committee from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] over $200,000.

Mr. Speaker, let me call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to the statement he makes as to the employment of Sanborn by the Adams Express Company. Mr. Sanborn was employed by the Secretary of the Treasury in the year 1869, and was continued in this employment until May 31, 1873. During all this time Sanborn has been allowed pay for every day, including Sundays, that has intervened from that date to the termination of his employment, and in addition thereto has received an average of probably ten dollars a day for expenses. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts inform the House of the nature of his employment by the Adams Express Company as well as the compensation he received from them during this time? Will he please to tell us why it is that Sanborn was paid for every day, during which time he must of necessity have been attending to his private business, which the gentleman from Massachusetts says was conducted with great "energy and skill?" Can he tell us why it is that his pay and expenses were continued during the time that Collector Simmons says he was engaged in lobbying the Legislatures of Northern New England? Can he tell us why his pay was continued daily while he was laboring to secure the triumph of the gentleman's favorite candidate for Senator? Why was pay continued daily, including Sundays, while Sanborn was "fixing things" in the interest of the gentleman's aspirations for governor of Massachusetts?

Mr. Sanborn is indeed a "mysterious man," as well as a man of "energy and skill." He has managed this business with "energy and skill," and he has succeeded in shrouding it with mystery.

It required a man of "energy and skill" to secure contracts; first for the collection of taxes known to the Department at least one year before the contract was made, and against whom indictments were had at least four months prior thereto. It required these characteristics to secure contracts for nearly three thousand legacy and succession cases, and his energy and skill rose to heights sublime when he took a railroad guide to the Department and obtained a contract for all the roads that were in the book, and the "energy and skill" with which he took the oath that they were all indebted to the United States must meet with the admiration of his friend, the gentleman from Massachusetts.

With wonderful "energy and skill" he secured orders from the Treasury Department directing the supervisors and collectors of the country to "please render him such assistance as he requires," and to instruct these officers not to collect the taxes that were in his contract, and also permitting him to allow district attorneys a greater fee than the legal one. His "skill and energy" were again made manifest when he secured the illegal issue of special letters for his agents, instructing the internal-revenue officers in the broadest manner possible to assist these agents, and in securing for them secret-service detective commissions.

His "skill and energy" are strikingly displayed in the fact that these contracts were, except the railroad contract, made during the time when Mr. BOUTWELL was Secretary of the Treasury, and yet this important officer did not know that Sanborn had a contract, all of them having been executed by Mr. Richardson, Acting Secretary.

His "skill and energy" are conspicuous in securing the valuable aid of Supervisors Hawley and Simmons. His "skill and energy" enabled him to carry every point save one. Supervisor Tutton was proof against the skill, and the energy, and the peculiar fitness of this mysterious man of Massachusetts. That the House and country may more fully understand the force of his "skill and energy," it should be remembered that all these things were accomplished by him single-handed and alone! He had no help (so he says) from any member of Congress, or any other official source. To accomplish such a result is, in the opinion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] evidence of Sanborn's "energy and skill," and looking from his standpoint I might join him in attributing to Sanborn these high qualities.

In his payments for services rendered him, however, his skill seems to be somewhat tarnished. The facts, as proved, show that the internal-revenue officials worked for him without other compensation than their salaries, and that about $300,000 was collected by and through the efforts of these officers. For his other collections his own statements show that he paid less than $24,000. "His skill and energy" were not so remarkably displayed when he paid Morrison $43,875, Prescott $28,000, and Underwood $18,675; making a total of $90,550, while he does not know what it was used for. He simply paid these parties these large sums, permitting them to do what they pleased with the money, and that, too, without accounting to him in any way. True, this matter is a little mysterious, and if any "energy and skill" worthy of favorable comment is exhibited by this transaction, we are left to infer that these qualities are manifested in the way he chose to pay his secret partners and to use money in corrupting officers of the Government. In view of the facts as elicited by the testimony, it is simply absurd to say that $156,000, the amount stated by Sanborn as the sum total of his expenditures, could have been expended for legitimate expenses in making these collections.

His "skill and energy" are better illustrated when he secured the services of Mr. A. Goodrich Fay, of New York, without any compensation whatever. True, Mr. Fay was engaged as the attorney of Mr. Simon Herman, one of the indicted parties who was in Sanborn's first contract. From Herman, Fay collected $1,000 for the Government, one-half of which went to Sanborn, after securing his release from two indictments through the orders of the Treasury Department, and pockets $2,000 for himself, as he says, as his fee as an attorney. Herman, who is vouched for by Fay, as a man of the highest character, says that Fay told him that one-half the $2,000 was to go to Sanborn. Fay is remarkable for his devotion to Sanborn, even going so far as to accept at his request, and for his benefit, a special agency at a pecuniary loss, to go to Europe to work up the glove and wine cases, so called, through which Sanborn appears as an informer in an $800,000 job. Such instances of devotion as that of Fay for Sanborn are so rare as to be worthy of comment.

Let me tell the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] that it requires no very great depth of observation to fathom the peculiar fitness and skill and energy which he claims for this man, and with which it is sought to cover up or extenuate these glaring irregularities. Give to any man of common capacity the manipulation of the entire force of the Treasury Department at Washington, and add to this the aid of the willfully misled internal-revenue officers throughout the country, backed by the best legal talent to direct in the hunt for uncollected taxes, with special letters estopping all supervisors and collectors from collecting such taxes as this person might claim were his particular province, by contract, to collect, and such results and successes might follow; and what becomes, then, of the assertions of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] who comes forward with apparent alarm and with so much alacrity to the defense of Sanborn in his ill-gotten gains at the expense of an already impoverished and overburdened Treasury?

Mr. Speaker, my time will not permit me to further indulge in giving the details of this disreputable affair. Each case has its history of irregularity and wrong.

I now come to the paragraph in the gentleman's speech which is as remarkable for its boldness in charging improper motives upon some who have taken part in this matter as it is weak and unfounded as a matter of fact and law.

The gentleman from Massachusetts says:

> In the year 1870 we passed an act repealing the taxes on legacies and successions and on various other things, gross earnings of railroads and various other sources of revenue. We also passed an act that there should be no more assessors; and we abolished the whole body of assessors. From that hour no taxes could be assessed upon these delinquents; and by the law no collector of internal revenue as such could collect a tax that was not returned to him by an assessor on the list given him by an assessor. And, therefore, here were these legacy and succession taxes, and these taxes upon railroads, gross earnings and dividends, which have been kept back, and which were still kept back for four years, could not and would not be collected. The limitation for assessments and suits for penalties runs out in five years. In a very few months more the law of limitation would run against all these taxes. Now, those taxes were not assessed; those taxes were not on any revenue officer's books.

The taxes on legacies and successions were repealed by the third section of the act of July 14, 1870, (16 Statutes at Large, page 256,) which provides:

> That on and after the 1st day of October, 1870, the taxes imposed by the internal-revenue laws now in force herein specified be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Legacies and successions were part of the taxes referred to as repealed.

Section 17 of the same act, however, (16 Statutes at Large, page 261,) provides:

> That all acts and parts of acts relating to the taxes repealed by section 3 referred to shall continue in full force, and all the provisions of said acts shall continue in full force for levying and collecting all taxes properly assessed, or liable to be assessed, or accruing under the provisions of former acts, * * * and for maintaining and continuing liens, fines, penalties, and forfeitures incurred under and by virtue thereof.

And the same section further provides:

> That this act shall not be construed to affect any act done, right accrued, or penalty incurred, under former acts, but every such right is hereby saved.

It will be seen by these distinct provisions that the gentleman must have overlooked entirely, or having read recklessly disregarded them, in his allegations made to the House. The taxes accruing prior to the 1st day of October, 1870, were saved to the Government, and all the machinery necessary for their collection was also saved to the Government, without limit as to the time.

The same in regard to the income tax, which expired on the last day of December, 1871.

With reference to the limitation as to the right to assess taxes, the law and the decisions of the United States courts give them just this effect and no other. The right to assess the taxes was put by the law in the hands of the assessor, and after his list was returned to the collector, the right to collect was put in the hands of the collector whether the amount to be collected was large or small. The collection was made by a warrant of distraint, a summary process, which could be levied and executed inside of thirty days. Inasmuch as the general intent of the law and spirit of the institutions of this country require that the property of a citizen, as a general rule, shall only be taken away by judicial process and after an investigation by a jury of his countrymen, it was very wisely provided that if a tax was not assessed or collected within fifteen months from the time it had accrued under the law to the Government, the presumption should be raised that there was some doubt about the propriety of its assessment or collection, otherwise the delay would not have occurred in doing so. After that length of time the citizen with propriety and safety could only be held by the ordinary course of judicial investigation. If I am right in this reasoning, and I am borne out by the decision of the Supreme Court to this effect, it follows that that limitation was simply one as to the summary disposition of the property of the citizen, and not as to the extent of his liability in the matter of time to the Government.

In the case of the Dollar Savings-Bank of Pittsburgh against a collector at that place, the Supreme Court of the United States has very recently decided that a tax which may be due under the internal-revenue laws of the United States is a debt from the citizen, and can be recovered by a suit at law, whether assessed or not, notwithstanding the fifteen months had passed. Nor can any State or other statutes of limitation as to suits affect the right of the Government to sue. And this is in strict accordance with that familiar principle of the law—which is the law not only of this country now, as it always has been, but also was the law of England for many years—that no statutes of limitation apply to a debt due to the sovereign power unless that power is specifically mentioned in the law enacting such limitation. Express authority is given by the internal-revenue laws to sue for taxes, (see section 41 of the act of July 30, 1864, as amended in 1866; 14 Statutes at Large, page 111.) There is no law limiting debts due to the United States in regard to internal-revenue taxes. If due to-day, or if due and unpaid any day since the law went into effect in the fall of 1862, they can be recovered by suit now or at any time during this or the next century, unless Congress—what it has not yet done—passes an act limiting the Government's rights in such matters.

The limitation of five years spoken of by the gentleman from Massachusetts does not apply to cases of taxes and penalties recovered by suits. The gentleman must have known, or would have known had he taken the trouble to examine the question, that it applied exclusively to criminal prosecutions and such fines and penalties as are imposed by criminal courts as a punishment for crime, and not to the recovery by civil proceedings of taxes and what in the internal-revenue laws are termed "assessable penalties." So that the whole of the allegation of the gentleman in regard to the taxes being in danger by lapse of time, and the argument from that that there was a necessity for these contracts, falls to the ground when examined in the light of the law as it is now and has been since the internal-revenue system was first adopted. As I have said, there is no limitation by which the right to these taxes can become lost to the Government by lapse of time. Under the law as it stands now they will be just as fresh and operative against the tax-payers at the end of this century, if they are living then, as they are to-day, or have been either before or since the inception of these contracts.

The office of Internal Revenue has always held, and the courts have supported them in it, that wherever a party died before the 1st of October, 1870, and left a taxable estate, the tax accrued to the United States on the day of his death, and that it could be collected whenever the party succeeding entered into the beneficial enjoyment of the estate, whether it was in one year after the death, or a dozen, or more. Of course in many instances there would be local controversies before the estate could be distributed, claims of contesting heirs or creditors to be settled; so that necessarily many of the estates are not settled even yet, but are on the local records and under the eye of the revenue officers, and can and will be collected the moment it is determined to whom the property goes and how much has been distributed.

I will refer the House also to section 125 of the act of June 30, 1864, (13 Statutes, page 286,) one of the sections kept alive as to accrued liabilities after the repeal of the legacy and succession tax by the section above referred to, which provides that the legacy tax shall be a lien and charge upon the property of every person who may die for twenty years.

This gives the Government a specific lien on the property.

Section 28 of the act of June 30, 1864, as amended, (see 14 Statutes at Large, page 106,) provides, among other things, as follows:

> And if any person, bank, association, company, or corporation, liable to pay any tax, shall neglect or refuse to pay the same after demand, the amount shall be a lien in favor of the United States from the time it was due until paid, with the interest, penalties, and costs that may accrue in addition thereto, upon all property and rights to property belonging to such person, bank, association, company, or corporation.

It will be seen by this general provision that any tax due from a corporation or person, whether for income, legacy, succession, interest on bonds of a corporation, gross receipts, or what not, is a lien after demand without limit upon the property of the person so owning. These provisions in connection with the unlimited power of the Government to sue constitute remedies both specific and general, as the law at present stands, which will last forever unless this or some succeeding Congress repeals them.

This is the law in regard to all these allegations about the limitation and the danger of the expiration of time, and it shows, as the statutes referred to bear me out, that the gentleman's entire speech in that regard was baseless and unsound, and gave me, as it did others, no little surprise coming from one of his reputed professional ability and acquirements.

The gentleman's reference to the abolition of the offices of assessor and assistant assessor by the act of December 24, 1872, as another reason for the making of these contracts was equally unfortunate; for by the express terms of that same act all the powers and duties of the assessor in the matters of assessment were thrown upon the Commissioner and continued in him. And since the 20th of May, 1873, the date when the assessors went out of office, the Commissioner each month since assessed a tax-list for each district in the country, covering in the aggregate hundreds of thousands of dollars; and this will continue to be done as long as there are taxes requiring assessment. In hundreds of instances, where the fifteen months have expired, the parties delinquent are, upon notice by the local officers, coming in and receiving the privilege of that exemption, and being assessed by the Commissioner, thus avoiding the expenses and exposure of suits. Where they refuse to receive the exemption suits are being brought and judgments obtained.

As an evidence of the early and careful attention which the Internal Revenue Office has paid to the collection of the tax on legacy and successions, I may state that the following circular of instructions was issued in 1866 to all assessors, accompanied by a blank book of record to keep track of all estates of deceased persons in the several districts. This circular, which was posted on the first page of each blank book, so that it could not be overlooked or lost, expressly required the assessors to enter all cases of legacy and successions, present and prospective, upon the death of parties leaving taxable estates, in the record, and to re-examine from time to time with a view to the collection of taxes. But I will read its provisions to show how full and complete it was:

RECORD OF LEGACIES AND SUCCESSIONS.

This book is not designed specially for a record of assessments, but is to be kept like the office docket of a lawyer, for the purpose of showing the exact stage and condition of each case; for noting the changes and advances made in it; for indicating the steps necessary to be taken next, and for preserving a complete history of it.

By section 125 of the internal-revenue act every administrator, executor, or trustee having in charge or trust any legacy or distributive share is required to give notice thereof to the assessor or assistant assessor; and by sections 138 and 147 trustees, successors, &c., are required to give similar notice in the case of successions. Immediately upon the receipt of such notice, or upon the receipt of like notice and information from other sources, appropriate entries should be made in this book, and thenceforth, from time to time, as the settlement of the estate progresses and the liabilities of legatees, distributees, and successors arise, until the estate is finally settled, and all the taxes, even the taxes upon remainders, &c., have been paid or otherwise discharged, assistant assessors should be instructed to report all cases of present or prospective liability to the assessor, who should enter them herein; for it is to be borne in mind that the prime object of this book is to keep trace of legacies and successions, even from a time when the liability to tax thereon is simply prospective; as, for instance, where they are to take effect in possession or enjoyment upon the extinction or determination of an existing life estate or interest.

The printed headings indicate the purpose for which each column is to be used. If a succession arises upon the determination or extinction of a life estate the date of such extinction or determination should be entered in the column headed, "Date of death or of conveyance" and such explanation of the entry as may seem necessary should be made under the head of "Remarks." The names and residence of executors administrators, guardians, trustees, &c., are to be entered in the column headed "Representatives and residence." Copious notes, under the head of "Remarks," will be found to be convenient and valuable.

It is clear from these instructions that had all the assessors kept their required records as completely as they seem to have been kept in Supervisor Tutton's district—and I do not say that such was not the case in the majority of instances—there would have been but little room elsewhere, as there was but little in Mr. Tutton's district, for contracts and speculations in these branches of taxation.

Under the law as it now stands, and has stood since the act of 1870, the Internal Revenue Department have discovered and collected, as the following table will show in detail, in the fiscal years 1871, 1872, and 1873, over $13,000,000 of repealed taxes, and that, too, with but a very trifling cost over the ordinary expenses of the Department:

Sources.	Fiscal year 1871.	Fiscal year 1872.	Fiscal year 1873.
Income		$1,451,817 29	$5,062,311 62
Gross receipts	$577,723 99
Sales	637,095 62
Special taxes	93,946 16
Legacies	927,879 10	1,784,426 19	763,761 77
Succession	649,349 16
Articles in Schedule A	38,078 34
Manufactures and productions exclusive of gas	1,058,393 18
Gas			120,111 96
Total	3,982,465 55	3,236,243 48	5,946,185 35
Grand total			13,164,894 38

I have before me a statement, made at my request by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, showing the amount of the legacy and succession taxes discovered and collected within the past year and the two years of 1872 and 1873. This table shows that over half a million dollars have been collected from legacies and successions during the time when these contracts have been in force:

Statement of the collections returned on legacies and successions to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue from 100 collection districts, during the fiscal years 1872, 1873, and the first seven months of the fiscal year 1874.

Time.	Amount returned.
From July 1, 1871, to June 30, 1872	$870,254 05
From July 1, 1872, to June 30, 1873	439,318 04
From July 1, 1873, to February 28, 1874	58,254 61
Total	1,367,826 70

Total districts, 224.

J. W. DOUGLASS,
Commissioner.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington May 7, 1874.

Under the contract system proposed and advocated by the gentleman from Massachusetts it would have cost the Government over six and one-half million dollars to discover and collect this money as against the trifling cost of less than $100,000.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that these taxes are being discovered, assessed, and collected almost every day in the year.

The most painful part of my duty is to speak in terms of unmistakable condemnation of the manner in which this law has been administered by the Treasury officials. This would be painful under any circumstances, and is doubly so to me, because I am condemning the acts of my party associates.

My position as a member of the Ways and Means Committee is such as to give me some knowledge of the duties of the Secretary of the Treasury. I think I know something of the arduous and responsible duties imposed upon this important officer. Knowing this, I trust that in all my acts I have had due regard to all the responsibility resting on him, and that I fully appreciate the delicate nature of his duties. For the Secretary and his subordinates I have none but the kindest feelings, and nothing but a sense of public duty leads me to make an unfavorable criticism on their acts.

I cannot overlook the carelessness and generally loose management of this matter by the Treasury Department. Their several contradictions and disagreements about matters of which there should be perfect accord is a fact to be deplored. Their attempt to shift responsibility one from the other is discreditable to all of them implicated in this transaction.

It is impossible with the evidence now before us to determine just where the responsibility for the maladministration of the law rests; but that it rests somewhere in the Treasury Department is the general verdict of all who have given this matter their attention. The motive governing and controlling its administration I am not yet able to understand; but I do know that Sanborn has been permitted to collect taxes that could have been easily collected by the ordinary agencies, and the Treasury in its present depleted condition has been robbed of over $200,000, and this money has gone into the pockets of Sanborn. The Department permitting this irregularity is deserving the condemnation of the people, and the officers controlling it are unfit to remain in its charge.

While I say this, I do not intend to reflect on the integrity of the Secretary. In fact, there is nothing so far that shows that any Treasury official has had a corrupt connection with Sanborn. It is due to the present Secretary to say that the first contract was made while his predecessor was in office; and the general policy of administration was determined upon while Mr. BOUTWELL was Secretary of the Treasury.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has had much to say about Sanborn's compelling rich corporations to pay their taxes, and that the cry was raised against Sanborn by the rich corporations and the wealthy people of the country, who are indebted for unpaid taxes, to secure the repeal of this law. This charge has been repeated in certain newspapers of this city, and the sub-committee of the Committee on Ways and Means to whom this matter was referred are charged with acting in the interests of the rich and against the poor.

I have to say for myself (and it is true as well of the entire committee of which I have the honor to be a member) that my connection with this matter was accidental, and all the way through it has been my desire simply to discharge an official duty. In the discharge of this duty I have learned that I am really acting in the interests of the poor, for by the course that has been taken Sanborn's robberies will be stopped; the money that otherwise would have gone into his pockets will stay in the Treasury; thereby to the extent of the amount thus saved relieving Congress from the necessity of an increase of taxes on the "poor man's matches and other necessities." The proper agencies can and will collect all the taxes that can be collected on account of repealed laws or back taxes.

Mr. BOUTWELL informed us that of all the contracts made prior to the Sanborn contract for the collection of moneys due the Government but little was realized, and that when these contracts were first agitated he did not believe anything would be collected; and this is also the testimony of Secretary Richardson and Solicitor Banfield. It is perfectly clear that if Sanborn had only been permitted to undertake the collection of claims that were proper subjects of contract under the law, without any of these extraordinary means which were placed at his disposal, the result would have been the same as with the former contractors, notwithstanding his "skill and energy."

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] had much to say on a former occasion about the Erie Railway. The fact is suit was commenced against the Erie Railway by the Internal Revenue Department at least six months before the contract was made. I believe they are indebted to the Government; and now that the Supreme Court has affirmed the right of the Government to tax railroads for the first seven months of the year 1870, I hope they will be made to pay. In speaking of the Erie Railway, I am reminded of a very mysterious circumstance connected with the Sanborn trial in Brooklyn. Judge Shipman is an attorney for the Erie Railway, giving, as I understand, his entire attention to the business of this road, and that he is in no sense a criminal lawyer. Now, will the gentleman from Massachusetts tell us how it happens that Judge Shipman conducted Sanborn's defense? Does this circumstance have anything to do with the fact that no collections have been made from this rich corporation?

Mr. Speaker, I am as anxious as any man can be that the rich corporations, the whisky rings, and the rich men of the country shall be made to pay every dollar they owe the Government, and as it is collected I am just as anxious that no plundering contractor shall be permitted to pocket one-half of it. The present condition of the country will not permit of this kind of prodigality so urgently advocated by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

I beg the indulgence of the House for a few moments while I make a digression to a kindred subject. I mean the moiety system as applied to our customs revenues.

This system comes down to us from the very foundation of the Government, and has recently grown to be an enormous abuse and outrage on the citizen. The Ways and Means Committee have recently had before them some of the most prominent merchants of the country, as well as one of the most daring, accomplished, and successful special agents and informers, of modern times at least. From the statements of these parties we learn that a most remarkable state of things exists. Yes, Mr. Speaker, "legalized robbery" is the term given to it by Special Agent Jayne, and no man can successfully dispute his statement.

No secret has been made of the employment by the agents of the Government of spies and informers to look after defrauders of the revenue; but the country has never realized the true nature of the arrangement between the parties, or the possibilities for abuse and outrage which are inherent in the system from its very nature. These developments must be convincing beyond dispute that the extraordinary inducements held out by the Government to its agents—being half the sum secured—constitute an irresistible bait for mean and unscrupulous men, who will naturally seek employment of this kind, and once getting it will hesitate at no injustice or abuse in their greed for plunder.

Eminent business houses, justly possessing that confidence of their fellow-men which a life-time of fair dealing and just conduct alone can inspire, have been dragged into discredit and the proprietors thereof to shame through the discovery by these sneaks of a mere technical irregularity, and been betrayed to the informers perhaps by their own spy, smuggled into the employment of their houses; the settlement of their cases being handed over to officers of the Government duly authorized to determine justice, and who at the same time are participants and beneficiaries in the money to be paid as penalties under their own decisions of these cases, together with members of both Houses of Congress acting as attorneys for these legalized robberies.

True, the Government must use every care in the collection of the revenue. The frauds on the latter are no doubt numerous and at times heavy. But it cannot be denied that any system which can only become efficient through a premium on meanness and cupidity, and which renders any business house, regardless of its high credit, good name, and unimpeachable character, liable to a raid from greedy officials as unscrupulous and regardless of honor or decency as a highwayman—such a system, Mr. Speaker, allow me to say in all candor, is unworthy of a Government so great and of the supposed enlightenment and liberality as ours.

I trust this session of the Forty-third Congress will not adjourn until the statutes making these outrages possible are wiped from the statute-books of the land.

In the matter of customs laws and regulations we have only to follow the example of Congress in relation to the internal-revenue laws, in eliminating from them their harsh and oppressive features and putting them in such form and shape as will command the moral support of the people. The internal-revenue laws, relieved as they are now from nearly all their obnoxious and oppressive features, are cheerfully acquiesced in. These taxes are collected without serious difficulty, and the Internal Revenue Department finds itself in a higher state of efficiency than ever before. So, too, with these customs laws; take away the obnoxious features; enact such laws in their stead as will command the moral support of that class of our fellow-citizens, the merchants, of whom I am proud to be one; do away with your miserable political management of your custom-houses, and my word for it your taxes will be better collected, your laws more efficiently and successfully enforced, and besides this, and as a necessary consequence, your countrymen will be contented; and instead of your Ways and Means Committee listening by the week to the complaining merchant recounting his story of oppression and wrong, you will receive that most blessed boon to a public man, the plaudit from the people of "Well done, thou good and faithful servant."

And now, in conclusion, let me speak to the members of the republican party, of which I am proud to be a humble member—that party which has fought and won so many political battles, which has performed so grand a service to the country. It has been emphatically the party of the people. It was born to protest against wrong and oppression. It has lived to grind to powder the most insolent oligarchy that ever antagonized the theory and practice of equal political rights. Its pathway is strewn all along with brilliant and glorious achievements. But to save this party I plead. I am willing today to work and to dig down deep if need be, and I know that every member of my party will join me, to root out these hideous spots wherever we can find them. The people of this great country desire above all else to follow the flag of this grand party; but that flag must be kept clean and pure. The party cannot live alone in its past history; it must demonstrate its ability to deal with the present—its genuine patriotism. If it finds itself unable to drive out whatever of corruption it may have within; if it does not correct the abuses and wrongs that, by the connivance of corrupt and designing men, have been fastened upon its administration, then I say it ought to go down and only thereafter to live in history.

But, Mr. Speaker, I know that the good in the party largely outweighs the bad, and that much of our suffering is due to the inheritance of practices and precedents from the democratic party; and I know too that my republican associates in Congress are not only able but willing to root out these wrongs, and that we can do, are doing, and will do what no other party has ever had the courage to do—we will purge ourselves of impurities. We are determined to have it understood that whenever and wherever a corrupt official head is brought to light, there shall be a republican club to hit it. Purified then as it will certainly be, this grand party will continue to bless the Republic in administration, and, supplemented as it will be with new and other deeds of brilliancy and glory, the country will continue to prosper and the people will be happy.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This day at half past one o'clock was assigned to the Committee on the Territories to make report on the bill for the admission of New Mexico as a State. This bill was made a special order to the exclusion of all other orders, except appropriation bills; and the Chair understands that the Committee on Appropriations do not desire to occupy the attention of the House. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. McKEE] is entitled to the floor.

NATIONAL CURRENCY—FREE BANKING.

Mr. MAYNARD, by unanimous consent, submitted, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, a report upon the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes; which was recommitted and ordered to be printed, and also to be published in the RECORD.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Banking and Currency, to whom was referred House bill No. 1572 with the Senate amendments thereto, beg leave to report:

That having considered the said several amendments, they recommend a concurrence with the same, with the following amendments, namely:

1. In section 1, after the word "act" in line 5, and in section 2, after the word "act" in line 1, and in section 4, after the word "act" in line 19, and in section 6, after the word "act" in line 9; strike out the words "of 1864."

2. In section 2, after the word "section" in line 8, strike out the words: "and each national banking association now organized, or hereafter to be organized, shall keep and maintain, as a part of its reserve, one-fourth part of the coin received by it as interest on bonds of the United States deposited as security for circulating notes or Government deposits."

3. Strike out section 3.

4. In section 5, before the word "associations" in line 7, strike out the words "association or;" and after the said word "associations" insert the words "assorted or unassorted."

5. In section 8 strike out the word "twenty-five" in line 9, and insert the word "forty."

6. In section 8, after the word "dollars" in line 14, strike out the words "and for that purpose he is authorized to issue and sell at public sale, after ten days' notice of the time and place of sale, a sufficient amount of the bonds of the United States of the character and description prescribed in this act for United States notes to be then retired and canceled," and insert the words: "and the United States notes so retired shall be canceled and carried to the account of the sinking fund provided for by the second clause of section 5 of an act approved on the 25th of February, 1862, entitled 'An act to authorize the issue of United States notes and for the redemption and funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States,' and shall constitute a portion of said sinking fund."

7. In section 9 strike out the words "one thousand" in line 3, and insert the word "fifty."

8. In section 9 after the words "New York," in line 6, strike out the following words: "and thereupon the Secretary of the Treasury shall, in exchange for said notes, deliver to such holder an equal amount of coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe, of denominations of fifty dollars, or some multiple of that sum, redeemable in coin of the present standard value, at the pleasure of the United States, after fifteen years from the date of their issue, and bearing interest, payable quarterly, in such coin, at the rate of 4½ per cent. per annum," insert the words and "and thereupon he shall be entitled to receive at his option from the Secretary of the Treasury in exchange for said notes an equal amount of either class of the coupon or registered bonds of the United States provided for in the first section of the act approved on the 14th of July, 1870, entitled 'An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt,' and the acts amendatory thereof, approved the 20th day of January, 1871: Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury, in lieu of such bonds, may redeem said notes in the gold coin of the United States."

9. In section 9, after the word "service," in line 19, strike out the words following to the end of the section.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suppose the presentation of this report will not interfere with the authority of the committee to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. It will not be considered as exhausting the power of the committee in that respect.

Mr. MAYNARD. I give notice that if I should be able to obtain the floor on next Monday I propose then to bring up this bill for the purpose of obtaining the action of the House on the Senate amendments.

BIGLER, YOUNG & CO.

On motion of Mr. SPEER, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 228) for the relief of Bigler, Young & Co. was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. WELLS, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad a bill (H. R. No. 3423) making additions to the fifteenth section of the act approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862;" which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

ADMISSION OF NEW MEXICO.

The House, according to order, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2418) to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. McKEE. Mr. Speaker, in presenting the bill for the admission of the Territory of New Mexico, I do it in the belief that the measure will meet with little opposition on this floor. The Territory of New Mexico has all the elements out of which we make States. It is large enough; it has population enough; it has prosperity enough; in fact it has every element of statehood. In area it is three times as large as the State of Ohio. It has more than one hundred and forty-five thousand people. The vote by which the Delegate from New Mexico [Mr. ELKINS] comes here is over seventeen thousand. There are forty Representatives on this floor who come here with fewer votes. In everything that goes to make a State, New Mexico is fully up to the standard.

This is not a question of constitutional law; it is a mere question of policy. Is the admission of this Territory for the best interests of the United States; is it for the interest of New Mexico? Now, Mr. Speaker, in admitting a new State we strengthen our Government; we give it greater credit abroad; we increase its prestige in war and its power in peace. It strengthens our Union to have thirty-eight States instead of thirty-seven. It benefits the Territory by giving it State legislation instead of this half-way territorial legislation. It will be remembered that the acts of a territorial Legislature are subject to the approval or disapproval of Congress. Congress may make or unmake territorial constitutions. Here is a community out in the center of the continent, not a new Territory, not an unheard-of place, not a mere ephemeral collection of people. Here in the Territory of New Mexico is the growth of one hundred and fifty years. The people there have demonstrated their ability to govern themselves in such a manner as may challenge comparison with the older States. That Territory is without any territorial debt. Where is the Territory that can show a like record? Its cities have no debt; its counties have no debt.

I will refer to only one other question, for I do not propose to detain the House but a few minutes, intending to yield to the Delegate from New Mexico, [Mr. ELKINS.] Under the treaty with Mexico of Guadalupe Hidalgo we solemnly agreed New Mexico should be admitted as a State into the Union. Under that treaty these New Mexicans claim their rights, not only as a question of policy on our part, but under the solemn stipulations of that treaty. We agreed they should come in as a State. They have now a sufficient population. They have every requisite. I see no reason and the Committee on Territories see no reason why this Territory of New Mexico should not under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo be admitted as a State into this Union. Every State we admit marks a mile-stone in the progress of our country along the national high-road to prosperity.

There can be no reason for refusing admission to New Mexico unless it be it will result in the admission of two new Senators. But, sir, even if two new Senators shall be admitted that is no reason why we should violate our general rule when, as in the case of New Mexico, the Territory has the requisite population and all the elements necessary to form a State.

I yield now to the Delegate from New Mexico, [Mr. ELKINS.]

Mr. ELKINS rose.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I ask before the debate proceeds further that the bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

That the inhabitants of the Territory of New Mexico included in the boundaries hereinafter designated be, and they are hereby, authorized to form for themselves, out of said Territory, a State government, with the name of the State of New Mexico; which State, when formed, shall be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever, as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. That the said State of New Mexico shall consist of all the territory included within the following boundaries, to wit: beginning at the intersection of the thirty-seventh parallel of north latitude with the one hundred and third degree of longitude west from Greenwich; thence south on the said one hundred and third degree of longitude to its intersection with the thirty-second degree of north latitude; thence west on said thirty-second degree of latitude to the Rio Grande; thence following down the main channel of the Rio Grande to the point where the parallel of thirty-one degrees and forty-seven minutes north latitude crosses the same; thence west on said parallel of thirty-one degrees and forty-seven minutes one hundred miles; thence south to the parallel of thirty-one degrees and twenty minutes north latitude; thence west along the said parallel of thirty-one degrees and twenty minutes to its intersection with the thirty-second degree of longitude west from Washington; thence north on the said thirty-second degree of longitude to its intersection with the thirty-seventh degree of north latitude; thence east on the said thirty-seventh degree of latitude to the place of beginning.

SEC. 3. That all persons qualified by law to vote for representatives to the General Assembly of said Territory at the date of the passage of this act shall be qualified to be elected, and they are hereby authorized to vote for and choose representatives to form a convention, under such rules and regulations as the governor of said Territory, the chief justice, and the United States attorney thereof may prescribe, and also to vote upon the acceptance or rejection of such constitution as may be formed by said convention, under such rules and regulations as said convention may prescribe; and the aforesaid representatives to form the aforesaid convention shall be apportioned among the several counties in said Territory in proportion to the vote polled in each of said counties at the last general election as near as may be; and said apportionment shall be made for said Territory by the governor, United States district attorney, and chief justice thereof, or any two of them; and the governor of said Territory shall, by proclamation, order an election of the representatives aforesaid, to be held throughout the Territory, at such time as shall be fixed by the governor, chief justice, and United States attorney, or any two of them; which proclamation shall be issued within ninety days from the passage of this act, and at least thirty days prior to the time of said election; and such election shall be conducted in the same manner as is prescribed by the laws of said Territory regulating elections therein for members of the house of representatives; and the number of members to said convention shall be the same as now constitutes both branches of the Legislature of the aforesaid Territory.

SEC. 4. That the members of the convention thus elected shall meet at the capital of said Territory, on a day to be fixed by said governor, chief justice, and United States attorney, not more than sixty days subsequent to the day of election; which time of meeting shall be contained in the aforesaid proclamation mentioned in the third section of this act; and after organization shall declare, on behalf of the people of said Territory, that they adopt the Constitution of the United States; whereupon the said convention shall be, and is hereby, authorized to form a constitution and State government for said Territory: Provided, That the constitution shall be republican in form, and make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color, except Indians not taxed, and not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence: And provided further, That said convention shall provide, by an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said State, first, that there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said State otherwise than in the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted; secondly, that perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested, in person or property, on account of his or her mode of religious worship; thirdly, that the people inhabiting said Territory do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands lying within said Territory, and that the same shall be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States, and that the lands belonging to citizens of the United States residing without the said State shall never be taxed higher than the lands belonging to residents thereof, and that no taxes shall be imposed by the State on lands or property therein belonging to or which may hereafter be purchased by the United States.

SEC. 5. That in case a constitution and State government shall be formed for the people of said Territory of New Mexico in compliance with the provisions of this act, said convention forming the same shall provide by ordinance for submitting said constitution to the people of said State for their ratification or rejection, at an election to be held at such time and at such places and under such regulations as may be prescribed by said convention; at which election the lawful voters of said new State shall vote directly for or against the proposed constitution; and the returns of said election shall be made to the acting governor of the Territory, who with the chief justice and United States attorney of said Territory, or any two of them, shall canvass the same; and if a majority of legal votes shall be cast for said constitution in said proposed State, the said acting governor shall certify the same to the President of the United States, together with a copy of said constitution and ordinances; whereupon it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to issue his proclamation declaring the State admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, without any further action whatever on the part of Congress.

SEC. 6. That until the next general census said State shall be entitled to one Representative in the House of Representatives of the United States; which Representative, together with the governor and State and other officers provided for in said constitution, shall be elected on a day subsequent to the adoption of the constitution, and to be fixed by said constitutional convention; and until said State officers are elected and qualified under the provisions of the constitution, the territorial officers shall continue to discharge the duties of their respective offices.

SEC. 7. That sections numbered 16 and 36 in every township, and where such sections have been sold or otherwise disposed of by any act of Congress, other lands equivalent thereto, in legal subdivisions of not more than one quarter-section and as contiguous as may be, are hereby granted to said State for the support of common schools.

SEC. 8. That, provided the State of New Mexico shall be admitted into the Union in accordance with the foregoing provisions of this act, fifty entire sections of the unappropriated public lands within said State, to be selected and located by direction of the Legislature thereof, on or before the 1st day of January, 1878, shall be, and are hereby, granted, in legal subdivisions of not less than one quarter-section, to said State for the purpose of erecting public buildings at the capital of said State for legislative and judicial purposes, in such manner as the Legislature shall prescribe.

SEC. 9. That fifty other entire sections of land as aforesaid, to be selected and located as aforesaid, in legal subdivisions as aforesaid, shall be, and they are hereby, granted to said State for the purpose of erecting a suitable building for a penitentiary or State prison in the manner aforesaid.

SEC. 10. That seventy-two other sections of land shall be set apart and reserved for the use and support of a State university, to be selected in manner as aforesaid, and to be appropriated and applied as the Legislature of said State may prescribe, for the purpose named and for no other purpose.

SEC. 11. That all salt springs within said State, not exceeding twelve in number, with six sections of land adjoining or as contiguous as may be to each, shall be granted to said State for its use; the said land to be selected by the governor of said State within two years after the admission of the State, and when so selected to be used and disposed of on such terms, conditions, and regulations as the Legislature shall direct: Provided, That no salt spring or lands the right whereof is now vested in any individual or individuals, or which hereafter shall be confirmed or adjudged to any individual or individuals, shall by this act be granted to said State.

SEC. 12. That 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of public lands lying within said State, which have been or shall be sold by the United States prior or subsequent to the admission of said State into the Union, after deducting all the expenses incident to the same, shall be paid to the said State for the purpose of making such internal improvements within said State as the Legislature thereof may direct.

SEC. 13. That the eighth section of the act of Congress entitled "An act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands and to grant pre-emption rights," approved the 4th day of September, 1841, shall be, and is hereby declared to be, applicable to the State of New Mexico when admitted into the Union as herein provided.

SEC. 14. That any balance of the appropriations for the legislative expenses of said Territory of New Mexico remaining unexpended shall be applied to and used for defraying the expenses of said convention and for the payment of the members thereof, under the same rules and regulations and rates as are now provided by law for the payment of the territorial Legislature.

Mr. McKEE. This is the same bill by which all the new States have been admitted. We have not dotted an "i" nor crossed a "t." It is the usual enabling act.

[Mr. ELKINS addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, it is a thankless task to resist such an earnest and eloquent appeal to the House as the one just now addressed to it by the Delegate from New Mexico. Gentlemen of my temperament would find legislation much more agreeable if they could carry it on upon the principle recommended by Mr. Tittlebat Titmouse, who proposed a general bill for giving everybody everything. But since that is not practicable, we must needs deal with the measures which come before us with reference to those general public considerations which ought alone to govern us in our action here.

The gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. ELKINS] was good enough, a day or two ago, to hand me references to the authorities he has just read to the House in respect of what he considered the treaty obligations of this Government in regard to New Mexico, assuring me he felt confident that if I were satisfied a treaty really existed for the admission of New Mexico as a State I would say so to the House, and waive any other objection I might have to its admission. The gentleman from New Mexico did me no more than justice. The first duty of government is to maintain good faith, and if any gentleman of the House feels satisfied that there is any treaty between the United States and the republic of Mexico under which the citizens of the Territory of New Mexico are entitled to claim its admission absolutely and as matter of right as one of the States of this Union, then he ought to cast his vote on this occasion for that admission. For myself, after endeavoring to examine that question as fairly as I could, I have been unable to find the slightest ground, as it seems to me, for supporting such a claim.

The first authority cited by the gentleman from New Mexico is that of General Kearney, who, during the period preceding the Mexican war, received the submission of the inhabitants of this Territory. What was his proclamation? Not that New Mexico should be admitted as a State, but exactly the reverse—that it should be admitted as a Territory. General Kearney's words are:

It is the intention of the United States to establish among this people a civil government similar to that of the United States—

Not the same as that of the United States, but "similar to that of the United States"— in which they will be called to exercise the rights of freemen in choosing representatives to the territorial Legislature.

So that the first notice these New Mexicans got from the first representative of the Federal Government was not that New Mexico should be received as a State at all, but that her people should receive and have privileges similar to those of the States; should be treated as freemen and entitled to vote for representatives to a territorial Legislature, and this treatment and this right they have always since had.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from New York allow me to remind him of one fact with which he may perhaps not be familiar; that under the former relations of New Mexico to the United States of Mexico, it not only had a delegate, but that delegate in the federal Congress of Mexico had a vote? I think that is an important element for consideration. The people of New Mexico were represented, by voice and vote both, in the Congress of the United States of Mexico, and that fact is to be taken into connection with their persistent demand here and their insisting on their construction of the treaty.

Mr. POTTER. If that be so, as to which I am not well informed, it may have misled some persons in their construction of that proclamation. But the Delegate from a Territory has a voice in this House if not a vote, which voice sometimes has as much influence as that of any Representative in Congress. But however that may be, the treaty which the United States made with Mexico, upon which this claim is based, is singularly specific in its language. Article 9 provides:

Mexicans, who in the territories aforesaid shall not preserve the character of citizens of the Mexican republic conformably with what is stipulated in the preceding article, shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States and be admitted at the proper time (to be judged of by the Congress of the United States) to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States, according to the principles of the Constitution; and in the mean time shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty and property, and secured in the free exercise of their religion without restriction.

So that the treaty itself, in the most distinct and positive manner, declared the time when New Mexico shall be admitted to the privileges secured by the treaty. Even if those privileges be taken to mean admission into the Union as a State—which does not necessarily follow—it is declared in the treaty itself that the time for such admission shall lie in the judgment and pleasure of the Congress of the United States.

The gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. ELKINS] caused to be read some remarks by Senator Peck in regard to the admission of Louisiana, which he declared it was the duty of the Congress of the United States, under the provisions of the Louisiana treaty, to admit as a State. But it is to be observed in that connection that the treaty by which Louisiana was acquired differs from the treaty by which New Mexico was acquired. The sixth article of that treaty says:

The inhabitants of the territories which His Catholic Majesty cedes to the United States by this treaty shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States as soon as may be consistent with the principles of the Federal Constitution, and admitted to the enjoyment of all the privileges, rights, and immunities of the citizens of the United States.

And it may be conceived to be because, after that treaty the claim arose in the Senate that that treaty gave those territories a right to be represented in the Congress of the United States as States, that this guarded language was used in the treaty of New Mexico, which declared, not in the language of the Louisiana treaty, that the inhabitants should be incorporated into the Union of the United States as soon as consistent with the Constitution, but declared instead that they should be incorporated and should have the rights of citizens of the United States at the proper time, to be judged by the Congress of the United States.

The gentleman also cited some remarks of Senator HAMLIN, but it is to be borne in mind that those remarks were made in the heated times of the slavery dispute, when people of the one section looked for an ally to strengthen that portion of the country which favored slavery, and people in the other section were looking for an ally to resist its further extension. Besides, sir, although during that heated debate, Mr. HAMLIN made the remarks which were read at the Clerk's desk, they were connected with other remarks which were far from denying, and on the contrary admitted, that this was a question resting in the discretion of Congress.

And further, New Mexico herself claimed the right under this very treaty, when everything in the history of its negotiation was fresh in the recollection of Congress, to be admitted because of it as a State. New Mexico at that time, I say, laid before Congress this identical claim to be admitted as a State under this treaty, and had it rejected. It was rejected, the Delegate from New Mexico said, because the supposed feelings and situation of the people of New Mexico in regard to slavery were not satisfactory. But however that may be, its admission was treated in Congress as a question that rested in the discretion of Congress; and for whatever cause it chose to exercise its discretion, nobody ventured to assert, distinctly, that to admit New Mexico as a State was one of those things that Congress was bound to do because of the treaty. And Congress itself refused so to regard it. You have then the solemn determination by Congress itself upon this identical question, when it was first presented, adverse to the claim that New Mexico had any right to be admitted as a State by virtue of this treaty. And the question as to her admission therefore recurs precisely as the chairman of the Committee on the Territories presented it in the few remarks that he made at the opening of the discussion to-day: First, what are the interests of New Mexico in regard to her proposed admission into the Union; and second, what are the general interests of the United States in that respect?

Now, first, as regards the general interest of New Mexico. What is New Mexico? A remote southwestern Territory, annexed to the United States twenty-six years ago, during all which time it has enjoyed civil government, during all which time the persons within it have enjoyed all the rights of citizens of the United States; for what right has a citizen of the United States which a citizen of a Territory has not got? Who ever heard it claimed that a citizen of a Territory was not a citizen of the United States, or deprived of any rights as such? The Territory has a population, according to the last census, of 91,470 people. It is said that now, according to some enumeration laid before the Committee on the Territories, it has a population of 135,000. But the census gives it a population of 91,470 people. Now, its population of 91,470 people has been the result of twenty-six years of protection by the United States.

Mr. FORT. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him? He will remember that considerable territory and population have been taken off from New Mexico, at various times, added to Colorado, and constructed into other States and Territories.

Mr. POTTER. Not since the last census.

Mr. FORT. No, sir; but in twenty-six years. You said it took twenty-six years to get this population.

Mr. POTTER. It is none the less true that what is now the Territory of New Mexico has been for twenty-six years annexed to the United States.

Mr. FORT. Yes, sir.

Mr. POTTER. And notwithstanding that, the whole population in that Territory now is only 91,470.

Mr. LOWE. O, no; 23,000 have been taken out of the Territory and given to Arizona and Colorado.

Mr. POTTER. Since the last census?

Mr. LOWE. They were in what was originally New Mexico, but what is now Colorado and Arizona.

Mr. POTTER. Undoubtedly; but I am unable to see what difference that makes in respect of the particular Territory of which we are now speaking. We are speaking of admitting the present Territory of New Mexico with its existing limits, and that Territory has been annexed to the United States and under its protection for the last twenty-six years.

Mr. FORT. Yes; but the gentleman will remember that under the treaty they had the right to admission with that same population; that there was that number of people there.

Mr. POTTER. Provided the treaty gave them the right to come in. If the treaty gave them the right to come into the Union as a State, it gave it to them absolutely; so that, as I conceive, whether the population is ninety-one thousand or ninety-one hundred would not be a question at all. But if it be a matter for the discretion of Congress as to whether the Territory now known by the name of New Mexico shall be admitted into the Union or not, then we must consider the fact that although that Territory of New Mexico as it now exists, whether it was formerly larger or smaller, has been under the protection of the United States for twenty-six years, it has yet according to the last census a population of but 91,470.

Mr. MCKEE. That is according to the census taken four years ago.

Mr. POTTER. Yes, sir; it had that population according to the census then taken, and now as many more or less as the population of the Territory may have increased or diminished in the intervening four years. Some gentlemen seem to think that the population has now increased to one hundred and thirty thousand. A Representative from one of the Western States tells me that he does not think the population has increased since the last census over two thousand. Whatever may be the fact in that respect, it yet remains true that this is a Territory of slow growth, not of rapid growth. Its population is composed mainly of descendants from Mexicans. The business of legislation in the territorial Legislature is carried on, I am informed, largely by means of an interpreter, as is also business in its courts. A very considerable portion of the population of the Territory do not speak the English language. It seems to me that these are all reasons why, so far as the interest of New Mexico is concerned, she has now less claim than another Territory with no more population might——

Mr. FORT. Does the gentleman mean to intimate that a person must speak the English language before he can enjoy the rights of an American citizen?

Mr. POTTER. I do not intend to intimate anything of the kind. What I desire is to state exactly what I do mean as plainly as I can. Of course I have not meant to intimate any such thing as the gentleman suggested when he interrupted me. I state the fact for what it may be worth, as indicative of the future growth of New Mexico. With those gentlemen who think it is worth nothing it will have no effect. But to my mind it has this significance, that it indicates the Territory of New Mexico is not likely to be in the future as it has not been in the past one of those Territories into which the great northern blood has been pouring and developing as in other Western States and Territories during the last twenty-six years. Take the State of Illinois, for instance; compare what it was twenty-six years ago with what it is to day, when it is the third State of the Union.

Mr. FORT. Yes; but it was admitted into the Union with less population than New Mexico has.

Mr. POTTER. Undoubtedly, and with indefinitely greater promise of growth. But do gentlemen in this House believe that the transaction of legislation by a State Legislature instead of by a territorial Legislature, and the admission of two gentlemen into the Senate of the United States, will so increase the population of the admitted Territory as to account for the difference between the increase in Illinois and the increase in New Mexico during the last twenty-six years! If any gentleman thinks this I will simply say I differ with him, and pass on.

We have, I believe, sir, no report from any Federal officer, civil or military, stationed in New Mexico as to his judgment upon the propriety of now admitting it as a State. We have had a general of the Army down there to keep off the Indians; for the Indians mentioned in the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo as overrunning large parts of that Territory are still overrunning it in part to-day. But nobody has sent to this general for his opinion in regard to the condition or prospects or need of admission of this Territory. We have no report from the committee reporting this bill, either written or printed.

Mr. FORT. I beg the gentleman's pardon; there is a report.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Here is the printed copy.

Mr. POTTER. I thank the gentleman; I inquired a few days ago but did not find one.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. It was distributed this morning.

Mr. POTTER. It was distributed then this morning; I know I could not get one when I inquired.

Mr. HOSKINS. It has been upon the tables of members and in the document-room for three weeks.

Mr. POTTER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] just remarked it had been distributed this morning.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. It was sprinkled about the House this morning.

Mr. HOSKINS. It has been reprinted.

Mr. POTTER. Then I was unfortunate enough to send to the document-room at a time when the first supply was exhausted. It is dated, I notice, the 5th of May, which is not three weeks ago at all events. However, here it is, and I shall have the pleasure of reading it hereafter. I suppose it is in substance what was stated by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MCKEE] this morning. I notice it is brief, and seems to have no authorities cited for the recommendation of the committee.

Here, then, is a Territory which comes with nothing but these general statements, without any details, with no opinions from persons whose opinions it seems to me with propriety might be asked for. This Territory comes here by its Delegate and insists upon being taken into the Union as a State. What advantage will it be, what earthly advantage can it be to the people of New Mexico to come into this Union as a State?

Have not citizens of a Territory civil rights? Are they not citizens of the United States? Have they not every possible protection? On the whole, it seems to me that for such sparse communities a pretty good sort of government, if not the best sort of government, is our territorial form. In the first place, the Territory has a Legislature to pass local laws, and then it has the maternal care of the Federal Government to pay the expense of executing those laws. Some one has said of the British colonies in Canada that there never was a government so well contrived for the benefit of the people as that.

That they have the freest possible government. They can levy duties and impose tariff and charges even upon the products of the mother country, which on her part is constantly protecting them and spending money in their midst.

Mr. MILLS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. He seems to be in love with the territorial form of government. Would he be willing to exchange the State government of New York for a territorial government?

Mr. POTTER. When the condition of things in New York conforms to the condition of things in a Territory I should be glad to do so. When our population is reduced to ninety thousand I should be ready to have such a form of government established in my State. We never had much from the Federal Government any way. I happened, Mr. Speaker, to be myself at one time a resident of a Territory. When just out of college I was a surveyor in Wisconsin, which was then a Territory. I resided there awhile, and my experience was not at all that a territorial government was an oppressive government or that it deprived anybody of any of his rights or privileges, unless it be the privilege of sitting in the Senate of the United States. That great advantage the citizens of a State do indeed have over the citizens of a Territory—an advantage, however, limited to two gentlemen at a time, which in a great State is a very small proportion of the population, but which in one of these Territories without population seems to hold out a chance to every man in the Territory.

Mr. FORT. I would suggest to the gentleman that he ought to have staid in the Territory of Wisconsin and not emigrated to the Empire State.

Mr. POTTER. The gentleman forgets that that Territory became a State not long afterward, so that I would have gained nothing by remaining on that account. I concede, Mr. Speaker, that to anybody who expects to have a seat in that august body, the Senate, as I do not, there are great inducements if he resides in a Territory to have a State government established. Why, sir, I heard a gentleman of great public experience, a most eminent republican, who has filled offices of almost every grade but that of President, say the other day that having had experience as governor, Senator, member of the Cabinet, and in other public positions, he knew no position on the whole so desirable, so independent, so exactly the thing for a public man as that of a Senator of the United States, and he came from a great State. But the House can well see how much greater are the advantages of a Senator who comes from a small State; for he has a smaller constituency to serve, he has fewer claims upon him, fewer obligations to fulfill; yet he has precisely the same power as if he had behind him the five millions of population of the State of New York.

But there remains the principal consideration of this subject. That is, what are to be the advantages to the Federal Union from the reception of New Mexico as a State? Nobody I believe has suggested anything that the Federal Government is to gain by it, except that the gentleman from Mississippi has said that the country is strengthened by the addition of a new State. But that is true, if at all, only when the new State was not before part of the country. Indeed, our action to-day has been put wholly on the ground of duty to New Mexico and her interests. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MCKEE] also said, "To be sure there is one objection; that is, that the Senate of the United States will be diluted by this proceeding; but then," he added, "it is the usual rule." It has, sir, been the usual rule, it is true; but what of that? Because a man just beginning business, without capital, struggling to get on, chooses to take in a partner with very small means or no means at all, no one would expect that, when he has grown to be a great merchant and has builded up a great business, he would be willing or asked even to continue to take in partners on the same terms. The thirteen States that originally formed the Union had nothing like the inequality between the greatest and smallest of them which there is between New Mexico and even the existing States of the second class in population.

Mr. FORT. The gentleman will remember that it is a part of the compact that the Territories are to be admitted, when ready, on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. POTTER. What compact?

Mr. FORT. The Constitution.

Mr. POTTER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I thought he was again alluding to the treaty.

Mr. FORT. No, sir; the Constitution.

Mr. POTTER. The Constitution provides on this subject that—

New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.

Mr. FORT. The provision of the Constitution must be construed in good faith. That word "may" means of course "must," you know.

Mr. POTTER. I do not know that at all. But even if it were conceded that "may" is to be necessarily construed as meaning "must," or "shall," still the question remains with Congress, even if bound to admit at all, as to the time. I do not understand that there is any constitutional obligation to admit any Territory as a State at all; but if there is it still remains with Congress, having reference to the general good, to determine when a new State shall be admitted.

Mr. FORT. Congress is bound by good faith, is it not?

Mr. POTTER. Undoubtedly; and if "may" here means "must," as you claim, then good faith requires that a Territory shall be admitted at some time, but even then it remains for the judgment of Congress to determine the time when it is for the general public interest to admit any Territory as a State.

Now, is it for the general public interest to admit New Mexico? What has the United States to gain in this regard?

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. When a Territory has an adequate population to be admitted—that is, when it has the population to entitle it to one member upon this floor—is it not the moral right of the Territory to become a member of the Union?

Mr. POTTER. Suppose there be a moral right of that kind when the Territory has an adequate population; but what is an adequate population? Prior to 1873 there was no rule upon this point. At my suggestion Congress in 1872 incorporated in the apportionment bill an amendment providing that it should require at least the same population for the admission of a Territory as is required to entitle a State to a Representative on this floor. That rule was founded upon what? Simply upon the general principle of justice, that gentlemen occupying seats in this House should represent as nearly as may be equal population. But, beyond that, I should be glad to know upon what principle of moral obligation one hundred thousand people in any portion of this country have a right to come here and demand to be allowed two representatives in the Senate of the United States, and thus be placed on an equality with bodies of people numbering four or five millions, and demand it simply because it has been heretofore conceded to other Territories to be received as States.

Mr. KASSON. The same right they had.

Mr. MILLS. Does not the gentleman from New York know that the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that the Federal Government has no right to acquire territory except for admission into the Union as States?

Mr. POTTER. Granted; but still the question remains——

Mr. MILLS. It is the right of the people of a Territory, as soon as they qualify themselves, to be admitted into the Union as a State. It is their inherent constitutional right to be so admitted.

Mr. POTTER. Then according to this new constitutional doctrine of the gentleman from Texas these people in New Mexico have been kept out of the Union for twenty-six years when they ought to have been exercising the rights of a State.

Mr. ELKINS. That is just what is the matter.

Mr. POTTER. Congress decided their claim under the treaty the other way, and I think quite rightly. This claim of a constitutional right I understand to be new.

I was saying, Mr. Speaker, as regards the admission of new States there was not any parity at all between our present situation and that of the thirteen colonies. The thirteen colonies were all more nearly equal, not in size, but in population and trade and wealth. There was not in those respects any very great difference between them. They were besides all struggling to get away from a common ruler and agreed to come into a joint confederation on certain terms. They entered into a union each of its absolute volition, and as was voluntarily agreed by all, upon certain prescribed terms. For reasons satisfactory to themselves they took in Delaware upon the same footing as to representation in the Senate as they brought in Pennsylvania. Our fathers, indeed, were glad enough to get anybody in their federation at that time on almost any terms, and if New Mexico had presented herself with her ninety-one thousand people, they would perhaps even have been willing to take her in with them at that time.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Were not the Colonies then trying to throw off this very form of colonial government which the gentleman from New York seems to think is so desirable, but from which New Mexico is so anxious to escape?

Mr. POTTER. Does the gentleman from Montana assert the colonial government of that day, which governed arbitrarily and taxed without representation, bore any sort of relation to or parity with the government of these Territories in which all their local government is conducted by persons chosen within their limits, and which is only subject to the approval of the Congress of the United States?

Mr. MAGINNIS. The old thirteen colonies were separated from Great Britain by three thousand miles of water just as now some of these Territories are separated by three thousand miles of land. In my judgment the colonial government of Great Britain was in some respects preferable, far milder and much better, than the colonial government of the United States, and so the people of the Territories themselves believe.

Mr. POTTER. Since the Delegate from Montana stands up in the Congress of the United States and makes that assertion, I ask him to point out to me any occasion, and if so to how many, when the statutes of his territorial Legislature were disapproved by the Congress of the United States since it became a Territory?

Mr. MAGINNIS. When my Territory was first organized Federal officers were sent out there then, as they are now, unknown to and uninvited by our people, just as England sent objectionable governors to her colonies, and as Spain now sends rulers to Cuba. They organized a session of the territorial Legislature, which, under their influence, voted to the governor and secretary and each of the judges $3,000 per year extra compensation in addition to that paid by the Government. Afterward the people took control and held two successive sessions of the Legislature and repealed the laws allowing this extra compensation. Upon which, the tools of these officers, a few political adventurers in sympathy with the dominant republican party, came down here to Washington and through their influence with Mr. Ashley, then chairman of the Committee on Territories, repealed not only one or two laws, but caused Congress to wipe out the statutes of two successive sessions of our Legislature and left us without important laws for years. Meanwhile the Federal officers continued to draw the extra compensation fixed by the first Legislature, the statutes of which remained in force, until they entailed a debt of over $100,000 upon my Territory, which remains unpaid to-day—all done by a few lobbyists against the protests of the people, and carried in the interests of a few unworthy men, sent out to govern us, in whose selection we had no voice and whose rule was odious and tyrannical.

Mr. POTTER. When was that?

Mr. KASSON. About five years ago.

Mr. POTTER. That was the Congress in which my friend from Indiana who favors this bill was a member. I take no responsibility for that legislation. But it is an exceptional case. Generally the territorial Legislatures are allowed to do as they please. Besides, the legislation of which the gentleman complains was, he says, an abuse by Congress. But abuses by Congress are not necessarily escaped by becoming States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what followed after the original formation of this Federal Government? New States were indeed taken, but upon what terms? Upon equal terms. Why? Because the annexed Territories were contiguous Territories of very great fertility and natural wealth and immense prospective growth of population. They all fulfilled the prospect with which they were admitted. Then presently came the great slavery agitation; then the two sections of the country were struggling for control of the Government, and first one took in one slave State upon the South, and then the other a free State upon the North as opportunity offered to add strength to their side in the Senate of the United States.

Those reasons which addressed themselves to the discretion and justice of Congress have ceased. And in this connection I beg to call the attention of the House to a fact I think we do not enough consider, and that is that the result of the great civil war of the country has been to largely change the nature though not the form of our Government. Here are now great States, comprising a territory larger than France, which have been constructed and reconstructed and shut out of and readmitted to the Halls of Congress. From one of these States we have lately had an application to have the Federal Government take possession of and again reconstruct it. The other day came an application from rival governors in another of these States asking the President to declare which of the two claimants should have the control of the State, and as soon as the decision of the Executive was flashed along the wires it was at once accepted by both parties as conclusive. So that in effect the power of the Federal Government over those States has come to be regarded as almost absolute.

Then, after that, it should be remembered that the Federal Government has taken possession of all the money and the currency of the country. It banks, and monopolizes all the banking business. It declares what shall be received as the measure of value and the medium of exchange; and that is the greatest of all powers that can subsist in any commercial country. Then, beyond that, we have had the Supreme Court of the United States declaring that Congress is under no restriction to respect the obligation of contracts. We have had its formal decision that it may impair and destroy vested rights and the agreements into which men enter; that, in regard to transactions which heretofore had been held sacred from the interference of legislation, Congress has absolute authority. And then, contemporaneously with that, we have had growing up the disposition to enact special legislation by Congress and to have it interfere by legislation everywhere; until only last week, when it became necessary to pass a river and harbor bill, gentlemen like myself who supported the motion to suspend the rules were compelled to submit to the passage of a bill already objectionable, without a word, rather than run the risk, if the bill was made open to amendment on the floor of the House, that it would be swelled by gentlemen from all parts of the country and both political parties, anxious for aid by the Federal Government for their particular localities, to even larger appropriations than it had when reported from the committee.

Mr. BIERY. If the gentleman will yield to me for a question, I will ask him this: Does he mean to say that a Territory, so long as it is under territorial government, is more independent of the United States laws than when it becomes a State?

Mr. POTTER. I was not aware that I had said that.

Mr. BIERY. I understood the gentleman to make that point.

Mr. POTTER. No, sir. The precedents for the admission of new States seem to me, Mr. Speaker, to have wholly ceased under the existing condition of things to have any force whatever. Nobody in the South at any rate ought now to have any desire to increase the influence of the small States in the Senate of the United States. They have, I hope, had in the South experience enough of the disproportionate influence of the small States of New England in the Senate to make that section of the country unwilling to introduce other States to swell the control which the minority of the people of the United States now have in that body over the majority. What is the condition of things in the Senate of the United States to-day? Two Senators from my State representing about five millions of population in round numbers, find themselves equaled and neutralized in all votes in the Senate by two Senators from Nevada with an actual population of less than one hundred thousand. In the Senate of the United States there are now seventy-four Senators, and of those seventy-four Senators sixteen come from a majority of the people, and fifty-eight come from a minority of the people. The States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, and Kentucky, with Massachusetts, being eight States in all, having, by the last census, a population of 19,290,155, having a contiguous territory of not more than twelve or fourteen hundred miles one way by some three hundred the other, now contain an actual majority of the people of these thirty-seven States and ten Territories; and not only a majority of all the people but a very large majority of the wealth, the industry, and the trade of the country, and are in the aggregate increasing in those elements faster than the rest of the country——

Mr. HEREFORD. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me for a question?

Mr. POTTER. Certainly.

Mr. HEREFORD. I understand that the ground of the gentleman's complaint is that the State of New York has on the floor of the Senate only the same number of Senators as Nevada. That is in accordance with the theory of our Government and with our Constitution. Do I understand the gentleman from New York to desire to change the Constitution in that respect? If he does, I would say that that would tend to centralization more than any or all of the outrageous acts he complains of.

Mr. POTTER. I will answer the gentleman from West Virginia. In my judgment it is not according to the theory of the Constitution to extend that equality to every new Territory. No such theory can be found in it.

Mr. HEREFORD. It was on that that the great fight took place at the formation of the Constitution. It was maintained that each State should have two Senators on the floor of the Senate to represent the sovereignty of that State. That sovereignty I desire to protect, and I say that to-day the sovereignty of the States represented each by two Senators prevents centralization.

Mr. POTTER. In one regard the gentleman from West Virginia is right. It was acceded to on account of the necessity of the case; it was also advocated on the ground that States were to be sovereign; and that when Congress dealt with matters affecting all the States, they ought to be protected by having equal representation in the Senate. But I am not advocating depriving existing States of their equal representation in the Senate. I am only objecting to at this time taking in another sparse State to add to the existing inequality without cause or reason. And, besides, will the gentleman from West Virginia pretend to tell me, in view of the changes of the last ten years, in view of the absorption of power by the Federal Government, that the condition of things which existed in the last century exists any longer? It is exactly because it is changed that the reasons which were in force then no longer apply? The physical condition of things in the country has changed also. Three millions of a poor and sparse people, scattered along the Atlantic sea-board in States separated from each other by weeks of travel, having none of the modern means of intercommunication with each other, have grown now to be forty millions, knit together by the steamboat, the railway, and the telegraph, until all parts of the land are in instant communication with each other, so that to-day the President of the United States can in Washington discipline the remotest office-holder in Oregon as effectively as he can a clerk in the Treasury Department on Pennsylvania avenue. These changes in the physical condition of the country have created centralization in the Government.

The theory of equality among States is right. I was myself an extreme State-rights man. I am free to declare what I presume few men in the House would venture to admit, that if I was now to make a constitution for the future government of rising States, I would put a provision in it whereby a certain number or proportion of the States might go out of their Union whenever they pleased; for I believe that good government can in the long run only be maintained by its being in accordance with the interests of those who are under it. I am convinced that whenever the real interests of a great section prompt it to go out of such Union it should be allowed to go.

But notwithstanding these views it seems to me idle to any longer talk about the legislation of Congress being the legislation of sovereign States. Congress votes hundreds of millions of dollars every year; you declare the measure of values; you establish the banks and mediums of exchange; you are charged with the construction and maintenance of public works. And in all this distribution of patronage and power it is proposed by this bill that the representatives of eighty-five or ninety or one hundred thousand men shall neutralize the influence and votes of five millions. As I said before, here is a legislative body in which sixteen men represent a majority and fifty-eight represent a minority. It is the most absurd thing possible to call such a government a popular government. It has in a great degree ceased to be the government of a majority and become the government of a minority. And just in proportion as Congress, instead of confining itself to legislating about national matters, deals with special and local matters, and just as fast as new States with small populations are admitted, the range and the extent of this evil is increased.

The theory of this Government, the fundamental theory, is that of a popular government, a government to preserve the rights and represent the wishes of the people. But we have gone on without regard to that fundamental principle until to-day we find ourselves in the condition I have stated, and all the time it is spoken of as a popular government. As such, it is in this respect one of the most absurd governments on the face of the earth, and gentlemen propose now to make it more absurd by introducing Territories with this mere handful of people, and giving them the right to send two representatives each into the Senate of the United States.

I understand that with the great physical prosperity of the country such gradual changes are not observed. The attention of men in these hurried days is but too rarely given to the fundamental principles of government. But the time will come when this thing will not be longer tolerated. Every new State forced into the Union with its two members in the Senate of the United States will be a reason for coercing attention to this matter by the great States. What is the inevitable result of the further introduction of small States but to unduly reduce the influence of the older and larger States? Besides this, do not gentlemen know that the inevitable result of giving to the people in those small Territories—I mean Territories with but a small population—representation in the Senate of the United States must be that they will be controlled by influences exercised by men of wealth? I heard it stated not long ago that one of the Senators of a certain State had not been in the State in two years before he was elected. Who are the men elected to the Senate from these small Western States? Are they men who control the railways and mines and wealth of the States or not? Do we desire to repeat the experiment of Nevada, when after all the years that have followed her admission there is still a population not half so great as in some agricultural counties in my State?

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. Does the gentleman suppose that the eligibility of a Senator or Representative is to be weighed and measured by his wealth?

Mr. POTTER. I should be very sorry to consider that great wealth was an objection to a man being elected a Representative in this House, for I should then be debarred from the valuable association of my amiable colleague [Mr. WHITEHOUSE] who has just addressed me.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. I will, with the permission of the gentleman, call his attention to another remark which he made. He referred to the fact that many of the people of New Mexico could not speak the English language. Where would he draw the line of demarkation? Would he do it by language? Would he do it by blood? Would he do it by wealth? I believe that the greatness and glory and power exhibited in this American nation resulted from the intermixture of races and of blood. Where would the gentleman draw the line?

Mr. POTTER. There are gentlemen on this floor who could have suggested the same thing even more naturally and feelingly than my colleague has done. He and I need not, however, differ about that. I do not object to the admission of New Mexico because of difference of language. My colleague probably did not hear that part of my remarks, or he would not have interposed his question now. I merely alluded to the difference of language and race as an indication that that portion of our country was not likely to have the same rapid growth as other portions of the United States.

Mr. CROUNSE. Allow me to inquire of the gentleman if we are to understand from what he says that the Legislatures of Western States are more apt to be purchased than is the Legislature of New York?

Mr. POTTER. The gentleman does not embarrass me with any such inquiry. If he had served with me longer I think he would have realized that whatever else I do, from whatever source I seek to draw arguments, I never seek to draw them from personal application to any set of men in this House or the evil conduct of any particular communities they represent. What I said was, and in that I do not think the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CROUNSE] will differ with me, that, as a general thing, small communities holding in their gift a prize as great as two Senators of the United States offer more inducement for the attention of and control by men of wealth than those communities where four or five millions must be controlled before a man can be elected as a Senator. That consideration is general and arises from the nature of things, and applies generally to all communities.

Mr. CROUNSE. Without explanation the gentleman's remark would leave the impression that Western States were more easily controlled by men of wealth than Eastern States.

Mr. POTTER. When an effort is made to introduce a State of small population from the East or the North, the gentleman will find me as earnest in my opposition to it as I am now to the admission of New Mexico.

Mr. MAYNARD. This matter of the admission of new States comes up now not as a new question by any means. The principle has been long established of admitting any Territory as a State when it is found to have a population equal to the ratio of congressional apportionment for the time being; and no Territory prior to Oregon was admitted with a less population than the then existing ratio of representation. Florida was an apparent, but not a real exception. At the time she made her application Florida had a population equal to the then existing ratio; but her application was delayed until a new apportionment was made, which established a ratio greater than her population, so that the principle which has been observed was not violated in the case of Florida. It was violated in the case of Oregon; it has been violated in one or two instances since—notably in the case of Nevada. Now, I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] whether he is prepared to depart from this principle, and whether he controverts seriously the statement that the Territory of New Mexico has at the present time a population more than equal to the present ratio of representation? Because upon this fact will depend my vote in this case.

Mr. POTTER. I answer that I do controvert very seriously the statement that New Mexico has any such population, because the census of 1870, the latest authority, shows a population of only some ninety-one thousand; and if it has taken that Territory twenty-six years under the United States Government, and I know not how many years under Mexican rule, to attain that population, the same ratio of increase could not possibly bring it up to one hundred and thirty-five thousand by this time.

Mr. MAYNARD. But the assertion is that the increase has been very rapid since the census was taken.

Mr. POTTER. I once resided in the western country, and am quite familiar with assertions of that character in regard to the remarkable growth there of particular localities.

As to the other part of my learned friend's inquiry, I do controvert also the principle to which he alludes. I remember very well that the usage in some cases was as he states, but it was departed from; and when I sought to reform the action of Congress by an enactment in the Forty-second Congress I had the gentleman's opposition. I am glad he is now so far converted as to be in favor of that provision requiring at least population enough for one Representative according to the general quota. Now that is the law, he wants to know whether I am not satisfied with it. I frankly say that I am not. It would not make any difference, so far as regards my opposition, if New Mexico had two hundred thousand population instead of one hundred thousand. If New Mexico promised to be shortly a great State, bearing in the early future some sort of relation to the great States in which is collected the great mass of the population of the country, I could see some reason for admission; but until then I say that since in the Senate of the United States, in which the majority of the population have but sixteen representatives while the minority have fifty-eight, we have already gone far enough from a republican form of government, it is time to stop. Above all, it is time to stop unless there is some great reason for going further in the direction of minority government.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Is not the gentleman cognizant of the fact that within the last four years the Kansas and Pacific Railroad, the Rio Grande Railroad from Denver, and the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad have all gone out toward New Mexico, even to the boundary of it, and have carried a large amount of immigration into that Territory since the census of 1870?

Mr. POTTER. I am not familiar with the euphonious nomenclature which is applied to the railroads of that country; but I have no doubt that if the gentleman from Kansas says it is so, it is so.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Will the gentleman from New York permit me to ask a question?

Mr. POTTER. Certainly.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Do I understand the gentleman to say that no other Territories will be admitted as States, or that he will not consent to any other Territories being so admitted?

Mr. POTTER. I did not say they would not be; I said I thought they ought not to be, without reason. I did not say I would not consent; for unfortunately the power is not with me to consent. But I certainly oppose such admission.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Do I understand the gentleman to say that he would not admit any other Territory even if its population amounted to two hundred thousand?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. POTTER. I desire, Mr. Speaker, of course nothing but to get at the truth; hence I allow myself to be interrupted in all directions and without regret; and so long as I may be allowed to speak I shall continue to do so.

I want to be perfectly frank on this question, because to my mind it is a great question that we are called upon to meet. I do not believe that we can long continue to govern a country like this by a minority of the people. I want to call the attention of the House (and I will answer my friend's question later) to the fact that we are now through our great civil war, and we have necessarily settled the issues which were to a large part involved in that struggle. The great question of slavery, which for nearly thirty years divided the country, is to-day dead. Men who took part in the struggle upon that question may talk about it, but it is irrecoverably dead. You can never restore slavery, and it is useless therefore to seek to revive the questions of slavery. Other questions connected with it are also questions of the past. In the same manner the question of States rights, according to the construction which some (shall I say some of us?) gave to it, has passed by. As certainly as that this world goes round, the people of these United States have determined that, Constitution or no Constitution, these States shall stand together as one. I think that nobody, whether he likes the result or not, can dispute this fact.

Now, sir, at a time when our Government is becoming every day more and more centralized, (for I find that gentlemen on this side upon questions not purely theoretical are as prompt to have their constituents helped out of the public Treasury as are gentlemen on the other side;) at a time when I find myself, with my notions of local government, co-operating in that direction frequently with a chosen few of the gentlemen on the other side of the House, what are the issues coming up in the near future? I think one main issue should be the limitation of the power of the Federal Government. How? By strict construction merely? No; because strict construction in the eyes of the American people means denationalization of the Federal Government, to which they will never submit. We can have successful limitation of the Federal Government hereafter not by reversing the construction and decisions of later years, but only by a proper amendment of the Federal Constitution. Is there no occasion and demand for this? What is the experience of every State of this Union? With the growth of population and wealth corruption has grown up in the form of special legislation, until State after State has been forced to incorporate into its constitution a limitation on the power of the legislature so as to preserve the rights of its people. Just as certainly is the Federal Government tending in the same direction. Already in Congress measures of special legislation begin to abound. Already we are beginning to charter corporations and grant special privileges. Your committee-rooms, Mr. Speaker, are to-day full of such bills. And just so surely as this policy continues and special legislation is increased and developed, Congress will draw from the State capitals all the lobbyists to cluster about it here in Washington; so that if this legislation goes on we shall necessarily have about this Capitol a condition of things as much more corrupt than that which has existed in any State capital as the power of Congress is greater than the power of any State. This is not a question of parties or of persons; such is the necessary result of things. The power of this Federal Government must be further distinctly limited if we are to have good and pure government by Congress.

Well, sir, the people are beginning to consider that. I met an assembly of gentlemen who belong to the political organization I belong to not long ago in New York, and several of the leading men I talked with referred to the coming necessity of either amendments to the Constitution or a convention of the States. I do not now see that it will be necessary to have a convention of the States. The fathers who framed the Constitution for the government of three millions of people scattered along the sea-board knew that a time would come when the machinery they provided would require change, and they wisely put into their Constitution a provision for its amendment. Not that they intended their children to depart from their fundamental principles of government. No; but they intended their principles might be preserved by providing for changing their application according to the changing condition of things by this very process of amendments to the Constitution.

Whether it will come to a convention of the States or an amendment of the Constitution of the United States I know not, but certain changes in the Federal Constitution will have to come if gentlemen wish to preserve good government in this country. It is idle to suppose this business of special legislation with all its corrupting influence can go on for ever as it has been going. It is idle to suppose the President can always continue to hold eighty thousand offices in his hands which he can fill and vacate absolutely as he pleases, and which is a power in itself now large enough almost to secure presidential nominations and elections, and yearly increasing. It is idle to suppose that the continued growth of those artificial creatures authorized to perpetuate accumulations of property, the great corporations already so dangerous, can always be suffered. If we are to have real reform these things must be changed. The time has come to limit the Federal Government, and it will be done just as soon as the people have their attention sufficiently aroused to its necessity. Do you suppose when men come to give their attention to the subject they are always going to allow two representatives from New Mexico to counterbalance and offset two representatives from Pennsylvania or New York? Somebody said to me this morning that a change of representation in the Senate could only be brought about by revolution. If that be so, what then? Does it not occur to gentlemen that in this little strip of eight contiguous States, Massachusetts to Missouri, lies a majority of the wealth and power of this Union? If they should take it into their heads to go out of the Union, who can keep them in? And if a reform in this growing abuse of control by the minority over the majority could only be secured by revolution, why then, when they resolved on such revolution, it would be alike short, successful, and peaceable.

When the time comes that the people desire such a change, then this Government will be changed in these regards. Gentlemen from small States who do not want the equality of State representation in the Senate changed, are making the greatest mistake in the world when they lend their assistance to force into the Union small Territories to balance in the Senate the votes of the great States.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I ask the gentleman from New York whether he would as a Representative of New York, or as one of the Representatives of the State of New York, be willing to have any Territory come into the Union as a State even with a population of two hundred thousand?

Mr. POTTER. I answer frankly that I am, for myself, absolutely opposed to the admission of any State with a population of two hundred thousand, to come in upon equal terms with the great States in the Senate of the United States, without some controlling reason for its admission. I cannot conceive in the existing condition of the Government any such reason. I declare in my mind it would be an unwise and suicidal policy on the part of the great States to admit any small States while State equality in the Senate continues, and, on the other hand, it would be in the long run found a most suicidal policy on the part of the small States to insist upon it. Is the gentleman answered frankly?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Very frankly. You would exclude a Territory with two hundred thousand population, and if you would exclude a Territory from admission as a State with two hundred thousand population, would you exclude a Territory having a population of a million?

Mr. POTTER. That would depend entirely on circumstances and the general interest of the whole country at the time.

Mr. MAYNARD. The thought I should like to suggest to the gentleman from New York is this: New York, the Empire State, is always heard on applications like this, and apparently her voice is entitled to be heard, but she will please recollect, when she by her Representative speaks of small States, that these small States do not all lie in the West, but are scattered along the sea-board all the way from New Hampshire to Florida. When the gentleman comes from New York urging he has from his State in the other end of the Capitol but two representatives, he should remember there are six States lying directly east of him, identical in interest, having twelve representatives, with a population scarcely more than his own. The same principle applies along the sea-board, to a greater or less extent, quite as forcibly.

Mr. POTTER. My distinguished friend need not remind me of that. But those small States were original partners. If Rhode Island were to come now and apply for admission I would be as prompt to oppose it as I am New Mexico; not because it was part of New England, but because it was too small in the existing condition of things to be admitted as a State.

Mr. MAYNARD. Shall we who have had the good fortune to get into the partnership shut the door against the admission of any other?

Mr. POTTER. Does my friend when he has built up a great business and some individual applies to him to be admitted as an associate—does he take him in on the same terms as he would have admitted a partner before his business had become a great success? If my friend from Tennessee does that, I would be ready to advise some of my neighbors to remove to Tennessee to go into business with him.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman is now arguing the case on a much lower plane than I supposed he would have put it.

Mr. POTTER. On a smaller scale certainly, but on an analogous plane. The ground on which the original States formed the confederation of States in this Union was their own interest and self-government, meaning the interest and self-government of their peoples. Why should the people of the State of New York or the State of Pennsylvania or the State of Tennessee have their influence in the Government, their share in the Senate, neutralized by the admission of a handful of people on the Pacific, or for that matter the Atlantic coast?

Mr. MAYNARD. But I beg to suggest that when we are legislating for centuries, for long ages it may be, it is hardly commensurate with the importance of the subject to draw similes from the little personal gains and advantages that we may derive from ordinary traffic.

Mr. POTTER. When the centuries shall have developed in New Mexico a great and growing State, there will then be some analogy in connection with its admission into this Union with the case of Kentucky and Tennessee.

But the gentleman from Tennessee said the voice of New York was always heard upon this question of the admission of new States. And why not?

What, sir, would have been the fate of this Union in the great revolutionary war if New York had not taken part in that struggle? The historian, Sparks, told a friend of mine that in all his historical researches he has found no greater instance of self-abnegation on the part of a community than was shown by New York when she came into the Union. Commanding from her situation the avenues of communication between the lakes and the ocean, where she might have levied tolls on all the trade between the seas and the basin of the lakes, she took her position in the Union upon a footing of equality with all the other States. When since has she been outdone in patriotism and self-sacrifice? Not surely in the war of 1812, nor indeed in the late war of the rebellion, when she contributed to the common cause a quota of men and money larger in fact and larger in proportion than any other State of the North.

Sir, such a State has a right at any time, it seems to me, to assert in the interest of her people, through her Representatives, and that nothing, can be worse for the people of New York than to have their two chosen Senators met in the Senate and their voices stifled and votes neutralized by the representatives of a handful of men, whether they live on the one ocean or the other.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman allow me to remind him that the great men in the early days of his State, and Alexander Hamilton, the greatest of them all, foresaw the condition of things that he indicates, and foresaw a much greater future by casting in their fortunes with the little States and little handfuls of people that the gentleman speaks of, and that the people of his State have thereby made themselves what they now claim to be, and I think with propriety claim to be, the Empire State of the Union? But the same generous policy that animated the great men of that day could hardly, it seems to me, have dictated the sentiments which the gentleman has uttered here this morning.

Mr. POTTER. If the gentleman thinks that New York or Tennessee will be made greater than either is now by admitting two Senators from the State of New Mexico, he is welcome to his opinion. But as for Mr. Hamilton, let me say that in the constitutional convention he declared his apprehension even as to the representation of the then existing States in the Senate, and his own wish that he could wipe out State lines altogether; and it was only because it would shock public sentiment that he did not propose it at the time. He submitted to the necessity of State equality in the Senate. The gentleman from Tennessee must fail to find in existing circumstances any necessity for extending that inequality to New Mexico.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York a question right in the line of his allusion to Mr. Hamilton. Is not the gentleman's whole argument, considering what the States were when the Constitution was formed, an argument against the principle on which this Constitution itself was formed? Is not that the whole of it? That is, did not our fathers frame this Constitution on the principle that little States and great States should meet as equals in the Senate?

Mr. POTTER. They did frame it on that arrangement as to the States then existing, and because no other arrangement would have been tolerated. I do not suppose they so framed it because they desired to make the influence of Delaware equal to that of New York or Pennsylvania, but because it was the best thing they could do. And the inequality that then resulted was vastly less in their time, both because the range of legislation was narrower and because the States were more nearly equal in population.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Then does not the gentleman think that in admitting new States Congress ought to act upon that principle on which the Government was originally framed?

Mr. POTTER. No; not unless the circumstances were the same, whereas they are wholly different. I am not opposing the representation in the Senate of existing States, but the addition of any more small States.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to say to the gentleman that I am as much opposed to the admission of New Mexico as he is, but I am very sorry to hear his arguments.

Mr. POTTER. I do not expect that the gentleman from Massachusetts will agree with me in his political views. I am happy, however, to know he is now opposed to what I consider would be a great misfortune and evil, and trust he will give his own reason for it. But I want to say on that subject, right here, that if you put this Government back to the State-rights constructions in which I believed, and put the Federal Government under such limitations as it ought to be put under, then you can safely go on annexing Territory to Territory and adding State to State, and it will make little difference whether they are big or little. But it is precisely because you have centralized power in this Government and increased the range of its legislation that things are not in the same situation as when the Government was formed.

For myself, I believe in a government of States. And it is because I do believe in such a government that I seek to resist the admission of more small States, when I think their equal power in the Senate must have the effect of, in time, working injustice and dissatisfaction, and so tend to break down the powers and rights of the existing States.

And here let me say that I am far from objecting to a Federal Senate. On the contrary, I believe in two legislative Houses, whose concurrence shall be essential to any law; and that one should be composed of persons of more permanent tenure of office than the Representatives in this House, and be chosen by the Legislatures of the States rather than by the people directly. What I do object to, is the increase of the disproportionate representation already too great in the Senate of the minority of the people, the evil of which increases exactly as government is centralized. Every State has a Legislature with two houses. But in almost all the States the members of the upper house or senate are chosen in proportion to population. Such a senate is at least as republican in form as the existing United States Senate, the equal State representation in which was originally largely the result of a necessity which has long ceased to exist.

I rose to speak but a few moments, but owing to the indulgence and to the interruptions of the House combined I have occupied far more time than I intended, or than I have occupied upon any previous occasion. I have very strong feelings on this question. It is not a question of to-day, but one in reference to the future. If gentlemen in this House believe that there is to be a great State built up in New Mexico by the development of railroads to which the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. COBB] has alluded, then they may find some excuse for favoring this bill. But if they think, as I do, that these twenty-six years of slow growth, producing only a community of small population, is an indication that she will remain but a sparsely settled State, with barely population enough for a single Representative in this House, to say nothing of the two members of the Senate which will be given them, then I trust they will conclude as I do, and regard this bill as a dangerous proposition.

I say to the House that popular government cannot very long be maintained in a great country like this when controlled by a minority of the people entitled to suffrage——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McKEE. New Mexico is much obliged to the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER.] I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. McKEE. I propose to call for a vote in fifteen minutes. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HOSKINS.]

Mr. HOSKINS. When action was taken on this bill in the Committee on Territories, of which I have the honor to be a member, and it was decided to report it favorably to the House, I did not intend for one single moment to occupy the attention of the House in discussing it. I should not now rise and ask the attention of the House for a few moments were it not for the extraordinary remarks on this question which have fallen from my distinguished colleague, [Mr. POTTER.] I do not propose to follow that gentleman in the line of his remarks in discussing questions that have been dead and buried for years, the question of State rights and other questions growing out of that which agitated the country before the late war of the rebellion. I will confine myself to the question now before the House, as it is always my custom to discuss the question under consideration.

The Constitution of the United States declares that "Congress may admit new States into the Union." Of course this is a discretionary power, and in the wise exercise of that discretion should we approach the consideration of the bill now before us. There are but just two propositions connected with this matter, so far as my mind has been led to investigate it. The first is whether the people of the Territory of New Mexico that now come here asking to be admitted into this Union as a State represent the requisite population to entitle them to a Representative on this floor. The other question is whether the population of the Territory of New Mexico is of a character which entitles it to consideration, and which would indicate that they are in a condition for self-government.

My distinguished friend from New York [Mr. POTTER] in his remarks has attempted to show that the Territory of New Mexico has not the requisite population to entitle it to a Representative in Congress according to the present ratio. I propose to examine that question and see just how the matter stands.

In 1850 the population of New Mexico was 61,547. In 1860 it was 93,516, showing that in the ten years between 1850 and 1860 the population of that Territory had increased at the rate of 50 per cent. Between 1860 and 1870 the Territory of Arizona was organized and taken from New Mexico, carrying with it a population of 9,000 souls. Within the same period the northern tiers of counties were taken from New Mexico and connected with Colorado, carrying with them about 16,000 souls. Taking those two populations and adding them to the population of New Mexico proper, we find that in 1870 the Territory of New Mexico as formerly organized had a population of 118,000, showing an increase of about 30 per cent. between 1860 and 1870.

I make these remarks for the purpose of forever silencing the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] that there had been no relative increase in the population of this Territory from 1860 to 1870. The census of 1870 shows that the population of New Mexico, decreased in square miles as it has been, was over ninety thousand. And there is not a gentleman on this floor who does not know that in a sparsely populated country like New Mexico it would be utterly impossible and impracticable to reach the population of all the minor districts for the purpose of taking a census. Why, sir, I well recollect that it was charged that in 1870 the census in the city of New York was not properly taken; and if it was not properly taken there, was it fully and thoroughly taken in this sparsely populated Territory? It is estimated, Mr. Speaker, that at least ten thousand people actually residing in this Territory were not enumerated in the census of 1870; and, with this addition, the net population in that year, excluding all the Indians, was one hundred thousand. Now, supposing there has been the same relative increase from 1870 till this time, a period of nearly four years, the population to-day is at least 30 per cent. greater than it was when the census was taken; so that it is fair to suppose that the present population of New Mexico is not less than one hundred and thirty thousand.

Besides, there are in that Territory over ten thousand Indians, civilized Indians, many of them men of wealth, who have been a long time engaged in agricultural pursuits, and are among the best citizens of the country. If you add these, you have in the Territory of New Mexico to-day a net population of over one hundred and forty thousand respectable, enterprising citizens. Now, Mr. Speaker, if it be a fact that in this Territory there is to-day at least a population of one hundred and thirty thousand, I ask why, in the name of common sense, we should deny the appeal when they come here asking to be admitted into the sisterhood of States?

There are within that Territory over forty thousand people who are American-born or of European descent. Of the Mexicans and Spaniards there to-day most of them were born there, are the descendants of those who have occupied the soil for centuries; and they are among the most energetic and enterprising people on the face of the globe.

They have long been engaged in agriculture; many of them are men of wealth, and all these Mexicans and Spaniards who are under twenty-five years of age are able to speak the English language. The children of these Mexicans and Spaniards are now being educated in more than one hundred and fifty public schools of that Territory; and they are fast learning the English language; so that those who shall live to see the next census taken will see in that Territory not only a population of much more than one hundred and forty thousand people, but a population the greater part of whom will be familiar with the English language.

Sir, as one of the thirty-three Representatives of the great State of New York, I desire to say to this Congress of the American people that in my judgment the State of New York is ready to take by the hand these struggling settlements in the western country, and admit them on an equal footing with the original States whenever they present themselves with the requisite population and a constitution republican in form. We in the State of New York are a great people; we have vast population and vast wealth; and I believe from my soul that the people whom I represent would favor the admission of this new Territory into the Union as a State.

Before closing I wish to call attention to one significant fact: that at the last election for Delegate in Congress more than seventeen thousand votes were cast in New Mexico. This number is much in excess of the votes cast in many congressional districts in the States, and goes to show that the population has not been overestimated.

In view of the fact that this Territory has a much larger population than many States heretofore admitted and the requisite number for a Representative in Congress, and that her people are believed to be fully capable of self-government, and the additional fact that that whole country is filled with mineral wealth—lead, copper, silver, iron, and coal—which can only be developed when the people shall be allowed to throw off their territorial form of government, emerge from their pupilage, and assume the condition of a sovereign State, I for one am willing to vote for this bill, and allow her to come into the Union with all the rights, privileges, and responsibilities of a free and independent State.

Mr. McKEE. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR.]

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, the Constitution submits the question of the admission of new States to the discretion of Congress. It seems to me that Congress, exercising this discretion, ought not to admit the Territory of New Mexico as a State for two good and sufficient reasons.

In the first place, by the census of 1870 there are in that Territory 66,464 persons over ten years of age; and of that number 52,220, or about five-sixths, cannot read and write. A very large proportion of the inhabitants of that Territory cannot speak the English language.

Now, while it is true that no man should be debarred from the privileges of citizenship because he speaks Spanish only, or because he cannot read or write, (and to the number thus returned in that Territory we may safely add a large percentage, because people frequently say they can write when they can only write a word or two, their own names perhaps,) yet it seems to me that when Congress is considering the question whether the people of a Territory shall be formed into a State of the Union, the fact that they cannot perform the duties of American citizenship by voting intelligently on public questions, the fact the great body of them cannot understand the laws of the country, cannot read the discussions of political questions, cannot obtain information about their interests from newspapers or magazines, constitutes a strong reason why we should require such a community to wait for admission until they are better prepared.

There has been no public-school system in that Territory until within three years. A very few years ago the question was put to a vote of the people there whether they should have a public-school system, and the decision was in the negative by a large majority.

Mr. ELKINS. That was fifteen years ago.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. That may be; but still the fact remains. Within two or three years a school system has been established in the Territory, and very soon, when the young men educated in those schools shall have grown up, it may be proper to provide for the admission of this Territory.

As regards the question of relative population, I do not agree at all with the argument of my friend from New York, [Mr. POTTER.] I do not find fault because Delaware or Nebraska or Rhode Island has an equal vote with Massachusetts or New York in the Senate of the United States. That is in pursuance of the constitutional provision, and in my judgment it is a provision to which the glory and prosperity of this country are largely due.

I utterly repudiate the ground taken. It seems to me it is not discreet to incorporate it. While we are obliged to go down to Arkansas and lay the strong hand of Federal power to keep down mobs there, while we are obliged to do the same thing in Louisiana, while we are asked to do almost the same thing in other States, while our popular Government is going through this terrible ordeal, just getting through a civil war, it is no time to admit into our community of States this little community, this little population of one hundred and twenty or one hundred and thirty thousand inhabitants including Indians and all. It does not exceed one hundred and fifty thousand, of which five-sixths, by the last census, over ten years of age, cannot read or write, and of whom so large a proportion cannot speak the English language.

Mr. McKEE. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention to the suggestion that these people of New Mexico ought not to be vested with the right to vote upon the ground that they cannot read or write. I ask the attention of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] to the fact that in most of the Southern States of this Union, where an immense proportion are unable to read, the very party of which he is a distinguished representative has said over and over again they would not make that a test of qualifications for exercising the right of suffrage.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I made no such statement. I said that a population the larger proportion of whom could not read or write or speak the English language would be an objection to the admission of a State into the Union.

Mr. KASSON. What, then, is the difference between these modes of stating it? In either case the effect of the statement is this: The people of whom a large proportion cannot read or write ought not to be represented by votes upon the floor of Congress. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say the republican party can take no such ground as that without going back upon their entire record; and it is enough to say that it impeaches the record made by that party during the entire period since the war in respect to the Southern States of this Union.

Again, as to the equality of good citizenship on the part of the people of New Mexico. Who are the people who are making the fights, the dissensions, the riots if you please, in the States of the Union and in the great cities? Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] or any other gentleman point to one instance in the record of twenty-six years of occupation of New Mexico by Federal authority in which one building has been destroyed, one church or school-house assailed, one single violation by any part of that community of the laws of sobriety and good order? Educated or uneducated, let no injustice be done to an orderly, law-observing, and law-abiding people like those of the Territory of New Mexico. They may justly come here and say, "Compare us with those of Anglo-Saxon descent in respect to our obedience to law and our observance of order."

Uneducated if they be, do not they know whom they are electing to the floor of this House? If that be ignorance which characterizes New Mexico when they send a Delegate here like him to whom we have listened to-day, then let us beware we do not charge excessive ignorance upon a people who have had sense enough to send such a representative.

Let me turn for a moment to the argument of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER.] I ask him whether what he has said touching the representation of new States with small populations is just to the people of the West? I am willing to compare Senator with Senator from Western States and from New York in all the history of the last forty years. I will go further, and compare the purity of western Legislatures with that of the Legislatures of two or three of the States not many hundred miles away from the city of Washington. In reference to their representation in the Congress of the United States I do not think the gentleman from New York would desire that a comparison should be prosecuted very far touching that very State to which he referred, especially the State of Nevada, the illustration he used that the people of the West are too much in the habit of sending men of means to the Senate of the United States. I ask him whether his constituents above all others in the Union have not been loudest in their praise of one of these very Senators, nay of that very Senator himself, for having the other day made the ablest speech upon the financial questions of the country in the Senate, and a speech in support of their own views.

Mr. POTTER. I am frank to say that I join with the people of my State generally in an approval of the views of the Senator from Nevada to which the gentleman from Iowa has alluded, and in admiration of the vigor and manliness with which they were expressed. But I still insist that a condition of things which enables one man readily to control a State, however much it may have eventuated in the particular case in our favor or according to our view, is on principle a dangerous political condition of things.

Mr. KASSON. I by no means misrepresent or misunderstand the position of the gentleman. I understood him perfectly. But shall I point to one or two Senators elected from the State of New York within the last fifteen or twenty years, stated on the same authority and no other to have been elected by the use of means that were improper?

Mr. POTTER. I did not say that as a fact of anybody. All I said was that a small State is more easily subject to that sort of influence in respect to its choice of Senators.

Mr. KASSON. I will say in answer to the gentleman, no more than great and wealthy States are they subject to those influences. As to my own State and the State of Wisconsin, do we not remember that noble and honest man, Mr. Dodge, who was the first Senator that Wisconsin sent here? Do not I and others of us remember that other man, one of the first sent from the State of Iowa, James W. Grimes, whose ability on the floor of the Senate was equal to that of the foremost Senator from any State of the Union, who long wielded power over the entire Navy of the United States as perhaps no other chairman of the Naval Committee ever did; a man who went almost unknown to the State of Iowa, and came back here and took his seat as Senator from the new State, and developed an integrity, an honesty, and a vigorous ability to an extent unsurpassed by the representative of any State in the Union? Shall I point to Benton, of Missouri, one of the five great men of the strongest era in the history of the United States Senate, who came as a Senator from a State with a population not one-third that of the State of New York. Shall I go through history, and point to Clay, of Kentucky, and others from the new States whose renown is a part of the history of the country?

And so going over the Senate of the United States, man for man, new States and old States, I will challenge comparison of ability and public service upon the testimony of history. And I say that the young, the vigorous, the intelligent population of the West, though they may not be educated in schools of learning as I wish they might be, do understand human character, and do know the men who will best serve their States and the country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. POTTER. If all that is necessary to make a good Senator is to have a small constituency behind him, the way to improve the Senators from our State would be to have fifty of them.

Mr. MCKEE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. COX. There is only one other man on this floor, at this time, who has voted to admit so many States into the Union as I have. I voted for the admission of Oregon, when it had a population of less than one hundred thousand. I voted for the admission of Minnesota. I voted for the admission of Kansas before she was fully entitled to it, and I voted for the admission of Nebraska. But out of all of those trials and tribulations in regard to the admission of States in those early days of Buchanan's administration, out of all that red sea of trouble we got some little good, because at the end of this struggle we agreed to a certain rule, and that rule was that a population equal to the ratio represented by a member of Congress should always be sufficient for the admission of a State, and that was entered of record and a joint resolution passed to give effect to it.

But, sir, while I believe that under the Constitution we have the fullest discretion in regard to the admission of States, I may have reasons to-day why I would not vote for the admission of New Mexico; but they are not the reasons altogether which were given in the eloquent speech of my distinguished colleague. I have only five minutes in which to respond to what my colleague has said. As I understood him, he took the ground that he would not under any circumstances vote for the admission of a State having a population of only two hundred thousand. That is not the doctrine of the people of the State of New York, as I understand it. Nor is it in accordance with the precedents, as I understand them, in this House or in the Senate.

In further elucidation of the sentiment of New York, my colleague—from whom I dislike to differ on anything—gave his peculiar theory of the Federal system—a theory which does not belong to the democratic party either of New York or of the North, and which has been settled by the arbitrament of the sword, as well as by judicial and legislative decisions. We have no more right to expel a State from this Union than a State has to withdraw from it. And so, on the other hand, a State has no more right to withdraw from the Union than you have to vote a State out of it. No platform of either party in the North ever held up such a heresy, and although it may have been enunciated with great force by my friend, yet I will say to him that it does not receive the sanction of the body of democratic gentlemen who have requested me to speak on this subject to-day, nor of their constituents at home.

I believe that the Union of these States was made one and indivisible; that there is no power to divide them, that if you seek by any amendment of the Constitution to tear these States apart you must do it by the prescribed mode written in the organic law, and even then it is doubtful whether you can tear these States apart by any such amendments. I have discussed that matter heretofore, and have taken the ground that by an amendment in the prescribed mode you can make any change you please; that you can elect the King of Dahomey as your king.

Mr. POTTER. I agree with the gentleman. I do not differ with him about the constitutional power. But I am at a loss to know to what portion of my remarks he has been referring.

Mr. COX. I have referred to what I understood to be the drift of the gentleman's remarkable generalization.

Mr. POTTER. Understood what?

Mr. COX. That you favored the theory of secession, and that a State could leave the Union.

Mr. POTTER. I said nothing of the kind. I did not even know that we were talking about secession; I supposed we were talking about the future.

Mr. COX. The report of the gentleman's remark will show what he said. I think I cannot be mistaken, for gentlemen all around me understood the same. If I was mistaken I am glad the gentleman stands on the same platform with me, that of our party. There are reasons why perhaps now it would not be wise to exercise this discretion.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that I believe the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] said that if he had the power to make a union he would make it so that every State could leave it at its will.

Mr. POTTER. Not exactly.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I understood so.

Several MEMBERS. So did I.

Other MEMBERS. Not so.

Mr. POTTER. I said, generalizing, that if I had the power to make a government of States I would so arrange it that any set of States lying together, having reasonable regard to magnitude and the necessities of the case, might go out at pleasure; because I believe it would make a firmer union than a union resulting from law only.

Mr. COX. We heard enough of that talk before the war.

Mr. POTTER. I am sorry my friend differs with me.

Mr. COX. I will say, returning to the bill before the House, that I would not object to the admission of New Mexico as a State upon the ground suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] and which was so admirably answered by my friend from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.] And while we have Arkansas, South Carolina, and Louisiana to take care of, it would be a very good amendment to this bill to provide for their admission at the same time as New Mexico.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was on the passage of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL and others called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 160, nays 54, not voting 76; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Atkins, Averill, Banning, Barrere, Barry, Biery, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Buckner, Bundy, Burchard, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Caldwell, Cannon, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Clark, jr., Clements, Stephen A. Ward, Wells, Wheeler, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Woodford, and Woodworth—76.

So the bill was passed.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. WARD, of Illinois, said: On this question I am paired with Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. If present he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. DURHAM. My colleague, Mr. BROWN, has been called home by sickness in his family.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to make an explanation.

The SPEAKER. Is it anything connected with a pair?

Mr. MILLS. It is not.

The SPEAKER. Then it is not in order.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent to make a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER The Chair is prohibited strictly by the rule from asking unanimous consent for anything during the calling of the roll. If that could be done, the roll-call might be interrupted indefinitely.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. MCKEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I sought the floor a few moments ago, before the vote was announced, to make a statement in reference to a provision of the bill just passed. Some gentlemen around me observing the following words in the bill on their desks were determined to vote against it. The objectionable clause is as follows:

Provided, That the constitution shall be republican in form, and make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color except Indians not taxed, and not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence: And provided further, That said convention shall provide, by an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said State, first, that there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said State otherwise than in the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted; secondly, that perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested, in person or property, on account of his or her mode of religious worship.

On my assuring them that these words were stricken out of the bill reported by the committee they voted for the bill, and I was anxious to state to them in time for them to change their votes that the bill at the Clerk's desk, strange enough to me, contained the words that I knew were stricken out in the committee on my own motion. I regret that I misled them, but it was because I have been misled myself. I now state in the hearing of all the committee, and they all sustain me, that the words were stricken out because the amendments to the Constitution covered the whole ground, and it was useless to keep that question perpetually open by legislative declarations. I myself and others in the House voted for the bill believing it was the one reported by the committee; but I now state to the House it is not the same bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill was read in the House at length.

Mr. MILLS. But as the Speaker is aware, it is often difficult in this Hall to hear even what is read by the Clerk.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. POLAND. I desire to bring up the bill in relation to judicial proceedings in Utah.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the bill reported by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] from the Committee on Ways and Means for the repeal of the Sanborn contracts, on which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is entitled to the floor. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECK. No, sir.

Mr. POLAND. If gentlemen desire to go on with the special order, I do not undertake to antagonize it.

Mr. SPEER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] yields to me that I may move to adjourn.

INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial of the Society of Friends of Dutchess County, New York, praying that national disputes may be settled by arbitration; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

The memorial is as follows:

To the United States Senate and House of Representatives:

Your memorialists, feeling confident that the war system of settling national differences is in direct violation of morality and Christianity, and largely detrimental to the best interest of all concerned:

We therefore respectfully ask you to prosecute appropriate measures for determining national disputes by just and peaceful arbitration, as a prevention of the cruelties and destructive barbarities inseparable from war.

Signed on behalf of Nine-Partners Quarterly Meeting of the religious Society of Friends, held at Poughkeepsie, Dutchess County, New York, the 5th day of Fifth-month, 1874, by the clerks, JUSTUS C. HAVILAND.

PHEBE U. HAVILAND.

Mr. SPEER. I now move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts: The petition of Mrs. Margaret S. Hastings, for arrears of pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee: The petition of Dr. B. F. C. Brooks, of Nashville, Tennessee, to be paid for rent and destruction of property in the late war, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. DAWES: The petition of Julia E. Seeley, postmaster at Great Barrington, Massachusetts, for relief, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. DUNNELL: The petition of grange organizations of Olmsted County, Minnesota, for the construction of the Continental Railway, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. HOUGHTON: The remonstrance of settlers and pre-emption claimants in Round Valley, California, against the proposed legislation in reference to Round Valley recommended by Commissioners Cowan and SHANKS in their report, to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. McDILL, of Iowa: Petitions from grange organizations of Adams County, Iowa, for the construction of the Continental Railroad and passage of the House bill therefor, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS: The petition of sundry citizens of Wisconsin in favor of international arbitration, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. SENER: The petition of David A. Flippins, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Claims.

Also, the petition of Thomas M. Wiatt, postmaster at Urbana, Virginia, for relief, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania: Joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, in favor of fostering the building of American ships by American mechanics and with American materials, and against changing the contracts made by the Postmaster-General for carrying the mails to China and Japan, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. STORM: Joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. THOMAS, of Virginia: The petition of G. R. Gray, of Halifax County, Virginia, for relief, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. VANCE: The petition of J. Johnston, N. G. Allman, and 80 other citizens of Macon County, North Carolina, for aid in building the Western North Carolina Railroad from Old Fort, North Carolina, to Ducktown, Tennessee, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 22, 1874.

The Senate met at eleven o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

Mr. EDMUNDS, (at eleven o'clock and five minutes a. m.) May I ask the Chair if a quorum is present?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of the absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think we must show by the record who are absent, if we are going to carry out that order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, (at eleven o'clock and ten minutes a. m.) There is a quorum of Senators present; and the Secretary will read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

Mr. BOREMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 44) to establish the Territory of Pembina, and to provide a temporary government therefor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia moves to suspend the morning business and proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him. Is there objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to have the bill read in order that I may know whether to object or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the title of the bill.

Mr. OGLESBY. If the morning business which is ready to be presented can be disposed of, I shall have no objection to the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. OGELSBY. I object until the morning business is through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Petitions and memorials are in order.

Mr. BOREMAN. I made a motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is out of order while the morning business is being presented.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PRATT presented the petition of Lucy G. Clark, widow of General Marston G. Clark, of Indiana, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am requested to present the memorial of the national agricultural congress, recently assembled at Atlanta, Georgia, asking that Congress shall set apart half of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands for the aid and encouragement of agricultural colleges. They represent that this conclusion was arrived at, with but one exception, by the entire body, and reverses the action of the same congress a year ago at Indianapolis. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I present a petition of citizens and tax-payers of the city of Oakland, Alameda County, California, asking for an appropriation of moneys sufficient to improve the water front of that city for the purpose of enabling any class of ships to load and discharge; in which they state that in 1873 over one hundred ships, carrying over one hundred and fifty thousand tons of grain, were loaded at a temporary wharf; that there are over two million passengers passing over this front and over thirty million dollars of treasure annually and four hundred and fifty thousand tons of freight of all kinds; and they set forth the great importance of this improvement. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1579) for the relief of Joseph J. Petri, being a bill for compensation for services and expenditures in rescuing a snow-bound party of California emigrants in 1849, have instructed me to report it back, almost by a divided committee, I am authorized to say, and recommend its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred a resolution of the Senate empowering the committee to send for persons and papers in making the inquiry into the matter of gas, &c., asked to be discharged from its further consideration, the subject having been acted upon; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, who were directed by a resolution of the Senate to inquire into the propriety of removing the railing back of the seats of Senators, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, it having already been acted upon; which was agreed to.

Mr. OGLESBY. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. No. 637) to settle certain accounts between the United States and the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, have again had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to report the bill back with the accompanying report, which was heretofore printed, and to recommend the passage of the bill. I will state to the Senate that the report made in the first instance is again adopted and brought back with the bill; but as that report was printed with the names of certain members of the committee upon it, I ask that the majority report may be printed now and the names omitted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered if there be no objection.

Mr. OGLESBY. I did not complete my statement in the case of the bill just reported from the Committee on Public Lands. The committee also agreed to permit the minority report to be reprinted if the minority choose to do so, the same as the majority report is printed, in which instance three names will appear on the minority report.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3154) amendatory of the act to incorporate the Columbia Railway Company of the District of Columbia, approved May 24, 1871, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3411) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the trustees of the Female Orphan Asylum in Georgetown, and the Washington City Orphan Asylum in the District of Columbia," approved May 24, 1828, reported it without amendment.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2738) for the relief of the Foundry Methodist Episcopal church, of Washington City, to report it back and ask for its present consideration.

Mr. MITCHELL. I object.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope the Senator from Oregon will not object. The bill is simply to authorize the trustees of a church to sell a lot of ground.

Mr. MITCHELL. I simply object until the morning business is through. I wish to make a report.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The bill could have been passed by this time if the Senator had made no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the objection insisted upon?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 769) for the relief of Major J. W. Nicholls, paymaster United States Army, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3303) to extend the time for filing claims for additional bounty under the act of July 28, 1866, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3257) authorizing the Secretary of War to sell unserviceable ordnance stores, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Delila Kelly, widow of Daniel H. Kelly, deceased, praying that his name may be placed upon the muster-rolls of Company F, Second Tennessee Volunteer Infantry, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 841) for the relief of Daniel H. Kelly.

The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SARGENT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Mercy Ann Hall and the petition of the survivors of the Polaris, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 843) for the relief of the survivors of the Polaris.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1297) for the relief of Thomas T. Crittenden, of Missouri, have had the same under consideration and directed me to report it with an amendment, and to ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there a written report with that bill?

Mr. DAVIS. I will state that this is a bill recommended unanimously by the Committee on Claims, by the Secretary of the Treasury, and by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Their letters accompany the papers. There is an amendment reported by our committee which has not been read, leaving the discretion with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue whether or not the amount ought to be allowed.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there a written report?

Mr. DAVIS. There is.

Mr. CONKLING. From a committee of this body?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir; made this morning. The bill is reported from the Committee on Claims unanimously.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It ought to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A request is made for printing the report, which is in the nature of an objection to the present consideration of the bill.

WILLIAM B. THOMAS.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2202) for the relief of William B. Thomas, late collector of customs at the port of Philadelphia, to report it back with a recommendation that it pass, and I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay William B. Thomas, late collector of customs for the port of Philadelphia, $32,963.28, that being the amount paid by him into the Treasury of the United States on account of an abstraction of funds from the custom-house at Philadelphia by G. Milton Allen, while Collector Thomas was engaged in the military service, aiding in the suppression of the late rebellion, under leave of absence from the Secretary of the Treasury, and which abstraction was not owing to any fault or negligence of said collector.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RELIEF OF SUFFERERS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. LOGAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 103) authorizing the President to issue Army rations and clothing to destitute people on the Tombigbee, Warrior, and Alabama Rivers, with papers showing the immediate necessity of this resolution, to report it back without amendment, and I ask the indulgence of the Senate to put it upon its passage at this time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there any amendment reported limiting that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No amendment is reported.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which authorizes the President, in his discretion, to direct the issue of Army rations and clothing of patterns not now issued to the Army, to the starving and destitute people on the Tombigbee, Warrior, and Alabama Rivers, who have been rendered destitute by the inundation of their homes in the valleys of those rivers.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECOMMITTAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I desire to make a motion. Yesterday, from the Committee on Patents, I reported adversely to the application of Joshua H. Butterworth for an extension of his patent for an improvement in bank and safe locks. Since that time I have been informed that he desires to submit additional papers to the committee, and I therefore move to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted and to recommit the case to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I move that the bill (H. R. No. 870) to place the name of Mrs. Mary E. Murphy on the pension-roll, reported adversely upon some days since, be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of State, in response to a resolution of the Senate of the 15th instant, in regard to a certain flag placed at the disposal of the American commissioners to the Vienna international exhibition; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

CENTENNIAL EXHIBITION.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1394) in relation to the centennial exhibition, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to report it back with an amendment and recommend its passage; and I desire to say that I shall endeavor at an early moment to invite the attention of the Senate to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine gives notice of his intention to call up at an early day the bill just reported by him.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. In this connection I beg leave to present a memorial to Congress from the board of United States centennial commissioners, which I ask may be laid upon the table and printed, as the bill on the subject is now reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. ALCORN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 842) referring the claim of Mrs. Julia A. Nutt, executrix of the late Haller Nutt, deceased, to the Court of Claims; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

EXPORTATION OF DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2081, reported from a committee of conference, and which report was passed over yesterday for the reason that it had not been printed. It is now on the tables of Senators.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 2081) to facilitate the exportation of distilled spirits, and amendatory of the acts in relation thereto.

The report was concurred in.

QUARTERMASTER'S CORPS.

Mr. LOGAN. Yesterday the bill (H. R. No. 3116) to correct the date of commission of certain officers of the Army in reference to the Quartermaster's Department was up, and I gave notice that I should call it up again this morning; but at the request of my friend from New Hampshire, [Mr. WADLEIGH,] who desires to further examine the case, we have agreed to call it up on Monday.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 3030) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1873 and 1874, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COOPER and Mr. JOHNSTON submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them to the bill (H. R. No. 3168) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works for rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

FOUNDRY METHODIST CHURCH.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I ask the Senate now to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2733) for the relief of the Foundry Methodist Episcopal church of Washington City, which I reported this morning.

Mr. BOREMAN. I gave notice a while ago that as soon as the morning business was concluded, I should move to take up the bill to establish a new Territory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair heard the notice, but did not hear the motion.

Mr. BOREMAN. I made a motion at the time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion at the time was out of order. The Senator gave notice that he would make a motion, but he has not yet made it. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia. The Senator from Virginia moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2738) for the relief of the Foundry Methodist Episcopal church of Washington City.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. By it the trustees of the Foundry Methodist Episcopal church of Washington are authorized to sell, for the benefit of that church, the east half of lot No. 9, in square No. 158, in the city of Washington.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TERRITORY OF PEMBINA.

Mr. BOREMAN. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 44) to establish the Territory of Pembina and to provide a temporary government therefor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments reported by the Committee on Territories will now be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the report of the committee read, if there is one accompanying the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report of the committee will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. BOREMAN on the 23d of March:

The Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 44) to establish the Territory of Pembina and to provide a temporary government therefor, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully submit the following report:

The same bill was before this committee at the second session of the Forty-second Congress, and, on February 8, 1872, a favorable report was made thereon, as follows:

"It is proposed by this bill to establish and provide a temporary government for a new Territory out of that part of the Territory of Dakota lying north of the forty-sixth degree of north latitude.

"The present Territory of Dakota contains 150,932 square miles, being in extent about four hundred miles from north to south, and something less than that in width from east to west. It appears from the report of the late census that in 1870 it contained a population of 14,181, exclusive of Indians, but it is now believed, from the best evidence your committee have been able to obtain, that at this time its population numbers more than twenty-five thousand.

"The more populous and growing settlements are in the extreme northern and extreme southern portions of the Territory, respectively, the intervening region, except immediately on the eastern border, being in great part uninhabited and without roads or other avenues of communication. There being no direct route of travel between these distant settlements, those residing in the region of Pembina, or indeed in any part of the more northern sections of the Territory, in going to Yankton, the capital, as many of them must necessarily do in the transaction of business with the officers and courts of the Territory, are compelled to travel a distance of from one thousand to fifteen hundred miles, and this by the nearest practicable route. And the same is the case with the judges and other officers in going from the capital to attend to their respective duties in the northern portions of the Territory.

"The Territory for which it is proposed by this bill to provide a government is a parallelogram, extending from Minnesota, on the east, for something less than four hundred miles, to Montana, on the west, and from the British possessions, on the north, two hundred miles to the boundary of the remaining Territory of Dakota, on the south, and has an area of about seventy thousand square miles. It contains a population now of not less than ten thousand, having received considerable accessions by immigration since the taking of the late census; and it may be added, when separated from Dakota, will leave the latter with a population as large as the whole Territory had in 1870. The contemplated Territory will have a larger population than many of the Territories heretofore established had when they were organized, as may be seen from the following:

Mississippi, organized in 1789, population	8,850
Indiana, organized in 1800, population	5,641
Michigan, organized in 1805, population less than	4,000
Wisconsin, organized in 1836, population	7,000
Minnesota, organized in 1849, population	6,077
Washington, organized in 1853, population	1,201
Dakota, organized in 1861, population	4,837
Nevada, organized in 1861, population	6,857
Arizona, organized in 1863, population	5,000

"The climate and seasons of the new Territory are about the same as in the adjoining State of Minnesota. The land lies beautifully, being comparatively level, and nearly every part of it being susceptible of cultivation. The soil is good, and produces all the grains, vegetables, and fruits common to the Northwestern States. The Northern Pacific Railroad, located as it is through the entire length of the Territory from east to west, and being now in process of construction, will soon supply the means of direct and speedy communication with all parts of the country. And the present indications are that this Territory will continue to rapidly improve and increase in population as it has for two or three years past, thereby extending and adding to the substantial prosperity and wealth of the nation; and it is believed that these desirable results will be greatly facilitated and rendered more certain by the establishment of the temporary government contemplated by this bill."

Since making the above report the Northern Pacific Railroad has been completed to Bismarck, on the Missouri River, a distance of two hundred miles from the western boundary of Minnesota.

Bismarck is a considerable town, and many other small towns and villages have sprung up along the railroad and elsewhere in the Territory; large numbers have been added to the population; immigration still continues, and no doubt is entertained that with the opening of the present spring the influx of population will exceed that of any preceding season.

The following extract from a speech delivered in the House of Representatives on the 14th instant, by Hon. M. K. ARMSTRONG, present Delegate from Dakota, your committee believe is a fair and reliable statement of the present condition of that portion of Dakota for which the bill under consideration proposes a separate organization:

"Two hundred miles of the Northern Pacific Railroad have been pushed westward across that Territory from the fertile valley of the Red River to the navigable waters of the Upper Missouri. Two newspapers are published in the proposed Territory, and stirring and enterprising towns have been built up at Fargo, Jamestown, and Bismarck on the said railroad, while immigration and settlement are rapidly filling up the accessible river valleys. Steamboats navigate the Red River nearly two hundred miles into the proposed Territory, returning with thousands of tons of freight for the Hudson Bay settlements; while along said stream in Dakota new towns and mills are being established. Nearly four hundred miles of telegraph line are in operation, and at Pembina, Grand Forks, Fargo, and Richville quite a trade is already carried on in the way of shipping and reshipping freights. United States courts are held at Fargo, Bismarck, and Pembina, and a United States land office has recently been established at the former place, while the settlers are urgently petitioning for a land office at Bismarck to accommodate the increasing settlements in the Missouri Valley. Many large steamboats ply for several hundred miles through the proposed Territory on the waters of the Missouri, and pass far above the mouth of the Yellowstone into Montana, carrying Government freight for the forts and agencies, and mercantile goods for the mining districts. Already several thousand people have gone into this northern territory, and are preparing farms, homes, and villages, in anticipation of the favorable action of Congress upon this bill."

It is proper, also, to add that the Legislature of Dakota have twice—in 1871, and again in 1873—memorialized Congress in behalf of the establishment of this new Territory, in which they state with great force the facts which induce them to do so, and urge it as a matter of justice to those inhabiting the proposed Territory, as well as of interest and advantage to the country generally.

To meet the objection that the establishment of another Territory will entail additional charge on the Treasury, the committee submit the following communication from the Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 17, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 15th instant, requesting to be informed of "the charge upon the Treasury for each of the respective existing Territories, and the items that make up the same."

In reply, I inclose herewith a statement showing the expenditures under heads of appropriations on account of each Territory during the fiscal years 1872 and 1873. The items of expenditure for fuel, furniture, repairs, lights, &c., are so numerous that it is not practicable to give them in detail.

I am, very respectfully,

WM. A. RICHARDSON, Secretary.

Hon. A. I. BOREMAN,
Chairman Committee on Territories, United States Senate.

Aggregate expenditure for the nine Territories for two years $490,803.78. One-ninth of the above is the average expenditure for one Territory for two years, and is $54,533.75½. One-half of the last-named sum shows the average annual expenditure of one Territory, and is $27,266.87.

This communication and statement show the separate and aggregate expenditure out of the Treasury for all the Territories for two consecutive years, thus including the expenses of a session of the Legislature in each, and enabling us to fix the average annual charge on the Treasury for a territorial government. This average, as may be seen above, is $27,266.87, and is a small outlay for the benefits realized from such a government.

It must be conceded that the development and growth of this Territory will tend to add to the wealth and prosperity of the nation, and it can be no less apparent that the thousands of hardy and enterprising people within its boundaries, who, by the sacrifices, energy, and industry indispensable to success in border life, are thus contributing to the resources of the country have a right, even though it necessitates a small annual draught on such resources, to demand a recognition of their situation, wants, and interests by the establishment of a local government that will be accessible for the transaction of their necessary business at only a reasonable expenditure of their time and means.

The committee, therefore, report back said bill with some verbal amendments, and recommend that the same do pass.

Before the reading of the report was concluded,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, which is Senate bill No. 1.

Mr. BOREMAN. I request that the reading of the report may be concluded. It is nearly through. There are but a few lines left.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I must insist on the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is called for.

AMENDMENT OF MINING LAW.

Mr. HAMLIN. By the indulgence of the Senator from New Jersey who has the floor, [Mr. STOCKTON,] I ask the Senate to take up a bill which I think will not occupy two minutes, extending the fifth section of the mining law. If it is to pass, it should be passed now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent to lay aside the regular order informally for the purpose of taking up the bill indicated by him.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 822) to amend the act entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," passed May 10, 1872.

The bill proposes to amend the provisions of the fifth section of the act entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," passed May 10, 1872, which requires expenditures of labor and improvements on claims located prior to the passage of the act, so that the time for the first annual expenditure on claims located prior to the passage of the act shall be extended to the 1st day of January, 1875.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to appeal to the Senator from New Jersey who has charge of the civil-rights bill, to allow me to call up the deficiency bill. We are somewhat behind in the consideration of the appropriation bills.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I cannot consent to allow any business to interfere with the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey insists on the regular order.

Mr. SARGENT. Then I will not insist on my request, but I should like to give notice that I shall call up the deficiency bill at the very earliest moment.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 2418) to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3424) for the relief of Thomas Winans and William L. Winans.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask leave to make a report from the committee of conference on the naval appropriation bill, that it may be printed and lie on the table, giving notice that I shall call it up to-morrow morning.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1013) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 5, 8, 9, 12, and 20.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 13, 17, 19.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out the word "fifteen" and in lieu thereof insert the word "eighteen;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out the words "two hundred and fifty" and insert in lieu thereof the words "sixty-five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14, and agree to the same with the following amendment: Strike out of said amendment the words "and sixty-five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

A. A. SARGENT,
LOT M. MORRILL,
H. G. DAVIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
EUGENE HALE,
J. HANCOCK,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

CIVIL RIGHTS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to protect all citizens of the United States in their civil rights, and to furnish the means for their vindication," passed April 9, 1866, the pending question being upon the amendment of Mr. THURMAN to the amendment adopted as in Committee of the Whole, which was to strike out the second section of the matter proposed to be inserted, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That any person who shall violate the foregoing section by denying to any citizen, except for reasons by law applicable to citizens of every race and color, and regardless of any previous condition of servitude, the full enjoyment of any of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, or privileges in said section enumerated, or by aiding or inciting such denial, shall, for every such offense, forfeit and pay the sum of $500 to the person aggrieved thereby, to be recovered in an action on the case, with full costs; and shall also, for every such offense, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $1,000, or shall be imprisoned not less than thirty days nor more than one year: Provided, That the party aggrieved shall not recover more than one penalty; and when the offense is a refusal of burial, the penalty may be recovered by the heirs at law of the person whose body has been refused burial: And provided further, That all persons may elect to sue for the penalty aforesaid or to proceed under their rights at common law and by State statutes; and having so elected to proceed in the one mode or the other, their right to proceed in the other jurisdiction shall be barred. But this proviso shall not apply to criminal proceedings, either under this act or the criminal law of any State.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, I attempted in the few desultory remarks that I made yesterday to show the Senate that this bill was not a bill to secure equal rights. I desire that the Senate and the country may know that that is my view of the bill; that so far as the measure is presented to us in that capacity, as a bill whose object and effect will be to secure equal rights to any of the citizens of this country, it will be a fraud; it can have no such effect; but, on the contrary, its results will be precisely the reverse. I said that the proposition was where the whites were in the ascendency, in a large majority, to give the minority the control of that majority, and thus destroy the fundamental principle and frame-work of our Government, which is built upon the majority rule.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] yesterday said that rights were to be protected; equal rights were to be secured by fines and penalties, by making it criminal to violate them; and, therefore, because the constitutional amendment secured to all persons equal rights, or attempted to do so, by saying that no State should pass any law to the contrary, we could create new crimes, new offenses unknown to the common law, unknown to any statute law in the history of any people before; that we could make undefined crimes, unknown crimes, and affix to them fines and penalties; and that these crimes should consist in interfering with the minority (for that is what it comes to) in the attempt to control the majority in their own localities in reference to their own municipal laws.

Before I examine the features of this bill, as I intend to do more accurately and thoroughly before I call attention to its unconstitutionality, I refer to this fact in the general proposition of the bill, and say that in the history of the world, from the earliest records we have, no people belonging to a majority and a dominant race have ever attempted to take a small minority, inferior in number, inferior in education, inferior in intellect, and place them alongside of themselves as social equals and governors of the country. When the right of suffrage was conceded to the African race, it was done against the protest of large numbers of both parties. It will be well remembered that the amendment was adopted against the protest of hundreds and thousands of people, of conventions held in the country, and of Senators on this floor. It was declared to be adopted by coercing the votes of at least three sovereign States. But, sir, when the suffrage was given to these people, (which cannot now be undone, I admit,) it was not because it was manhood suffrage as it was called, but because the authors of it meant to make the African race the governors of the country. This bill is another step in the same direction, to place them upon social and civil equality with the white race, and, more than that, to force the majority where the ascendency of the population is white, to be controlled by the colored voter, and where the colored voter is in the ascendency, he controls the white man. It is not only, then, making him your governor, but you give no equal rights at all. By this legislation you elevate the colored man above the white man in every part of this country, and surrender the government of the country to him. Is this kind to him? Is this good for the colored man, ignorant as he is, though that may not be his fault? Uneducated as are the colored people, not able to read the ballots they put in, are they to be made the governors of this country? Is the balance of power to be thrown into their hands? Do you mean that, or do you not? If you do not, why are you so persistent at this time in pushing this bill in opposition to all the public business?

Mr. President, if the captain of the ship and the pilot, in the middle of the ocean, in heavy weather, go to the galley and call the cook and send for the steward and put in their hands the command of the vessel and its navigation, it may be equal rights; but I think the passengers on board that ship would prefer that the captain should keep the ascendency, and that he and the pilot should navigate the vessel. If you choose to hold out to the cook and steward the hopes that by diligent attention to their business they may some day become pilots and navigators, the passengers might not object; but if you take them unlettered, unlearned, and degrade the captain and pilot to work in the galley and do mess duty, and insist upon running the ship with those who know nothing of navigation or pilotage, I think you would make a mistake that you would deeply regret when it resulted in the loss of your ship.

But, Mr. President, I said that I wished to call attention to the reason why this bill was urged particularly at this time. I desire in this connection to read the resolutions of a convention recently assembled at Nashville, a convention contemporaneous with the moving of the waters in the republican caucus and the revival of this bill; a convention which spoke and whose voice has been heard, a convention of colored people, and I leave it to others to decide which is the puppet and which is the man that pulls the strings. I ask the Secretary to read the resolutions of that convention, which I send to the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE, April 29.

The colored State convention reassembled this morning. The proceedings were harmonious. The resolutions, which are very voluminous, take decided grounds in favor of equal rights and of the supplementary civil-rights bill. Among the resolutions are the following:

"Resolved, That we will consider the omission of the republican party to enact the civil-rights bill a base surrender of the rights of humanity to our insidious foe that has contested upon the arenas of civil life every right we enjoy, as they did every right of freedom on the field of battle, and we will use our utmost effort to stamp upon every demagogue who seeks to betray the privileges of our children to their full and impartial enjoyment in the public schools the brand of the traitor Judas, as deserving politically a traitor's doom, with whom we will never join hands or support, but will regard as our public and private enemy; more terrible to meet than the savage beasts; more injurious than any catastrophe that could befall us, or any calamity that could be deserved by any wicked criminal; but equal and impartial rights will secure to posterity their just and true relation. Order will come out of chaos. Love will spring up where hate exists. Ethiopia will in this fair country stretch forth her hands to God. Peace will prevail. God will bless us, and we will walk hand in hand.

"Whereas Hon. WILLIAM G. BROWNLOW, United States Senator from this State, has declared himself opposed to that portion of the civil-rights bill which gives colored children the right to be educated in schools with the whites: Therefore,

"Resolved, That we deprecate a departure from the principles of humanity and justice of one in whom we have so often reposed so much confidence as a true friend of the colored race."

The convention also adopted a resolution to raise funds for the purpose of carrying the case of David Galloway to the Supreme Court of the United States. He is now in the State prison for marrying a white woman.

The convention adjourned sine die.

Mr. STOCKTON. I can only infer who is the Judas alluded to; but as the second resolution refers to a distinguished member of this body, the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BROWNLOW,] I do not deem it fair for me to have those resolutions, which were handed to me cut out of a paper, read at the desk, without also sending the defense that Senator BROWNLOW made. I ask the Secretary to read what I now send to the Chair. I am informed by the Senator's colleague that he is detained by sickness at home.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Senator BROWNLOW has written a long political address to the people of Tennessee, in response to certain resolutions passed by the Nashville convention of colored men, charging him with betraying the interests of that race. These are the pregnant paragraphs of the address:

I have done all these things for the colored race without owing my election to it or having the remotest idea of ever being a candidate for its votes or support. I have acted from a sense of duty and because of a sincere and unselfish desire to ameliorate its condition. I do not refer to my services to the colored people by way of apology for my opposition to mixed schools. My position on this question is the result of mature deliberation. It has the approval of my judgment and conscience, and sooner than apologize for it or recede from it I would see every political organization in the land "go the way of Ward's ducks," and every politician buried without hope of resurrection.

"THE WHITE MAN NO RIGHTS WHICH A NEGRO IS BOUND TO RESPECT."

So far from betraying the colored people or violating any pledges to them, as insolently and falsely charged by delegates in this Nashville convention, who seem to have reversed Taney's decision and proclaimed, in substance, that a white man has no rights which a negro is bound to respect, I have, since attaining power as governor and Senator, done far more for the colored race than I was ever committed or pledged to do, and more than they had a right to demand in view of the issues of the canvass upon which I went into office.

BASE INGRATITUDE OF THE NEGROES.

And now, because I adhere to principles of practical utility, instead of running wild after abstractions, I am denounced as recreant to duty and pledges. If the members of the late colored convention can afford to present to the world such evidences of base ingratitude to myself, who have done more for them than any other Tennesseean, I can well afford to be indifferent to their abuse and despise their threats. It will not injure me, nor does it afford me any solicitude, except in so far as the bad blood engendered between the races by such conduct and such a spirit as characterized the proceedings of that convention will tend to their injury, the destruction of the common-school system, and the detriment of society and good government.

REPUBLICANS CAN DO WITHOUT THE NEGROES.

True, it may be said the republican party in Tennessee cannot get along without the support of the colored voters. To this I reply, if it had not been for the republican party there would be no colored voters. Second, the republican party can get along without the colored voters as well as the colored voters can get along without the republican party. And third, the twenty-five thousand white republican voters of East Tennessee have resolved to get along without the colored voters sooner than submit to this sum of villainies and quintessence of abomination known as the "coeducation of the races."

SEPARATE SCHOOLS.

My only hope for the future prosperity of the colored people of Tennessee consists in the belief that the mass of them will repudiate the abominable programme so insolently put forth at Nashville. Let them remember that they now have, in separate schools, equal educational facilities with the whites. Let them remember that the taxes with which these schools are supported are contributed almost exclusively by the white people of the State—that the money does not come from the Federal Government at Washington. Let them remember that thousands of the property-holders of the State, of the political party to which they are in opposition, have aided in establishing our present school system, and without the support of this class, in co-operation with their white political associates, it could not have been established.

Let them also remember that it is not a question as to whether we will have mixed schools, but whether we shall have any system of public instruction at all. For it is not in the power of forty Congresses to establish this mixed-school system in Tennessee.

THE DANGER TO EDUCATION.

If the civil-rights bill should pass without the mixed-school feature being stricken out, the whole school fabric in Tennessee will at once fall to the ground, as it will deserve to do. Then the expenses of the education of their children, if they are educated at all, will be borne by themselves, and not by the white people as they now are.

W. G. BROWNLOW.

Mr. STOCKTON. I propose now, Mr. President, to examine this bill in some little detail to see what its propositions are and what its effect will be, and then to conclude the remarks I have to make to the Senate by an examination of its constitutionality, in which connection I shall consider the decision in the Slaughter-house case and a case decided since.

What is this bill? The fourteenth constitutional amendment declares that no State shall pass any law that interferes with the equal rights of any citizen, and it gives power to enforce by appropriate legislation this deprivation of authority to the States. The bill sets out by declaring that all men shall have equal rights in inns, public conveyances, cemeteries, and schools. The bill purports, in the first place, to pass a statute which, if it means nothing but what it appears to mean in reference to common carriers and innkeepers, is the law now. If it mean nothing else but what it is insisted upon by the advocates of this bill, or some of them, that it means, it is the law now. Every man knows that a common carrier by his contract with the public when he becomes a common carrier, when he gets his right to take toll and freight, is bound to carry all; that every railroad company and steamboat company is so bound by the law of common carriers as it prevailed in England and has been adopted or amended in this country. He knows that the best accommodation to be had for the same money is the right and title of every citizen of this country. He knows that when the constitutional amendment was adopted making persons of African descent citizens, it gave them every right that a white man had as a citizen of the United States. He has a right to precisely as good accommodations and equal accommodations. But the construction given by this bill, the construction given by the late Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. Sumner,) the construction given when you come to apply it to schools, makes that word "equal" mean "the same;" and there is where the difficulty lies.

If by the clause empowering "appropriate legislation" you can carry out that construction, you gain more power than the Constitution had itself and get more power from the words "appropriate legislation" given to Congress than the clause itself contains. By the same process of reasoning it is very easy then to make "equal" mean "the same," and that has already been avowed in this Chamber. On an occasion when this bill was brought up here before, the late Senator from Massachusetts insisted that the colored children were entitled to go to the same schools. That is insisted on by the convention whose resolutions have been read; and that was insisted on yesterday by the Senator from Massachusetts now on this floor, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] who said that the very object was to educate the people together, that this miserable prejudice that existed should be rooted out of the hearts of the young as they grow up; that was the very object of it. They were to have the same schools, not equal schools. When it was asserted on this floor that the schools in this District, for example, were equally good, the answer was, what a dreadful thing it is to the feelings of a colored parent who knows that his child cannot go into that building because white children go there! There must be the same schools for both, we are told; and so there must be the same grave-yard because it is my grave-yard and contains graves of my loved ones. It is the same school because it is my school and the school of my children. Let the colored man love his school as he loves his children; and the more he worships and mourns at the graves of his loved ones, the more I respect him; but he, unstirred up by bad men who do it for the very purpose of agitation, does not seek or desire the violation of a natural feeling deeply implanted in the bosom of every man, be his skin white or black.

I have said that if the interpretation of the bill were not in the very words of gentlemen who advocate it that which I have suggested, the simple fact of establishing equal rights would amount to nothing; for they have them now by law, and they have redress in the State courts for any violation of them. But, Mr. President, let us go further. This bill which gives equal rights guards and protects us somewhat. It is equal rights where the school or the cemetery is established or kept up in whole or in part by general taxation. The provision in regard to the inn or tavern or conveyance does not contain that clause. There you can go into a man's own domestic affairs. The innkeeper, by the common law of England and by the common law of most of the States of this land, altered by the statutes of the States though altered but very slightly, goes to the county court; he proves that he has so many beds, accommodations for so many wayfarers, and he gets his license from the county court, with a recommendation from his neighbors and friends, to keep a way-side inn, wherein the weary traveler may rest. He is called upon every year to renew that license, for no man is authorized to keep a bar-room exclusively so on the highway; but he may keep a house of entertainment for those who are weary, for those who need it. Unless he agrees to do that, he cannot have a license. Now, Mr. President, you propose to do what? Not to say that no State shall pass any law, as the amendment provides, but to pass a law yourself making the man who does not keep that hotel according to the orders of Congress, according to such arbitrary rules as you may lay down in Congress, a criminal, liable to fine and imprisonment. You make those who authorize him to keep the inn, those who give him the license, inciters of that crime; and you make the very courts of the State, the judges of the common pleas sitting on the bench in the counties of my State and licensing these inns and taverns under the laws of the State, under the common law of their fathers as they brought it to this country, criminals.

The colored people are already, as I have said, equal before the law. They vote for the school superintendent, and if they have the majority they elect a colored man. They vote in every respect as the white man does. They elect indirectly the judges of the common pleas who grant these licenses. They have their full right in the Government, their full right in the country, their full representation by the right of suffrage. They are equal before the law. What do you propose to do with them? To make them superior to the law, superior to the majority that make the rules and say a man may keep such and such a house of entertainment by congressional action.

Under the laws of the States as they now exist an innkeeper would have no right to drive out of his house when he had the accommodations, and he is obliged to have the accommodations provided by law, any man of any color. If Congress does not interfere with the manner in which the hotel is kept he might regulate its discipline. He might say that the servant in that house, be he white or black, should eat in the kitchen, that the guests of the house should eat in another room, that the ladies should have separate apartments; he might make such rules and distinctions as common decency and propriety make proper in a well-regulated hotel; and if he did not make those rules his license would be taken from him, for his house would become a disorderly one. In making those rules and regulations he would have a right to say that a man who had a contagious disease could not come into his house, for that is for the security of the public health. He might say that a man who contaminated the morals of the community, who desired to come into his house to gamble, could not come in, for that would hurt the public morals. So you admit that under the power granted by the State he stands there the regulator of his own hotel and only accountable to the law of the State and the municipal corporation which granted his license. And yet if a negro fancies that he is not treated properly, or if he goes into a hotel and is not put in such a place as would interfere with the regular discipline which all admit is necessary for that house, that innkeeper and all who incite him, which means anybody, are liable to be punished with fines and penalties, in which the Senator from Indiana glories.

One step further, Mr. President. These parties must be indicted; for it is made the duty of the marshal, it is made the duty of the district attorney, it is made the duty of the commissioner appointed by this act with power to arrest and imprison the body of any citizen, to hear these complaints and act immediately upon them on the testimony of any man who may pretend that his feelings have been wounded on account of race or color; and thus the citizen may be imprisoned in the State where he has committed no offense against its laws, in the body of the county of Essex, in the city of Newark, in the State of New Jersey, by an order from a United States commissioner, with power of arrest and imprisonment.

But a step further. When the creatures created by this act have done their work, that man at least has one bulwark left—a bulwark the establishment and protection of which have raised many and many a revolution among our ancestors who were freer than we are to-day—I mean the right to be tried by his peers, to be tried by a fair and impartial jury; the last bulwark left him from the attack of Federal authority under the pretense of equal rights; and even there, in violation of the most solemn guarantees of the Constitution, you tamper with that jury and put in the box a jury that you know to be prejudiced, and you do it intentionally. You use the machinery of the United States courts; you bring men, as you did in the State of North Carolina, under a reign of terror that they cannot resist; you bring them to be tried by a jury on a question of race and color which you make, and before a jury that you oblige to be composed of a part of this minority race, and whose battle you admit and tell them you are fighting. I ask any man learned in the law, any man who has ever practiced in our courts, particularly our Federal nisi prius courts at the present day, whether he thinks that any man under a charge under this act of violating equal rights would have a fair trial before a jury called under the act, half of which might be colored people, who went there for the very purpose of protecting under the impulse of the feelings, natural perhaps but not proper for an impartial juror, which they evince in the resolutions passed at Nashville?

Again, Mr. President, the machinery of the courts of the United States is called in for other purposes. It was only a short time ago that a Senator on this floor attempted to tell us what the offense was that was created by this act. He told us I think, for fifteen or twenty minutes, what it was not, but he never did tell us what it was; and no man has told us; and when the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. NORWOOD,] exercising his imagination, which he kept constantly in check, fancied what it might be applied to, the argument was really considered as reducing the thing to an absurdity. It made his remarks appear to be mere amusement, because he simply applied the words to what they could be extended.

Mr. President, it was the glory of the common law that it defined offenses actually. It was the glory of the common law that when crimes and misdemeanors were created even by statute, their definitions should be accurate, that appropriate words to control the meaning should be put in the indictment which gave the party accused the knowledge of the charge made against him, that the indictment should be specific and precise so that he might know precisely what the crime was, precisely what he was charged with doing, when he was charged with doing it, where he was charged with doing it, how he was charged with doing it. And that was more the protection of personal liberty for centuries than any other feature of the common law. The right to trial by jury was not second to the right that a man should know what he was charged with. Now, you have got offenses which are mala prohibita alone; there are offenses even by the admission of the friends of this bill which might be a violation of equal rights in the exaggerated sense of the term that would be no crime as malum in se. You make these crimes; you make large numbers of crimes; you give jurisdiction over an immense class of offenses to the Federal courts, and the Federal courts held during the war that where a man was indicted for knowingly harboring a deserter, the knowledge could be presumed by the jury. When a farmer in my own county in the midst of his harvest hired a man passing along the road, and he was found working for him on his place, because he had a button on his hat the jury were told they might presume that he harbored him knowingly. It has been held in the same courts that the indictment need not specify anything except the words of the statute; no words need be used to indicate the guilty knowledge, to indicate crime really, for without guilty knowledge or intention there can be no crime. No such words need be used according to the decisions of the United States courts, different from all our State courts. Then a man is to be brought on for trial; his crime is denying equal rights. You indict him, alleging that John Smith, within the jurisdiction of a district court of the United States, attempted to abridge the equal rights of Cuffee Jones—that is the proposition, that is the crime for which he is to be tried—not having the fear of God before his eyes, but instigated by the devil he did deny to Cuffee Jones his equal rights.

Have these gentlemen given us any definition of the equal rights of Cuffee Jones? Is there any instant in life, from the time a man arises in the morning until he goes to bed in the evening, that he may not unintentionally deny equal rights, particularly when equal rights are defined to be the same rights? Can any white man be tried for such an offense against a white man? If he can under the bill, as I think was insisted by my colleague, I say most distinctly that my objection to this bill is not on account of any race or color or previous condition of servitude, but its horrible deprivation of liberty, the horrible snares that you are setting for white men against other white men. A man who can look at the bill and read it, look at it in the face of the law and the decisions of our courts, look at it in the light of history, look at it in the light of all the blood that has been shed and the treasure that has been thrown away like water, to establish the liberty you are now trampling on and laughing about—any man who can look at it and feel that this is a proper bill, even if there were no such race as the colored race to whom it could apply, differs entirely from me.

Mr. President, one of the saddest things about the whole of this business, one of the saddest things that I trust and hope at last the people will begin to see, is the utter recklessness of this proposition. The gentlemen who advocate the bill do not seem to see its results or its effect. They seem perfectly willing to throw life, liberty, and everything else that we have or care for on a sea of uncertainty. The offense is no offense, it has no definition; it requires the construction of your courts which is against the ordinary liberal rules of the common law; and it requires the definition given here to frame any sort of imaginary crime, and when an indictment is framed it may cover nearly every harmless act of life.

Mr. President, I do not know that I ever interfered with the equal rights of any colored man. I certainly never have done so intentionally, and I certainly never intend to do so. I think they are a very kind and a very gentle race. I have quite as much personal regard for colored people, and quite as much desire that their condition shall be improved and that they shall go on improving and progressing, as any other gentleman on the other side of the Chamber. I think I am a little wiser in my course than they are, and I trust that I am guided by no prejudice.

This bill, if passed, will, among other things, break up the whole common-school system in this country; it will leave uneducated the colored people, a million of whose children, it is said, are now being ducated under the benign laws of the State governments and under the protection of those laws by the money of the white people who are bound to make their subscriptions. It will leave them no free schools; it will leave them without education and without the hope of it for years to come. For what? If you make this system go on compulsorily, then what do you do? You establish the system which has made revolution after revolution in England; you establish the system against which Ireland protested until finally the spirit of the age made England give it up—taxing one class of men to educate the other people's children, and taxing for an established church those who believe in another faith. That is to be done here. The poor German and Irishman, whom you have invited to these shores, is to be deprived of his liberties and privileges and of the blessings of those laws to which he was invited, and he is to see his children turned out of the school-houses because he does not wish them to associate with the colored people, whether from prejudice or otherwise, and then you continue to tax him to make him support the school-houses of colored persons. That may be done by State legislation where the colored are in the majority, but it follows that an attempt to do it arbitrarily against the will of the whites when they are in the majority would made it the duty of the Government to interfere in behalf of the white minority in South Carolina and Louisiana; and as I said before it is unwise and inexpedient, with no end on earth to be accomplished by it except to delude the poor colored man.

But, Mr. President, let me state the legal propositions on which I rely. The fourteenth amendment makes all persons born or naturalized in the United States citizens of the United States, and of the State wherein they reside, and declares that no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States.

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Now the bill before us professes to declare that all persons are entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of accommodations in inns, schools, cemeteries, &c.

It proposes under the pretense of appropriate legislation to enforce the fourteenth article to destroy its whole character and meaning. The fourteenth amendment operates on the States—forbids them from abridging, &c.; forbids them from denying equal protection of the law to citizens of the United States, which citizenship it created.

The fifteenth amendment took the control of suffrage from the States. But both the amendments from the very fact that they were amendments, and were necessary, admit the entire and exclusive control the States had over the subject—both subjects, except where the amendments restrict and forbid it.

And yet, under the pretense of enforcing these amendments by appropriate legislation, this bill proposes for the first time to interfere with the municipal and police powers of not only the States, but the counties, cities, towns, and school districts, and make all violations of the act misdemeanors and punishable in the courts of the United States by fine and imprisonment, acting directly on the individual.

It is a destruction of the rule that the majority governs. An arbitrary order from a central consolidated despotism creating an unknown crime which is not defined, which is a negative act, the definition of which depends upon the mere caprice of the petty tyrant set up by the act and clothed with powers of arresting the body and depriving citizens of their liberty.

Why is not the State Legislature asked to make such a law? Because South Carolina needs no such law to accomplish the object desired; because the majority are of the colored race.

Why are not New York and New Jersey asked? Because it is well known that the majority of the people, irrespective of race or color, would not change the whole form of government, and tyrannically deprive the individual, the school district, the town meeting, the city government, the county court, of managing their own affairs and administering their municipal laws as they have been wont to do.

Knowing that the State will not do it, knowing it is not the will of the people, on the ground that because the State is forbidden to pass any law depriving or denying, &c., equal rights, the United States undertakes to make it a crime against the General Government for individuals to control their own affairs, for corporations to be controlled by the majority of its members, for the State courts to see that all are equal before the law, which means properly the government of the majority. Because the States are forbidden to pass laws depriving a citizen of the United States of his rights, it follows, it is insisted, that Congress can make police regulations for every locality, and that an act of omission, which is no interference whatever with the fourteenth amendment; and no crime, but a duty by the law of the State, which permits the people to assemble in town meetings and vote by a majority the sum to be collected for public education, and elect the school superintendent, who has duties assigned him by law, makes it a crime for that superintendent to regulate the necessary discipline of the school, to determine what ages, sexes, and colors may best be taught in the same class.

He can be punished by fine and imprisonment, and the children, parents, and voters as "inciting" to the crime, and arrested and imprisoned by a creature of Congress, who in turn is hurriedly arrested and imprisoned if he should be found even on the side of liberty.

In the Slaughter-house case the question was whether the act by the State of Louisiana creating a monopoly of that business was a police regulation or not, all the judges agreeing that if it was it was exclusively within the control of the State Legislature. The opinion of the court was that it was a police regulation, and not a violation of the fourteenth amendment, (see 16 Wallace, page 36.) In the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Bradley, (page 120,) after enumerating these interferences with individual liberty which were forbidden by the Constitution to the States, and considering at the time the fourteenth amendment, he uses these words:

If it was really a police regulation it would undoubtedly be within the power of the Legislature.

That portion of the act which requires all slaughter-houses to be located below the city and to be subject to inspection is clearly a police regulation.

That portion which allows no one but the favored company to build, own, or have slaughter-houses is not a police regulation, and has not the faintest semblance of one.

But, Mr. Justice Miller, in delivering the opinion of the court, declares that it is too clear for argument that the clause in the fourteenth amendment on which the bill before us was drawn was not intended to protect a citizen of a State against the legislative power of his own State.

I will read a portion of the opinion, which will be found on page 74 of 16 Wallace:

The language is, "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." It is a little remarkable, if this clause was intended as a protection to the citizen of a State against the legislative power of his own State that the words "citizens of the State" should be left out, when it is so carefully used, and used in contradistinction to citizens of the United States in the very sentence which precedes it. It is too clear for argument that the change in phraseology was adopted understandingly and with a purpose.

Of the privileges and immunities of the citizen of the United States, and of the privileges and immunities of the citizen of the State, and what they respectively are, we will presently consider; but we wish to state here that it is only the former which are placed by this clause under the protection of the Federal Constitution, and that the latter, whatever they may be, are not intended to have any additional protection by this paragraph of the amendment.

If, then, there is a difference between the privileges and immunities belonging to a citizen of the United States as such, and those belonging to the citizen of the State as such, the last must rest for their security and protection where they have heretofore rested, for they are not embraced by this paragraph of the amendment.

The court further say:

It would be the vainest show of learning to attempt to prove by citations of authority that, up to the adoption of the recent amendments, no claim or pretense was set up that those rights depended on the Federal Government for their existence or protection, beyond the very few express limitations which the Federal Constitution imposed upon the States—such, for instance, as the prohibition against ex post facto laws, bills of attainder, and laws impairing the obligation of contracts. But with the exception of these and a few other exceptions, the entire domain of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the States, as above defined, lay within the constitutional and legislative power of the States, and without that of the Federal Government. Was it the purpose of the fourteenth amendment, by the simple declaration that no State should make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, to transfer the security and protection of all the civil rights which we have mentioned from the States to the Federal Government? And where it is declared that Congress shall have the power to enforce that article, was it intended to bring within the power of Congress the entire domain of civil rights heretofore belonging exclusively to the States?

All this and more must follow, if the proposition of the plaintiffs in error be sound. For not only are these rights subject to the control of Congress whenever in its discretion any of them are supposed to be abridged by State legislation; but that body may also pass laws in advance, limiting and restricting the exercise of legislative power by the States, in their most ordinary and usual functions, as in its judgment it may think proper on all such subjects. And still further, such a construction, followed by the reversal of the judgments of the supreme court of Louisiana in these cases, would constitute this court a perpetual censor upon all legislation of the States, on the civil rights of their own citizens, with authority to nullify such as it did not approve as consistent with those rights as they existed at the time of the adoption of this amendment. The argument we admit is not always the most conclusive which is drawn from the consequences urged against the adoption of a particular construction of an instrument. But when, as in the case before us, these consequences are so serious, so far-reaching and pervading, so great a departure from the structure and spirit of our institutions; when the effect is to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character; when, in fact it radically changes the whole theory of the relations of the State and Federal governments to each other, and of both these governments to the people, the argument has a force that is irresistible, in the absence of language which expresses such a purpose too clearly to admit of doubt.

The construction of the fourteenth amendment which makes this act constitutional, which makes it appropriate legislation, is said by the Supreme Court to be a construction not only unwarranted by the words, but a departure from the structure and spirit of our institutions, and its effect to fetter and degrade the State governments, by subjecting them to the control of Congress.

But in the case of F. Bartemeyer, sr., against the State of Iowa, decided at October term, 1873, Mr. Justice Field, one of the dissenting judges in the Slaughter-house cases, concurring with Mr. Justice Bradley, another of the dissenting judges, said what I will read:

No one has ever pretended, that I am aware of, that the fourteenth amendment interferes in any respect with the police power of the State. Certainly no one who desires to give to that amendment its legitimate operation has ever asserted for it any such effect. It was not adopted for any such purpose. The judges who dissented from the opinion of the majority of the court in the Slaughter-house cases never contended for any such position. But, on the contrary, they recognized the power of the State in its fullest extent, observing that it embraced all regulations affecting the health, good order, morals, peace, and safety of society, that all sorts of restrictions and burdens were imposed under it, and that when these were not in conflict with any constitutional prohibition or fundamental principles, they could not be successfully assailed in a judicial tribunal.

And yet after large citations from the opinion of the court when the history of the passage of the constitutional amendments is given, losing sight altogether of the broad distinction drawn by both the majority and minority of the court by all the judges in all the cases, the distinction between the rights of a citizen of the United States and the citizen of a State, my colleague illogically said:

The Supreme Court holds that it is one of the privileges of a United States citizen, not to be abridged, that the State shall not deny or shall give him the equal protection of the laws, and that discrimination against a class in denying that equal protection—in fact it was the very evil the amendment was intended to remedy.

And yet Justice Miller, in delivering the opinion of the court, defines the rights of United States citizenship, saying:

No claim is set up that these rights depended on the Federal Government for their existence or protection beyond a very few express limitations which the Federal Constitution imposed upon the States—such, for instance, as the prohibition of ex post facto laws.

And speaking of the fourteenth amendment, in order that he may negative the position assumed by my colleague most strangely, says:

Was it the purpose of the fourteenth amendment, by the simple deduction that no State should make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, to transfer the security and protection of all the civil rights which we have mentioned from the States to the Federal Government?

My colleague also fails to observe that the whole operation of the amendment, in words and by every rule of construction, is to prohibit State legislation from a certain kind of legislation, precisely as by the Constitution it is forbidden a State to pass an "ex post facto law." While this bill acts directly on the citizen and the individual by municipal and police regulations—a power never before claimed—and creates a crime against the United States by any act which comes within the definition.

Neither my colleague nor any one else has or can show any authority for this despotic assumption of power. The Supreme Court says it degrades the States and changes the whole structure of government.

I may be wrong, Mr. President, but if I am not more mistaken than I have ever been in reference to any question in the political future of this country, the people of the United States will not let you do this thing. You have at last put your hand on the holy of holies. You have at last dared to violate feelings and thoughts that are deeper down even than the love of liberty. The heathen has his vaults and subterranean caverns still standing where the ashes of his dead are buried; and alongside of this the stranger may walk down beneath the Seven-hilled City on the Palatine, buried beneath eternal Rome, for mile after mile through caves and labyrinths where the Vas Sanguinis marks all that was left by the beasts of the ancient martyrs of Christianity and the Church. There, followed by trembling women, are the graves of the dead, which were at the same time the abodes of the living and the temples of the living God, hid beneath the bowels of the earth which He had created. And now they cherish that dead; and heathen and Christian never have to this day been willing to do one act that would violate that inmost principle of the human heart.

You invade every social principle without regard to distinctions of race or color; you tear away all that is worth living for in this blessed land, and you will make us a by-word and a mockery to our posterity. I say, keep your hands off the graves of the dead. It may be no better grave than the grave of him who is buried in the potter's field, but it is my grave and the grave of my dead. There is no power in the Government of the United States or its Army or Navy that will ever touch it. You may build a temple to every dead person, colored or white, without distinction of race or color, and I will help subscribe for it; but you shall not touch the humblest grave of the poorest Catholic that lies in the vault which has been consecrated for him with his cross over his head if he wants to lie there, and you shall not take from him or me the right to protect it. You can so violate none of the blessed thoughts of the future that come crowding around us as we mourn over the dead. Human nature will not bear it. Human nature has borne from your party already all that human nature can or dare bear, but this it will not bear.

Mr. President, I have completed what I meant to say on this bill. I had no hope, as I said to you when I commenced, of changing any man's vote in this Senate. I had heard that a republican caucus had determined this, as many other matters, in secret, and that the bill was to be put through. I heard with delight from my colleague when he opened this discussion that this duty had been imposed upon him, and I heard with pleasure that he discharged that duty with ability and grace, as he always does; I heard him conclude as he began that this was a duty imposed upon him. Whether it was a duty or not was for him to judge, not for me. That it was not imposed upon him by the Legislature of New Jersey I am glad to know. I do not believe that any party in my State will surrender their liberties and all that is sacred on any such pretense as that this is necessary for the protection of the colored race. I do not believe that any party can live in this country with the eyes of the people now wide open, who march up to what they know to be wrong, march up deliberately, and, when their own members shrink back like our fellow-member from Tennessee and others, urge them forward over the brink of the precipice as the Jacobins urged the Girondists.

I do not believe that any party so reckless as this can come before the people of the United States and maintain its position. No matter how great are the leaders, no matter how proud their position, no matter what power they may get from the name of their great leader, the President, no matter what hold they may have had for years on the American people, no matter how they may have acted during the cruel vicissitudes of the war through which we have gone, no matter what they may do or say, the people of the United States will understand, as I think, that this thing is done in order to secure the ascendency, the balance of power, the control of the Government to your party, and you are dependent upon the colored voters to whom you deliver up the balance of power, and to whom you surrender all that I have tried to depict to the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. One minute. I feel it my duty, Mr. President, to correct an error that my colleague has fallen into. If there is any obligation on the republican party to vote for this bill, or for any part of it, other than that which commends itself to each individual Senator, I am not aware of it. Allusion has been made to caucus or party obligations. If there are any such obligations I do not know the fact. When I said in my opening remarks, to which my colleague has referred, that this duty was imposed upon me, I referred to its having been a duty imposed upon me by the Committee on the Judiciary when they directed me to report the bill. As to whether the Legislature of the State of New Jersey have imposed upon me the duty I have performed, I have only to say that the Legislature of the State of New Jersey imposed upon me the duty of adhering to the Constitution of the United States, and at that desk I swore I would; and unless some one shall rise and show me that in the Constitution of the United States there are two citizenships, one dominant and the other subordinate, one superior and the other inferior, I shall follow the course indicated by my opening remarks.

Mr. STOCKTON. I desire to say a word in reply to the remarks of my colleague. Judge Miller says, in the opinion which I have cited, that there are two citizenships, and the whole Supreme Court have so decided; and the point of that case was that the citizenship due to the State was the one that controlled a man's relation to his Legislature and which the fourteenth constitutional amendment did not touch. That was precisely the point of that opinion, as I read it.

Mr. MORTON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. STOCKTON. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I ask him if Judge Miller did not say in the same opinion that whatever rights and obligations were conferred or created by the fourteenth amendment belonged to citizenship of the United States as such, and were under the control and guardianship of Congress? He admitted that there was a citizenship of the State and also of the United States; but did he not expressly say that whatever rights were created or conferred by the fourteenth amendment belonged to every man as a citizen of the United States and were under the protection of Congress?

Mr. STOCKTON. I have no doubt, as the Senator asks me the question, that he is right in saying that Judge Miller uses the language, though I have not the book before me. He also says that not one single one of those rights can be controlled by the Congress of the United States that belong to a man as a citizen of the State. As a citizen of the United States, every right he has under the fourteenth amendment he may be protected in by the Federal courts; but the Supreme Court said they would not protect a man against the Legislature of his own State in reference to matters that were municipal and local, police regulations, and then held that the Slaughter-house case was one of these; and they pointed out all the civil rights specified in this bill by name and excluded them from the power of Congress.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I should not obtrude myself upon this debate at all if I had not long ago made a promise to do so. In December last two colored gentlemen called upon me preferring a special request that I would support the civil-rights bill; and when I replied that I always had supported the civil-rights bill, it was explained that they desired something more than a vote. They seemed to feel that while republicans had generally accorded to this measure the courtesy of their votes, they had not taken so much pains to defend and justify their votes as they ought to have done. Accordingly I promised that when the measure again made its appearance in the Senate, I would not only give it my vote, but I would take occasion to state the grounds upon which I rested that vote. And yet, sir, I find it is not easy to frame an argument in defense of this bill. No truth is so hard to demonstrate by reasoning as that which is self-evident; and to me the simple justice of the provisions of this bill is self-evident.

What are they? A command is proposed that no citizen of the United States shall be excluded from the accommodations of public inns, of public highways, of public schools, nor shall their remains be excluded from resting in public burial-grounds, notwithstanding they are black. That is all. A national decree is proposed that a citizen shall have a right to travel along the public thoroughfares if he pays his fare, and shall have a right to send his children to the public schools if he meets the charges, although he is not white. That is all. It lays not an ounce weight upon any man of any color, but it lifts burdens from some. That is the bill. One would hardly suppose that in the Senate of the United States a measure which laid no burden upon any one, which proposed to help millions, could meet with a very strenuous opposition. One would hardly believe that a panic could seize upon the Senate of the United States at a proposition which left every man just as free and just as rich as it found him. That is this measure, and yet the panic seems to be here. It does meet with a strenuous opposition. That opposition is of two classes.

Senators tell us that Congress is not competent to issue the command, and they tell us that Congress ought not to issue it. Well, sir, if Congress cannot pass this law, of course we ought not to pass it. It is vain to put into the forms of law that which the Constitution says we shall not do. Such an enactment, however formal, will be void of effect.

But, sir, I am of the opinion that the authority of Congress to issue these commands, to enact this bill into a law, is as clear, as indisputable as its authority to lay taxes or do any other one thing referred to in the Constitution. That is my opinion. If I were not very confident of it I would not make the declaration in the teeth of what we have heard in this Chamber within a few days. But in spite of all I have heard here or elsewhere on that point, I lack not a particle of faith of the competency of Congress to pass this bill.

Why, Mr. President, I know perfectly well that it is the office of the Constitution of the United States to divide the powers of government between the Government of the United States and the governments of States. I know that as well as any one. I know as well as any one can tell me that the Government of the United States can rightfully do only those things which the Constitution permits it to do. I am a strict constructionist, and when our right to do any particular thing is challenged I admit the propriety of our being referred to the organic law for the warrant upon which to do it.

I admit, furthermore, that when your Constitution was framed originally, there was committed to the Government of the United States no power to do the things we propose to do in this bill. I admit when that Constitution was framed its makers committed the status and condition of individual citizens to the control of the States within which they lived. What they pleased to do with the individual that they did. There was a malign power reserved to the government of every State to deprive any one or any number of its citizens of every the commonest rights of the commonest man, and they did it. The time was when every State did it. The time is, thank God, when no State can do it. That malign power no longer exists in any government in this land acknowledging the supremacy of the Constitution of the United States.

The Constitution has been changed, you may have heard, sir. Some prerogatives have been withdrawn from the States; some new faculties or powers have been given to the Government of the United States. Three whole chapters have been added to the organic law. One of them, I say in the face of the country as well as in the face of the Senate, was made on purpose to transfer the control of citizens to the Government of the United States; and if Congress does not possess to-day the power to snatch from the oppression of unequal laws every colored citizen of the United States, it is not because the people did not mean to clothe us with that power; but it is unmistakably because the draughtsman who framed the fourteenth amendment did not know enough to construct a clause which would give us that power.

What were the circumstances under which the amendment was presented to the people of the United States and adopted by them? We had emerged from a most expensive and most exhaustive civil war, in which the people and the authorities of several of the States undertook to resist and defy the authority of all the States. The President had abrogated every vestige, every symbol of a State government which he found in those rebellious States, and had gone on to construct new governments not in accordance with any local law or with any national law; governments to suit his own fancy. They were not altogether satisfactory to the people of the United States, or at least to the representatives of the people of the United States in Congress assembled. Congress, you may remember, hesitated whether to recognize the authority of those governments or not. They were started in motion, and we sat here looking on to see how they acted; and after seeing them in motion something like a year and a half, we concluded that we did not like the style, that we would not recognize them, and we passed an act saying as much.

In the mean time we had framed and submitted the fourteenth amendment to the people of the United States. The particular thing we discovered in those governments which we did not approve we referred to in the preamble of the act we passed. What was it? "Whereas no legal State governments or adequate protection for life or property now exist" in certain States which we named. Those were the facts: first, that they were not legal; secondly, that they did not afford protection to life or property. And a government which does not meet either of those requirements you will admit yourself, sir, is not exactly the style of government to tolerate. Therefore these governments were directed by the statute to step aside, as their predecessors had been made to do, not forever; but when and how long? Until the people of the several States had done several things—framed new constitutions upon new principles, that is upon different principles from those recognized in their existing constitutions. But the great thing was when they should have severally acquiesced in the fourteenth amendment, and the fourteenth amendment should have been incorporated into the organic law of the land. When these things were done then they might return to the national fireside, and their representatives would be received in the Halls of Congress. Why provide until the fourteenth amendment was incorporated in the Constitution they should not be received in Congress? Simply because if thereafter the States saw fit to modify their laws or change their constitutions, the condition of the freedmen, at least, would be secured by the authority of the national Government, and they could appeal to its power, its judgment, its discretion, for their security.

Now, Mr. President, it may be that after all we did not put into the Constitution language adequate to secure to Congress the control the people evidently intended Congress should have. It was not the fault of the people, as I said; it was the fault of Congress if that was not done. Was Congress unequal to that task? That is the question which this bill presents. That is the assertion which is made here. That question has got to be tried and to be settled here or elsewhere finally. I hope for the peace of the country it will not be settled adversely to the existence of this authority, because—hear me—I tell you that your country will not know peace until the Government is authorized to do all that this bill proposes to do, and until it does it. Do not hope for anything of the kind. It cannot come. Real, honest peace never reigned an hour anywhere where less than the provisions of this bill prevailed. It will not be settled adversely if plain common sense triumphs.

Sir, this is not the first attempt of the Congress of the United States to control the civil rights of colored men. Before the fourteenth amendment was incorporated into your Constitution Congress undertook that work. On the 9th of December, 1866, before the fourteenth amendment had been agreed to, when the Constitution stood as it stood before the war with the exception of that great clause which said that slavery should no longer exist and that Congress was clothed with all the legislative power required to see that slavery did not exist, Congress passed an act entitled "An act to protect all citizens of the United States in their civil rights, and to furnish the means for their vindication." The first section of that act declares:

That all persons born in the United States and not subject to any foreign power, excluding Indians not taxed, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States; and such citizens of every race and color, without regard to any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall have the same right in every State and Territory in the United States– to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, and penalties, and to none other, any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding.

To do what?

All that was said in 1866. The fourteenth amendment was not born then. Was that act constitutional? The politicans who challenge the authority to pass the pending bill would say no; and the politicians of that school did say no. The President of the United States challenged the authority of Congress to enact that law, and returned the bill because it was unconstitutional. Two-thirds of the members of the Senate of the United States and of the House of Representatives stood up before the American people and before the Almighty and said upon their oaths it was constitutional. That did not prove it; but it ought to be conclusive proof that they believed it.

But that is not the only evidence we have that the act of 1866 was constitutional. Sir, the constitutionality of that act is recognized in the most unequivocal terms by the Supreme Court of the United States. In the circuit court of the United States in Kentucky, two white citizens were indicted for the murder of a colored man. The jurisdiction of the court was objected to. There was an attempt to defend it upon the ground that it was a case "affecting" colored citizens, and that by the laws of Kentucky colored men were not allowed to testify in cases affecting only white citizens. That case came to the Supreme Court of the United States. A majority of the court held that the circuit court had no jurisdiction, that the only parties "affected" by the case were the United States which prosecuted and the defendants who responded; that as they were not colored citizens on either side the Federal Court had not jurisdiction. Two eminent judges dissented from that view and thought the court had jurisdiction; but the court denied jurisdiction simply because the act did not confer jurisdiction, not because the act was unconstitutional. That the act was constitutional they affirmed in this unequivocal language:

Nor can it be said—

Said Justice Strong, who delivered the opinion of the majority—that such a construction allows little or no effect to the enactment.

The court was commenting upon the very act which I have been reading from.

On the contrary, it concedes to it a far-reaching purpose. That purpose was to guard all the declared rights of colored persons, in all civil actions to which they may be parties in interest, by giving to the district and circuit courts of the United States jurisdiction of such actions whenever in the State courts any right enjoyed by white citizens is denied them. And in criminal prosecutions against them it extends a like protection. We cannot be expected to be ignorant of the condition of things which existed when the statute was enacted, or of the evils which it was intended to remedy. It is well known that in many of the States laws existed which subjected colored men convicted of criminal offenses to punishments different from and often severer than those which were inflicted upon white persons convicted of similar offenses. The modes of trial were also different, and the right of trial by jury was sometimes denied them. It is also well known that in many quarters prejudices existed against the colored race, which naturally affected the administration of justice in the State courts, and operated harshly when one of that race was a party accused. These were evils doubtless which the act of Congress had in view, and which it intended to remove. And so far as it reaches, it extends to both races the same rights and the same means of vindicating them. (Blyew et al. vs. United States, 13 Wallace, 593.)

That was an act to establish civil rights. This is a bill for the same purpose. The power arrogated to Congress in this bill is precisely the power asserted by Congress in that. The inhibitions which this bill would put upon the States are precisely the same as the inhibitions which that act put upon the States. I can pardon the man who, looking into the Constitution as it read in 1866, could not find in its text the authority to enact that law; but I cannot pardon the man, whether he be lawyer or layman, citizen or magistrate, who standing before the Constitution as it read in 1866 shall say that that act is constitutional, and yet standing before the Constitution as it reads to-day will undertake to say that this bill transcends the competency of Congress.

And yet we are told that that very point has been already decided. We are told that the Supreme Court of the United States have declared in advance that we have not authority to pass this bill. That is a mistake, in my judgment. The Supreme Court of the United States never have told me any such thing. I stand here to deny that they have ever said any such thing. I have seen something of the opinion of that court which has been quoted here so often, an opinion which was delivered in the so-called Slaughter-house cases. That opinion does not deny the authority of Congress to pass this bill. I am going to speak frankly and candidly to the Senate. The court in that case did deny things which I wish it had not done. I am going to say with great diffidence and great deference one thing more: I am going to say that in that case the court did undertake to assert a principle of constitutional law which I do not believe will ever be accepted by the profession or the people of the United States. The particular controversy presented to the court in the Slaughter-house cases, so far as it affected those parties, is settled of course. The only point which the court asserted was that a statute passed by the State of Louisiana was not in contravention of the fourteenth amendment. That act made no discrimination between a white man and a black man. It made, I think, broad discrimination between the rights of white men—a discrimination which upon my soul I believe the fourteenth amendment condemns—but not a syllable of discrimination between the two colors. The court undertook to say that it was but an exercise of the ordinary police powers which belonged to every State before the fourteenth amendment was adopted and were not taken from the States by the fourteenth amendment, and then the court went on, or the judge who delivered the opinion of the court going on to defend that conclusion enters upon an argument to prove that such an act did not contravene that one clause of the fourteenth amendment which declares that no State shall impair the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States. In support of that proposition, Mr. Justice Miller gives expression to these conclusions: First, that there are certain privileges and immunities which adhere to citizens of the United States especially because they are such, while all other privileges and immunities belong to citizens because they are citizens of States, and that this clause of the fourteenth amendment was intended to secure the former privileges and immunities, and not the latter.

Mr. President, I am glad to feel authorized to say that that is not the conclusion of the court. I understand that to be a part of the argument simply by which the justice who delivered the opinion of the majority undertook to defend the judgment of the court. But, sir, if it were the judgment of the court and could be found to-day inscribed on its records, I could not forbear to say, what the American people and I believe the civilized world have already said of another and a prior decision of that same court, that it is not law and cannot be law.

Sir, I have told you the circumstances under which the people put that fourteenth amendment into the Constitution; and yet are we to be told by any authority that that one clause does no more than to secure the protection of the national authority for such privileges and immunities as citizens enjoy because they are citizens of the United States? Is there a lawyer or a layman here, a learned man or an ignorant man, who does not know that it was the idlest piece of verbiage that could possibly be constructed if that was the sole object of it? Does not every man here know that if there was one human being who had one single right secured to him because he was a citizen of the United States, that no State could impair that right, even if that language had not been put into the fourteenth amendment? Show me the clause of the Constitution which gives to you, or me, or any one man one right, I care not what, and I will show you the very words which of their own force place that right beyond the possibility of being impaired by any State until the State can whip the United States. That time has not come yet.

But, Mr. President, what are those rights, what are those privileges and immunities which belong to us as citizens of the United States? Have you ever discovered them? You have read the Constitution a great many years. The Supreme Court—I do not mean the Supreme Court; I mean Mr. Justice Miller—undertakes to enumerate some of them and to adduce the evidence in support of them, and I am going to call attention to this enumeration. The first one he finds in a former judgment of the Supreme Court in the case of Crandall vs. Nevada. Nevada undertook to lay a poll-tax upon individuals leaving the State. The constitutionality of that law was disputed, and the controversy was transferred to the Supreme Court, Mr. Justice Miller, I believe, delivering the opinion of the court. The whole court said the law was unconstitutional; and Mr. Justice Miller defends that judgment by saying that Crandall was a citizen of the United States, and that every citizen of the United States has the right to visit the sea-ports of the country and the capital of the country; that this right is supported by the implied guarantees of the Constitution; that this tax was an incumbrance upon that sacred right, and so the law was unconstitutional. I entirely agree with the court that the law was unconstitutional; but not for that reason. The implied guarantees of the Constitution? Why, what will my friends on the other side of the Chamber, who are like me strict constructionists, say about those implied guarantees of the Constitution? If there is anywhere a right guaranteed to me in the Constitution to visit Washington or New York, cannot you find an implied guarantee that I may go to Pike's Peak or Manassas Gap also? There is no knowing what these implied guarantees lurking around here in the Constitution may or may not do for us.

Why, Mr. President, we are all citizens of the United States. Justice Miller himself said so; Chief Justice Taney said that; and if this right was guaranteed to Crandall to come to Washington, it is guaranteed to all of us. If this right dominates the obligation of citizens to pay taxes, if the power of taxation on the part of a State is subjected to this implied right of ours to travel to and fro, why is not the ne exeat subordinate to it, the capias subordinate to it? That is one of the rights which Justice Miller enumerates as belonging to citizens because they are citizens of the United States. Another privilege of the citizen of the United States is—

> To demand the care and protection of the Federal Government over his life, liberty, and property when on the high seas or within the jurisdiction of a foreign government.

Where is that right guaranteed in the Constitution? I do not doubt that every citizen has the right to demand the protection of the Government. I do not doubt that everybody has it, whether he be a citizen or an alien, and I have sometimes thought that he stood about an equal chance of getting it whether he was a citizen or an alien. I know this, sir, and so do you, that Martin Koszta was not a citizen, and he demanded the protection of the Government, and he got it; and I know this also, and so does the Senate, that in the last years of the last century numbers of American citizens were despoiled of vast quantities of their property on the high seas; they asked for the protection of the Government, and they did not get it, and these citizens have been helpless ever since.

> The right to peaceably assemble and petition for redress of grievances, the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, are rights of the citizen guaranteed by the Federal Constitution.

Rights guaranteed by the Constitution to the citizen exclusively? To the citizen of the United States? Has the citizen of the United States a larger estate in the writ of habeas corpus than the subject of any other country? In time of peace you cannot deny the writ to any one. In time of war you may deny it to every one, citizen or alien.

> The right to use the navigable waters of the United States, however they may penetrate the territory of the several States.

There is another right enumerated as belonging to citizens under the guarantees of the Constitution of the United States. Mr. President, I never did find in the text of the Constitution any broader right for a citizen of the United States to use the navigable waters of this country than for a subject of Great Britain, or a subject of Norway. I believe, notwithstanding what is said in that opinion, it would be a difficult thing to make a long catalogue of privileges and immunities which belong to citizens of the United States, distinctively as such; and still this is all aside from the main question. The court was simply arguing that the Louisiana slaughter-house act did not transcend that one clause of the fourteenth amendment which says that a State shall not impair the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States. That is not the whole of the fourteenth amendment, and the court took notice of that fact. There is another clause in that very amendment, a clause which tells the State not only that you shall not impair the privileges and immunities of citizens, but that you shall not deny to any citizen the equal protection of the laws. Upon that clause the same judge speaks; and of that clause he says:

> In the light of the history of these amendments, and the pervading purpose of them, which we have already discussed, it is not difficult to give a meaning to this clause. The existence of laws in the States where the newly emancipted negroes resided, which discriminated with gross injustice and hardship against them as a class, was the evil to be remedied by this clause, and by it such laws are forbidden.

Judge Miller, then, is of the opinion that under the last clause no State can oppress a colored citizen by virtue of its laws. The very object of the bill now before us is therefore sanctioned by the opinion of that one judge at least, for though he does not think it included within the previous clause, it is included in the last clause of the amendment.

But this is not the only interpretation we have of the fourteenth amendment. We had one the other day from the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] a construction which surprised me very much. I regret not to have been able to see the words of the honorable Senator in print. I know how liable I am to have misunderstood him. I regret that he is not in his seat to correct me if I should do him injustice. I understood him, however, to say of this fourteenth amendment, "Why, yes, it does say that a State shall not deny to every citizen the equal protection of the laws; but it is a command that goes to the State; your bill does not touch the State; your bill touches the innkeeper, touches the railroad conductor, touches the citizen, touches the individual. Where do you find in the fourteenth amendment authority to issue commands to individuals? If you find any law of the State which denies equal protection, then issue your command to the State which proclaims that law, not at the individual." This is what I understood to be his argument. We all know the learning which distinguishes that Senator. So I must speak of this position of his with deference; but I understand it to be opposed to the whole theory of the Constitution and the whole practice of the Government from the time the Constitution was adopted to this time.

Sir, the very fundamental defect of the old Articles of Confederation was this, that the General Government could only issue commands to the State, none at all to the citizen. It could issue commands enough, but they were commands which must be transmitted to the citizen through the government of the State, and if the government of the State would not transmit them the citizen did not obey them. Therefore the Constitution was made to supersede the Articles of Confederation, and the great distinguishing feature of the Constitution over the Articles of Confederation is in this, that all the commands of your law, almost without exception, are now issued to the citizen. You tell him to do his duty, and if he does not do his duty you visit your penalties upon his head, and you do it in spite of the State.

There is in your Constitution an article which authorizes Congress to make laws for the punishment of offenses against the law of nations. I do not give its language, and I will not stop to pick it out. You passed an act before this century commenced, if I remember the date of it, to punish by Federal authority and in Federal tribunals the man who should assault a foreign minister, and you have done it. In 1824 a Spaniard in Philadelphia assaulted the Spanish minister for an insult which he claimed he had suffered from him in Spain before either of them arrived in this country, and he was prosecuted for that act in the courts of the United States. The case was finally settled by the judgment of the Supreme Court. Your statute was not leveled at the State of Pennsylvania; the State of Pennsylvania was not directed to impose the penalty of the law upon that offender.

Nay, more; the Senator from Ohio inquires, "How do you know but that every one of the States is discharging her duty specified in this bill; how do you know but that all the States have laws commanding every one of their citizens to do everything that is there commanded; how do you know but that they bristle with penalties against those who shall offend against the requirements of this statute? Do you propose to impose a double penalty?" No, sir; only one; but we propose to impose one, if I understand the purpose of this bill. What would the Senator from Ohio have said if he had been a citizen of Pennsylvania when that man Ortega was indicted for an assault? Did not the laws of Pennsylvania forbid assaults? Did not the law of Pennsylvania impose fines for assaults? Unquestionably. Would the Senator from Ohio being a Pennsylvanian have said then to the United States, "Take your hand off from Ortega; he is under the discipline of the laws of Pennsylvania; we know what an assault is, and we punish it; we allow no second punishment?" He might have said it, but the United States would not probably have heard him if he had, or have obeyed him if it heard.

Sir, there is another provision in the Constitution—indeed there are several; I am not going to read them all, but there is one I want to read. You have heard of it I think before:

> No person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due.

That is all there is of it. Escaping he shall not be discharged from service or labor if there is any law to that effect; but he shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service is due. That is all. You have legislated, you know, under that provision of the Constitution. You passed an act in 1850. It was not directed to any State; it was directed to all the citizens of all the States. It did not merely tell them in the language of the Constitution let the master take his escaped servant back; give him up; it did not tell them that; but the law told all the citizens of all the States to "catch him, take him back," and they did it. That clause of the Constitution was understood at the time as charging upon the General Government the duty, the obligation of seeing that these escaped servants were not only given up but taken back. Sir, I hold in my hand a book written to relate the efforts which the United States made to take back one of these escaped servants. I wish your vision was clear enough all of you to see that one picture, [exhibiting the frontispiece of a book.] That represents one scene in the city of Boston, on State street. Boston is swept out of State street; the United States is parading there. There is no rebellion: there is no insurrection. No governor has called on the President; no Legislature has; but the United States is parading there on State street, doing what? Escorting Anthony Burns down to a national vessel to be transferred from Boston to Virginia. For what crime? He had been convicted of none. Under the sentence of what court? None whatever. A commissioner of a United States court who had no more judicial authority, in my judgment, than you have, sir, to-day, had said that he must go from Boston to Virginia; and the United States, represented not merely by its civil agents and officers, but represented by its military arm, was there. The United States marines were escorting this man down State street to be transferred to Virginia.

Mr. President, what would the Senator from Ohio, with the views he has of legislative authority to-day, have said if he were in Massachusetts then to the representatives of the General Government? "Where is your authority to take Anthony Burns out from under the shadow of Faneuil Hall? What are you doing it for?" "Why, he is a slave and escaped from service." "How do you know he is?" "Mr. Loring has so decided." "Who is Mr. Loring?" "He is a commissioner of the United States court." "But under what law?" "Under the act of Congress of 1850." "Where is the clause in the Constitution which authorizes the act of 1850?" "This clause which says that if a servant does run away he shall be delivered up." I am very sure the Senator from Ohio could make a very strong if not a pretty conclusive argument against the validity of such a statute under such a clause of the Constitution.

Mr. President, I cannot help thinking the Senator from Ohio is utterly mistaken in his views of the true construction of the fourteenth amendment. I will tell you what I think of it. I think that clause of the Constitution says to the world, especially to the people of the United States, that every one of both the classes mentioned are citizens both of the United States and of the State in which they reside, and that no State shall impair their privileges or deny them the equal protection of the laws, and it charges the Congress of the United States to see that that condition is realized by every one of these citizens. It means all that or it means nothing. It is of no use for us to stand here and say, this is a privilege of a citizen, and that is not; this is a right, and that is not. That will do in arguing the question of expediency, but in arguing the question of power it has nothing to do with it. The whole truth is this, and nothing but this as I conceive it: Before these amendments were added to the Constitution there was supreme jurisdiction in the government of the States to say what were and what were not the privileges of a citizen. Since these three amendments have been added to the Constitution that supreme jurisdiction is in the Government of the United States or it is still in the government of the States. If it be still in the government of the States your act of 1866 is a usurpation and cannot be defended. If it is in the Government of the United States, in which department is it? Is it in the legislative, the judicial, or in the executive? It is not in the executive. Is it in the judicial? If the Legislature be silent, can you find writs and crimes and definitions which the courts of their own motion will execute and enforce? No one will assert that. If it be in the General Government anywhere it is in the legislative tribunal, and we are charged with the duty of providing for the execution of the amendments.

You may say if you please that it is inexpedient to clothe this man with that right or the other right, to vest in him this privilege or that privilege; but when the legislative tribunal has spoken its discretion guides the judgment of every other tribunal and the judgment of the whole people of the United States. The tribunal of last resort has spoken, and from its decision there is no appeal upon this question but to the people.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] asked us how we knew that the States did not for themselves decree everything that you propose to decree in this bill? I have said I do not think we are called upon to wait until we ascertain that. The United States did not wait to ascertain whether Pennsylvania punished assaults or not before it passed the act under which Ortega was prosecuted; the United States did not wait to find whether there was any statute in Massachusetts which refused to deliver up a fugitive slave before it passed the act of 1850, under which Anthony Burns was taken out of Boston; but, sir, if we must wait until we find a State which does not decree what this bill does, I am sorry to say we have waited long enough. I will introduce you to the State. You will find it in the State of Georgia, one of whose Senators on this floor, [Mr. NORWOOD,] the other day, undertook to laugh this bill out of the Senate. I was sorry to witness the attempt. I did wish that he had been more mindful of the very honorable testimony given upon this very subject by another distinguished statesman of his own State. I wish I had the language of Mr. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS before me to reproduce to the Senate, language in which he bears the most unequivocal testimony to the duty of Government to do all for every citizen that this bill attempts to do. And yet the Senator seemed to think it utterly preposterous that any government could owe any duty to these citizens whom he facetiously referred to as "colored statesmen." Sir, that other Georgia statesman tells you that the strife between power and right has continued from the beginning of society, and he told you the truth. He did not add what I will add, that it will continue until society shall decree universal right to universal manhood.

Mr. President, distinguished wits have appeared in the course of this struggle before the Senator from Georgia made his appearance in this Chamber. The chiefest of them all have not been able to win a victory for power over right, and I do not think he can feel entirely sure of a victory in a contest where there have been so many failures. I wish he could have dispensed with ridicule, although the whole Senate will bear witness that he is exceedingly well equipped with such weapons.

Sir, to Georgia you may look for the provisions which, according to the doctrine of the Senator from Ohio, call upon you to put in motion the latent powers with which you are clothed under the fourteenth amendment. The State of Georgia is philosophic. White men govern in Georgia. There is no blundering among statesmen there. They go to the foundation of things there. Georgia is discriminating, acutely so. Georgia—I read from the code of 1873—makes rather minute divisions of persons; first, into natural and artificial. Again—

Natural persons are distinguished—

Says the code—

According to their rights and status into: first, citizens; second, residents not citizens; third, aliens; fourth, persons of color.

Pretty accurate that!

Says Georgia:

Among the rights of citizens are the enjoyment of personal security,—

Very necessary—

of personal liberty—

A convenient thing to have—private property and the disposition thereof, the elective franchise, the right to hold office, (unless disqualified by the Constitution and laws,) to appeal to the courts, to testify as a witness, to perform any civil function, and to keep and bear arms.

It is a good thing to be a citizen in Georgia, provided Georgia recognizes you as a citizen. It is of no account to be a citizen of Georgia if you are a colored person. Georgia takes an interest in the welfare of her youth. Georgia evidently feels that either it is a right of the citizen or a necessity of the State for the people to be educated, and Georgia has made some provisions for the education of the people. Georgia provides for a State school commissioner, and assigns to him a great many duties; among others this:

To apportion equitably the State school revenue to the different counties of the State upon the basis of the aggregate of youths between six and eighteen years of age, and all confederate soldiers under thirty years of age.

Georgia says:

It shall also be the duty of said board of education to make arrangements for the instruction of the children of the white and colored races in separate schools. They shall, as far as practicable, provide the same facilities for both races, in respect to attainments and abilities of teachers and length of term time; but the children of the white and colored races shall not be taught together in any public school of this State; and in respect to the building of school-houses mentioned in this section, the said board of education may provide for the same either by labor on the part of the citizens of the sub-district to be served or by a tax on their property as hereinafter provided.

Georgia says that the sub-districts may establish one or more schools. Of course they must establish more than one, or but one color can be educated, or they must be educated together. If the sub-district should see fit to tax property to construct a school-house for one color and labor to construct a school-house for the other color, the school-houses would be likely to illustrate different styles of architecture. There might be equality in the scholars; I doubt whether there would be absolute equality in the school-houses. The State simply says that so far as practicable you shall afford the same facilities in the capacity of the teachers and length of the term time. But not only that, the State says:

Nothing in this chapter shall be so construed as to prevent any city with a population greater than two thousand inhabitants, or any county under authority from the General Assembly of this State, from organizing a public-school system, independent of this system, or to prevent the said independent organization from drawing its pro rata share of all educational funds raised by the State.

Having made the provision to which I have called your attention as a part of the system of the State, it says that any city of two thousand inhabitants or any county in the State may abrogate that system entirely and establish one of their own and have their pro rata share of the fund, and that fund of course the city or county may dedicate to the education of either race it may select to the exclusion of the other.

But, Mr. President, I have dwelt too long, I am sure, on the law of this case. Senators say the bill is inexpedient, no matter how clearly it may be authorized. Why is it inexpedient? They say it is small business for this great Government to be running hotels and railways and theaters.

Mr. NORWOOD. And circuses.

Mr. HOWE. And circuses. I thank my honorable friend. I should think so myself. If the Government had never been in any meaner business than that I should give some weight to that argument. [Laughter.] When the Government of the United States goes into Pennsylvania to prosecute a man for an assault upon another; when the Government musters in the city of Boston to catch one poor struggling fugitive and bear him back to slavery with all the Stars and Stripes flashing away above him and not protecting him—when the Government has proved itself to be equal to that, if it shall hereafter disclose any fitness for running a hotel or conducting a theater, I am not sure but it had better engage in it at once.

But, sir, this is aside from the argument. I know it is a small business. I know there ought not to be any occasion for it. We have to rally the United States to do those things which every citizen of the United States ought to see is done if the law was as dumb as the pyramids; but citizens will not do it, and so the United States must speak. As long as there is anywhere the door of a school-house which can be slammed in the face of the child of any poor citizen, as long as there is a highway on which any one of your citizens cannot travel when he is willing to pay the charges, as long as there is a citizen who cannot find entertainment in a hotel whose charges he will meet, as long as such men as Frederick Douglass can be excluded from the table of a steamboat bearing your flag, I think the United States had better make no question upon the point of dignity. The fittest thing for us to do is to correct all such abuses. What does the Declaration of Independence say? The Declaration of Independence says something upon this very point:

We hold these truths to be self-evident—

There it is in the Declaration—that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That, to secure these rights, governments are instituted.

That is what the Declaration says. It is the very end and purpose of government to secure these rights.

Then it is objected that these colored citizens are not the equals of the whites. No; of course they are not. You would get off of them quick enough without the admonition of a public statute if they were your equals. The law of self-preservation would be a sufficient instruction upon that point. I know they are not the equals of the whites. You could not well expect them to be, I think, under all the circumstances. What code is it which instructs us that we can jump on to a fellow-man simply because he is weak? I have not read that code. I would not subscribe to it if it were put in my hands. That is not the charter you mean to plead here. Let me have no dispute upon that point. I concede the want of equality, and this inequality has existed too long. It is not our charter for making them feebler; it is the injunction which the Almighty issues to us, if you have only read it aright, to help them out of this feebleness. That is the way I understand it.

But Senators say, "Let us be careful; do not go too far; the public schools are creatures of the States; do not you dare to say that the colors in those schools shall be mixed; say that and the schools fall; there shall be none." I hear the threat, and I admit I am afraid. I do not know but they will do it. Every step in this whole terrible march has been taken under some threat. This is one that comes very near me. I do not know but the schools will fall if we do not stay our course; but when peril threatens of any kind I can meet it but in one way. Let justice be done though the common schools and the very heavens fall.

Mr. President, we are not providing in this bill for mixing colors at all. If you are resolved that the two colors shall not mingle in your school-houses, as they will in your streets and everywhere else, as they do here in this great council-chamber—ay, and will forever and ever—you cannot go back on what is done; if you are resolved that they shall not mingle in your school-houses, they need not mingle, in spite of anything in this bill. I do not agree with my honorable friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] who said yesterday that it was necessary to mingle them, if I understood him, in the school-houses, in order that they might there unlearn this prejudice which separates one color from the other. I do not believe in that doctrine at all. I do not believe that it belongs to education to unteach this prejudice. I think that my honorable friend from Massachusetts fell into the same mistake that the author of the pamphlet which I hold in my hand has fallen into. He demands to know, with some impatience:

Will politicians never learn that social laws are laws of nature, and hence invariable and inflexible, as well as physical laws?

No, Mr. President, they never will learn that; never, never. It is not true. The politicians cannot teach it. They are not the laws of nature. Nature gives the lie to the assertion everywhere. There is not in Washington a white child, until politics gets possession of the unfortunate to some extent, that makes the slightest discrimination between the black and the white race; not one. Politicians teach that prejudice. It is not a law of nature; it is one of the worst and most degrading lessons we learn, and one of the most mischievous.

Mr. President, I say if you insist upon it that the colors shall never be mingled in your school-houses, this bill will not force them together. If you choose to build two school-houses on every acre in every district, and to give the two colors the privilege of choosing between the two, each color will go to that where they feel the most at home and where their education is most advanced. Open two school-houses wherever you please; furnish in them equal accommodations and equal instruction, and the whites will for a time go by themselves, and the colored children will go by themselves for the same reason, because each will feel more at home by themselves than at present either can feel with the other; and the child who should separate from his own color to go into the white school for mere social reasons would feel and would be treated by his own color as a rebel against his race. But, on the contrary, let your law say that they shall not be educated together, and then the subordinate color must take just such accommodations as are provided, let them be poor or good. Let the law speak, then; offer equal inducements to each of the races, and each will in the school-house continue to keep by themselves. But let the individuals and not the superintendent of schools judge of the comparative merits of the schools; that is the point. They will know where they are best taken care of. I would rather trust them than to trust any municipal officer.

Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] said the other day, and the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. STOCKTON,] if I understood him, reiterated the same thing to-day, that we had entered upon this course of legislation for the purpose of perpetuating the ascendency of the republican party. Sir, that declaration, come from whom it will, does great injustice, not merely to the good faith of the republican party, but to its intelligence. I know, and I think our friends of the opposition know, that not one single step has been taken in this whole history upon which we did not stake the very existence of the republican party. We took it at the peril of the republican party. We take this at the peril of the republican party. The Senator from New Jersey knows that and states it. The Senator from New Jersey says he does not believe the people of the United States will consent to it. Sir, I do not guarantee that they will; I do not know that they will. But I would not, so far as my single vote and voice are concerned, turn back from it if I knew that of the forty million people of the United States there could not be found a single million who would accept it. If this generation does not accept it a generation is to come that will accept it, just as sure as the future is to appear.

Sir, was it the purpose of the republican party to re-enforce its numbers when in 1865 it refused to recognize the governments which Andrew Johnson had built up in the lately rebel States? If we had been ambitious solely of party ascendency, could not we have done better than to have made eight hundred thousand voters out of the freedman, the colored man, the ignorant man, the poor man, the despised man? We could have made a million, and you know it, from the white men, the educated men. There were no special inducements known to me for preserving political affiliations between those who laid down their arms in 1865 and the democratic party. The democratic party had never done anything for them that I know of, except to give them good wishes, perhaps. They asked for themselves but two things: They asked for a pardon for their offenses, and that they might still have absolute control of the freedmen. We were entirely willing to grant pardon, and did it, without any alliance. That unlimited control of the freedmen we refused to assent to upon any conditions whatever. Do not tell me, sir, do not let any man flatter himself that if we would have accorded this last condition those people would have still abjured the republican party. Andrew Johnson tendered that domination, and republican as he was, they embraced him; and we are not permitted to doubt, I do not doubt, they would have hugged us all with equal cordiality if we had been equally compliant with their wishes or equally defiant of our duty. No, Mr. President, we did not angle in those waters for political strength. He did not go there to recruit. If I know anything of the purpose which actuated the republican party, they went there simply because they believed that planting the Republic on the foundation of justice, the Republic would be safer, whatever might overtake the republican party.

Mr. President, since we can find no good reason why this bill should not pass, let me offer two or three why, in my judgment, it should pass. And, first, it will aid a whole race, now numbering millions, in their pursuit of happiness, and it will retard no single being in the same pursuit. Remember that the bill imposes no burdens upon any one. It simply commands that we get off from the freedman; not partly off, but altogether off, not off his neck alone, but off his skirts as well. You are not required to lift him to his feet, but to let him get on to his feet if he can; not to lead him on his way, only not to trip him as he staggers on his way. That is all. I am not sure but that more will be demanded of us hereafter. But not by the republican party. There are rumors of an occasion when we shall be summoned before One high in authority who will rebuke some of us very severely because when he was hungered we gave him no meat; when he was thirsty we gave him no drink; when he was a stranger we shut all the taverns upon him; when he was naked we were indifferent; and when he was sick and in prison we did not visit him; when he was ignorant we expelled him from the schools; and when he was dead we denied to his remains the rights of decent sepulcher. It will be useless, I am told, to deny the terrible impeachment, for He will retort upon the cowardly denial, "Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me." Of course such an administration will justly be considered radical. The republican party is eminently conservative. The republican party only requires that you stand back and let the oppressed of centuries stagger to their feet if they can. It is sometimes thought good statesmanship to tax thousands to help one man. Can it be, then, bad statesmanship to help millions without taxing one?

Second, it will cement the foundations of your civil polity with justice, without which no state can be secure, and for want of which many a throne has been upturned and many another now rocks visibly.

Third, it will shield from wanton indignity that great franchise in which we all have a common and priceless estate, American citizenship. Rome sold the rank of citizen at a great price; but she made it worth the purchase, and when away beyond the eastern shores of the Mediterranean Sea in a city of Asia the prisoner Paul said to the centurion, "I am a Roman," the latter hurried to the chief captain and exclaimed, "take heed what thou doest; for this man is a Roman."

We are told that a pebble dropped into the middle of the Atlantic will cause its multitudinous waters to pulsate on either shore. Is there an American who does not yearn for that happy day when the hand of insult wantonly laid upon any citizen shall awaken a throb of indignation in every home throughout the Republic?

Fourth, it will slowly but surely redeem from needless degradation that other and higher franchise, manhood. I know it is said that this is not a common or an equal franchise, that the colored men belong to a lower order of being. It is not true. That is the doctrine of caste, not of Christianity. We have but one creator and that is God, and He makes but one kind of men. Diverse culture has occasionep diverse conditions. Those unequal conditions are an impeachment of society, not of creation. In the name of Christianity; in the name of the Declaration; in the name of the Constitution, by the voice of this bill I invoke the angel of equal rights to remove the last obstruction from the pathway to equal fortune.

And finally, sir, if I can be pardoned, I should like to obtrude one other consideration upon the Senate. As I believe we have a common origin, so I believe we have a common destiny. What matters it, after all, who is first or who is least here? Who shall decide the much-disputed question? It was once asked of One who could not be mistaken who should be greatest in that kingdom to which we all tend; and the answer was, "He that is least among you all." If the fact be so, will it not be prudent statesmanship to promote the colored man a little here lest he supersede us all hereafter?

[Mr. ALCORN addressed the Senate in support of the bill. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. BOUTWELL. Before the Senator from Mississippi concludes, I desire to relieve the objection which is raised by him to the amendment I have proposed as far as it is possible for me to relieve it. I have felt with him, though not perhaps with the enthusiasm which seems to be natural to him, the difficulty to which he has especially called the attention of the Senate, and it is a matter of gratification certainly that we have now the pleasure of joining with the Senator from Mississippi and following him with such steady and active pace as we can command in favor of securing to all the people of this country their just and equal rights.

But before I proceed to state the change which I propose to make in the amendment I have submitted, I ask the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to a statement made by him which I think was an error, and I am also bound to believe that it was wholly unintentional. At the same time I am compelled to confess that there is ground for the statement he makes, but not to the extent that his remarks indicate. He said that Massachusetts was responsible for the continuance of the slave trade until 1808. That is a very old question, and it is hardly worth while in the light of the truth of history to spend any time upon it. But the Senator from Mississippi will remember this, I have no doubt, as substantially the history of the proceedings in the Convention of 1787, by which the slave trade was permitted for twenty years. The Committee of Detail in that Convention reported a provision by which the slave trade was left open for an indefinite period of time, subject only to the action of the several States. Eleven of the States had already abolished or prohibited the slave trade. The only States that recognized it were Georgia and South Carolina. The States of the North refused to accept the report of the Committee of Detail, and it was then that General Pinckney, of South Carolina, declared that if the slave trade were prohibited South Carolina would never enter the Union. But after much debate General Pinckney did make a motion to recommit that provision of the proposed constitution with the suggestion that the importation of slaves might be subject to duty as were other imports under the laws of the country, and that proposition to recommit was seconded by Mr. Rutledge, of South Carolina. The committee again reported allowing the slave trade till the year 1800. The report was made by Governor Livingston of New York. The result of the action of the committee was objected to by the Delegates from South Carolina, and Mr. Charles Pinckney especially declared that if all the Delegates from South Carolina were to assent to that proposition and go home and urge the people of the State to ratify the Constitution upon that basis, it would never be ratified; and Gouverneur Morris afterward in a statement made in the Convention declared that it was because South Carolina and Georgia insisted upon continuing the slave trade that the North finally assented to the proposition that was ultimately adopted. Finally Mr. Charles Pinckney, after this debate and under much pressure, and with the declaration supported by his colleagues and by the Delegates from Georgia that those States would never enter the Union, moved to amend the report of the committee by substituting 1808 for 1800; and the only lot or part Massachusetts had in that transaction was that Mr. Gorham, of Massachusetts, seconded the motion made by Mr. Charles Pinckney; and the proposition was finally adopted. That is the history of the proceeding, and to that extent Massachusetts is responsible.

But to return to the amendment which I have had the honor to submit, I have to say that I did desire that every educational and benevolent institution in the country which had in any particular been endowed by any State should be open to every citizen of the country; but, as a matter of law, I found it exceedingly difficult to stand upon that broad proposition. Every eleemosynary institution of course takes its law from the founder of the institution, that is, from the person making the first donation, gift, or bequest to the institution; and all subsequent gifts and bequests are upon that foundation, and, as matter of law, follow the will of the founder, even though the subsequent gifts may greatly exceed the original one. Therefore, when you look at an institution which has a private foundation, like Dartmouth College, it was held by the Supreme Court of the United States to have been founded by President Wheeler, and that all subsequent gifts and donations were subject to the will of the founder. I think, as matter of law, this bill, if enacted, could not stand the test of the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States upon the principles which have been heretofore asserted, and therefore it was the intention of my amendment to waive that question and to provide that every public school, institution of learning or benevolence, supported by public taxation should be open to every child; that every institution endowed by the United States should be open to every citizen of the country. "Every institution hereafter endowed," is the language of the amendment as distinguished from "founded;" every institution hereafter endowed, even though it might be in its origin a private institution, shall be open to all the citizens of the country, so that if Dartmouth College, for example, which is a private institution, chooses hereafter to receive a donation or gift from the State of New Hampshire, it would receive that gift upon the condition that it was to be open to all the citizens of the State. But it might very well say, "Although we have received in times past gifts from the State of New Hampshire, yet they were upon the foundation of Mr. Wheeler; his bequest was the law of the institution, and therefore you cannot change his will as expressed in the foundation which he laid of the college." I purpose, and I trust that will meet the views of the Senator from Mississippi, and of all those who desire to open every institution of learning which is subject to law, to insert after the words "United States" the words "or founded by any State;" so as to read:

Endowed by the United States or founded by any State, or that may hereafter be endowed by any State.

If that amendment be accepted, we shall then open to the citizens of the country every institution that is supported by public taxation, every institution founded by a State, even though it may have been endowed afterward by private munificence, and every institution that may hereafter be endowed by any State, even though it may have been founded by private munificence; and I believe that is as far as we can safely and legally go. To say that an institution private in its foundation and receiving its law from the founder, though it may have afterward received a donation or a gift from a State, shall be open to every citizen for the purposes of education, is going further than I think we can go under the principles of law and according to the decisions of the Supreme Court.

I move to insert in the second line of my amendment, after the word "States," the words "or founded by any State;" so that it will read:

And also of every common school and public institution of learning or benevolence endowed by the United States or founded by any State, or that may hereafter be endowed by any State, or supported in whole or in part by public taxation.

I suppose I may modify it.

Mr. ALCORN. I wish to say that I do not accept the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Massachusetts is not in order at the present time.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Have I not the opportunity to modify my own amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's amendment itself is not before the Senate at the present time.

Mr. ALCORN. I desire to speak just now, for it would be more appropriate now than at another time, in answer to the Senator from Massachusetts.

I will say to him that I shall decline to accept his amendment when it is in order. I will state the point I make in regard to Dartmouth College, and it is one that I think is well taken. He claims that Dartmouth College received its endowment under a certain contract or compact that existed at the time the institution was established and that the amendment which I propose would be a violation of the contract. I contend as a legal proposition that it would work no such effect. If the amendment to the Constitution of the United States was constitutionally enacted, if that amendment has binding force to-day, it works its way to Dartmouth College and to every other institution in the country, and no previous contract that may have been entered into by Dartmouth College will stand in the way of the full scope and workings of the amendment of the Constitution. There is no prohibition in the Constitution of the United States that contracts shall not be impaired. Where do you find in the Constitution of the United States that contracts shall not be impaired by Congress? There is a provision that the States shall not pass laws impairing the obligation of contracts; but cannot the Government of the United States by an amendment to the Constitution change the form and theory of this Government altogether if it is the will of the people to do so? And can you stand on any constitution of any State in this Union, with the supreme power in the Government of the United States established as it is, and hold up any contract or any constitutional guarantees that may have been derived from any State authority? You cannot do it. Therefore I say that I demand for the colored youth of the South that he shall make his way into Dartmouth College, that college which stands to-day the cherished idol, and properly so, too, of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. You must give it all its force; you cannot stop the workings of this great torrent. It will not stand and be denied admission when it gets to the door of Dartmouth College. It must go north and make its way there as well as work its way to the humble school-house that sits at the foot of the hill. All distinctions in this Government are broken down; we are one people; and Dartmouth College has no rights, no privileges, no immunities above the humblest cottage school-house that there is in all the broad land.

But now a word with regard to the point the honorable Senator makes in answer to me upon the action of Massachusetts with reference to the slave trade. The Senator, if my memory is right, will find—and I think he will agree with me—that every New England State voted with South Carolina and Georgia to extend the slave trade up to 1808; and that Virginia and North Carolina and all the Middle States, then slave States, voted against it. That is my recollection of the vote on that occasion and the condition in which the States at that time stood. Massachusetts stood by South Carolina. The New England States were then engaged in the slave trade, and voted that this trade, held now to have been a barbarism whereby the African was seized in his own native land and brought to our shores and sold into slavery, should continue until 1808. Captured, enslaved, and sold for gold to the people of the Southern States as savages, enslaved and sold to us, barbarians as they were we civilized them, we christianized them; and when the war was ended and they were made free you declared that they were so far civilized, so far christianized as to be entitled to be made citizens of this great nation. The word was spoken; the deed was done. Now, as citizens of this nation, I claim that these colored youths of the South, the children of the savages that you brought from Africa in your ships, our recent slaves, shall be admitted to matriculate in Dartmouth College and sit down by the son of the Senator from Massachusetts his equal before the law, his peer as a candidate for the honors of that ancient and renowned institution of learning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Before that question is put is it not proper to perfect that part of the section which is moved to be stricken out?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move in the twelfth line of the second section to strike out the words "nor less than five hundred nor," and in the thirteenth line "less than thirty days nor;" the object of which is in a law of this kind not to have a minimum punishment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey to the second section of the amendment inserted by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There is an amendment to be made in the third section. I do not know whether that is now in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not at the present time.

Mr. SARGENT. Is an amendment in order to the first section, in the nature of a proviso?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not at the present time.

Mr. SARGENT. In order that the Senate may have notice of the amendment which I propose to offer at the proper time, I send my proposition to the desk to be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the first section it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit any State or school district from providing separate schools for persons of different sex or color where such separate schools are equal in all respects to others of the same grade established by such authority and supported by an equal pro rata expenditure of school funds.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, which is to strike out the second section of the amendment inserted as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I am a little at a loss——

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Will the Senator yield for a motion to go into executive session?

Mr. BOGY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I hope not.

The motion was not agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 15, noes 32.

[Mr. BOGY addressed the Senate in opposition to the bill. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. SAULSBURY, (at six o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. PEASE. Mr. President, I had intended while this question was before the Senate to submit some remarks, but owing to the lateness of the hour, and the further fact that every Senator has made up his mind as to the manner in which he shall vote upon this question, I shall not attempt to detain the Senate by any extended remarks.

I desire briefly to give some of the reasons why I shall support this bill. I shall vote for the bill, first, because I believe that the Congress of the United States has the power under the Constitution to enact a law of this kind. I shall vote for this measure because I believe that it is the bounden duty of the American Congress to enforce the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. So far as the relation of the citizen to the General Government and to the several States that make up the Government is concerned, I am satisfied that the policy of this Government has been changed, and that the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution have provided a new policy in this Government, a policy that defines, recognizes, and protects the rights, the privileges, and the immunities of American citizenship, and has given to Congress the power and the right to legislate for their protection in those several rights and privileges. I believe that the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution clearly indicates that it was the policy of this Government to protect by all needful legislation every citizen, high or low, rich or poor, white or black, native or foreign, who should comply with the terms of citizenship; that all classes should have the equal protection of American law and be protected in their inalienable rights, those rights which grow out of the very nature of society, and the organic law of this country.

Arguments have been presented here intended to show that this measure is unconstitutional. I have listened patiently and attentively to the ingenious and able efforts that have been made by the opposition, and I am perfectly satisfied that the position taken and the arguments advanced by the friends of this bill are unanswered and are unanswerable. I shall not at this late hour attempt to recapitulate them; it is unnecessary.

But, sir, I have heard what it might have been expected we should hear from the opposition, a party which has opposed every measure looking to the protection and elevation of a certain class of American citizens. Why, sir, in every step and stage of the history of this country from the breaking out of the war up to the present day, in every measure looking to the preservation of the Government and protection of the citizen, we have been met with the cry of unconstitutionality. When the thirteenth amendment was proposed to the several States, the democratic party of this country met it with the cry, "It is unconstitutional." When the fourteenth amendment was submitted to the several States, we were met with the same objection. So with the fifteenth amendment, and so with all legislation looking to the enforcement of these amendments to the Constitution, we have been met by that party with the cry of unconstitutionality.

Believing that we have the constitutional right to enact this bill, there is but one other phase of the question to be considered, and that is the question of expediency. I believe that it is expedient for the Congress of the United States now to fix a remedy for existing evils and settle forever the question of the rights, privileges, and immunities of American citizens. There is no more opportune time than the present hour. I believe that this measure has the indorsement of the popular sense to-day. I believe that the American people are prepared for it and are desirous that the question of the status of the negro in this country shall be fixed. I believe that if this measure were to-day submitted to the American people for their suffrages it would meet with an overwhelming approval. The American people are disposed to establish justice and the equality of the citizen before the law.

The main objection that has been brought forward by the opponents of this bill is the objection growing out of mixed schools. Every one who has spoken in opposition to this measure has expressed very serious solicitude as to its effect upon the colored people of the South. Now, I have been somewhat familiar with their condition; I have been familiar with their educational interest for the last ten or twelve years, and I undertake to say that none of the difficulties that have been portrayed will obtain in the South. I believe that the southern people recognize the importance of educating the masses of the people. There has been a great revolution in public sentiment in the South during the last three or four years, and I believe that to-day a majority of the southern people are in favor of supporting, maintaining, and fostering a system of common education, a system of common schools, that shall extend the benefits of the rudiments of an English education to all her people; and I believe that the people of the South so fully recognize this, that if this measure shall become a law, there is not a State south of Mason and Dixon's line that will abolish its school system. Men are governed by their interests. There is not a southern planter but knows that it is for his interest to encourage the education and protection of the lately emancipated people. It is for his interest to have a school-house near his plantation, for his interest to encourage the building of churches, because it will secure labor, it will secure contentment and permanency among the laboring class. In those States the history of the last two or three years proves, and the people of the South are not blind to that fact, that in the State of Georgia, where unjust discriminations have been practiced against the colored people, and where they have been denied school advantages and other privileges of citizenship, there has been a tide of emigration from the State. The colored people, who constitute the mass of the laboring classes, are leaving that State and going to those sections of the country where their rights are protected and educational facilities are provided. If by no higher motive, the southern people will be governed by their own self-interest, and will continue to foster a system of public schools. They recognize the fact that under the new order of government their property and their personal interests are in the hands of an ignorant populace. They recognize the fact that the great interests of society under a form of government like ours depend upon the virtue and intelligence of the people; and in proportion as the people are educated the State will prosper and the general welfare of the people be secured.

Now, sir, in the State of Mississippi we have a system of schools, and under the law regulating the system the child of the colored man can enter the school where white children are taught, and the laws of the State will protect him. We have in that State probably one of the finest colleges in the South, an institution which has been the pride of the Southwest—I refer to Oxford University—and to-day the son of the black man can enter the halls of that institution under the laws of our State. But, sir, with this law, with these provisions, and with a civil-rights law passed two years ago, more stringent in its provisions than the one that is before us to-day, not one instance has come to my knowledge where a colored man has attempted to enforce the law in this respect. The colored people asked for the establishment of a similar university, and the State granted it. The colored man of the South understands and appreciates the situation. All he asks and wants is that there shall be no discrimination against him, that there shall be no legislation based upon color tending to debase and degrade him on account of his color or previous condition. He asks simply that he shall be placed upon the same footing with the white man, and his own good sense teaches him to adapt himself to the circumstances. The humblest and the most ignorant colored man in the South, if he has not an idea above the hoe-handle he wields, knows enough, and appreciates fully the situation, not to force himself into a position where he is to become the victim of prejudice. But he wants as a citizen of the United States that he shall be equally protected under the law; that all legislation, whether it be by the State or by the national Government, shall not discriminate against him on account of his color.

Gentlemen say that if equal advantages in separate schools are provided the law is met so far as privileges and immunities are concerned. I say that whenever a State shall legislate that the races shall be separated, and that legislation is based upon color or race, there is a distinction made; it is a distinction the intent of which is to foster a concomitant of slavery and to degrade him. The colored man understands and appreciates his former condition; and when laws are passed that say that "because you are a black man you shall have a separate school," he looks upon that, and justly, as tending to degrade him. There is no equality in that.

I do not propose to extend my remarks longer. I believe that the country to-day and the American Senate are satisfied that we have the right under the Constitution to pass this enforcement law; and, believing this, I shall support the measure, and I shall vote against the amendment suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] because when this question is settled I want every college and every institution of learning in this broad land to be open to every citizen, that there shall be no discrimination. I want Harvard to throw open her doors; I want Dartmouth to do the same thing. I desire to see such legislation as shall require every institution of learning which is supported in whole or in part by taxation or by public endowment to give to every citizen equal privileges and equal rights in those institutions. I am therefore opposed to that amendment.

In conclusion, I appeal to the Senate in behalf of four millions of citizens of the United States whose rights and immunities are abridged in many of the States. The people of the State I have the honor to represent in this Senate desire that when they pass beyond the limits of their own State they shall not be subjected to indignities upon railroads, steamboats, or the highways on account of color; they ask such legislation shall be had as shall afford the protection guaranteed to them in the Constitution. I should prove recreant to the trust imposed on me if I failed to urge the adoption and vote for this measure.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, the importance of the question under discussion to the great body of the people of this country, and particularly to those whom I have the honor in part to represent on this floor, must be my excuse, if one were needed, for asking the indulgence of the Senate to present such views as I entertain upon the passage of the bill now under consideration. There are times when the silence of the representative is treason to the constituency he represents; and such, sir, I should feel to be my case were I to remain silent on a measure involving so greatly as does the bill under consideration the rights, the interests, the happiness, and the prosperity of the people I represent; and I represent many of that class of our citizens whom the bill proposes professedly to benefit.

I know that anything which may be said by those of us who come from the southern section of the Union, who are natives there and grew up under the institutions that existed there prior to the war, is considered by those who were educated in a different school as tinged with prejudice upon our part as to that class of citizens who under the old law were held in slavery by us.

I shall not make any great professions of interest or of love for one class of citizens more than another, nor for that class in particular, because candor compels me to say that as long as the former institutions of the section in which I was born existed I was loyal to those institutions, and had no objection to that particular one which is now so much denounced. That class of our citizens owe me nothing for their enfranchisement, unless it be for a devotion to the Union of the States as against those who sought to overturn it. So far did I maintain that side which ultimately resulted in their emancipation. But I should be uncandid and untruthful to them were I to say that I was the least influenced in that adhesion to the flag and the unity of my country because it sought their emancipation. If I were to say so I should tell an untruth, which those who know me would know to be so.

Mr. President, I listened attentively to the honorable Senator from Mississippi [Mr. ALCORN] in his declarations as to the love he bore to the colored race, nursling as he was of that race, and while I could appreciate them to some extent, yet I think it would be hard for either him or me to answer a candid colored man and say that that love was anything else than that of natural humanity, which was called for by their kindness and love for us. It was not the love or admiration which an equal bears to an equal; and it would be untruthful to say so. They know that it was not so; for if it were, we should have scorned to hold them in slavery, the worst of all bondage. If I had believed that their interest would have been promoted by freedom, I should never in the world under any circumstances have held them in slavery; but my education, my habits of thought, had led me to believe then that their interest as well as my interest was promoted by the institution of slavery. Therefore I cannot come before the Senate and the country saying that I bear to the colored race or have shown to them any greater love than that which a man bears to his human kind.

But, Mr. President, I trust that I come to the discussion of this question denuded of the prejudices of early education. I trust that I have reached a point as an American Senator, as the representative of a State, where I seek to do that which will inure to the general benefit of all, that I have reached a stand-point where I can view this question as it is brought about by the inexorable logic of events, and that I stand now prepared to act upon it in view of the changed situation of affairs and to accept as the edict of the American people, brought about it may be in blood, brought about it may be unnecessarily, that all men, black or white, are citizens of the American Republic. Whatever may have been my education, whatever may have been my feelings, whatever may have been my action in regard to the colored race, I trust I am prepared to accept as a verdict from which there can be no appeal that they are citizens, and as citizens I propose to treat them, and to treat them as my equals before the law, for my equals they are before the law. I therefore propose to discuss this measure in that view and looking to the fact of their citizenship.

The first question that presents itself is cui bono? What good is to be derived from this legislation? What benefit, I ask you, Mr. President and Senators, do you confer upon any man or any class of men by it? It has been conceded by every Senator who has attempted to sustain the provisions of this bill that all are citizens, black and white alike. What right do you or I possess that the colored people do not? In regard to the provisions of the bill or the immunities and privileges mentioned in the bill, what right do you or I possess that they do not? Is there any difference between their rights now and what they will be after this bill shall have been passed, with the exception of the penalty which enforces it? Does the declaration that they are entitled to these rights make them any more so? Are they not entitled to them as much without the declaration as with it? Are they not entitled now to the same remedies for a redress of injuries that you or I possess? Where, then, is the necessity for passing this bill?

There is but one suggestion in the bill that for a moment looks to conferring upon them any right which they do not now possess, and that is simply in appearance and not in reality; that is, as to their admission to common or public schools.

It is very doubtful to any one who will examine as a lawyer the first section of the amended bill as reported by the committee whether by a proper construction of it you may not yet, even if you pass the bill, divide the colors in the public schools and not violate the first section of the amendment as proposed by the committee. There would be no question upon that point if you were to pass the original bill, for that placed beyond controversy what was intended by it; but the first section as drawn by the committee is evidently ambiguous and susceptible of two constructions. It is true that under it all citizens are declared entitled to the equal privileges of the common schools, but it is not so distinctly and directly declared as to be apparent and to force the conviction that the intention of the Legislature is that they shall be admitted to the same school. I take it for granted, however, that the friends of the bill do not intend that it shall be thus ambiguous, but are prepared to pass it with the full knowledge and understanding that it is to be construed to compel the admission of all classes and conditions of society into the common schools.

With the exception of the clause requiring the admission to the common schools of all alike, independent of race or color, forbidding any distinction to be made, is there any provision in the bill granting to the colored people any right that does not appertain to them now as well as it will after the passage of the bill? I except of course the penalties imposed by the bill, of which I may speak hereafter.

Now, what good are you to accomplish by thus forcing the mixture of the races in schools? It has been said by an old writer that it is not the rigor of a law, but the inexpediency of a law that makes it tyrannical, and the saying was a true one. Test this bill by that proposition, and what is the result as to the character of it? That there is in the minds of many people and a large mass of the people in the various States of this Union an antipathy to the mixture of the races in the same school there can be no question. The very fact of the introduction, the sustaining, and the urging of the passage of this bill, or a similar one, is proof enough of that assertion. Granting that to be so, what good do you accomplish or what benefit do you confer by attempting to override that antipathy? Where is the individual of any color, for I desire now to address myself to this proposition as though we were all of one color, all equal in every sense before the law—what advantage would it be to me to force my child into a school where a large element of the scholars were by reason of prejudice, or otherwise, opposed to it? What benefit do I gain by it? Suppose that antipathy to arise not on account of color, but from any cause whatsoever; what good do I accomplish by forcing my child into that school thus opposed by all the surrounding elements? Do I benefit the child? If so, how? Is he made happier? Is he made in a better condition of mind to pursue his studies, and to acquire that for which he was sent there? If not, how do you confer a benefit upon him by forcing him into that situation? Does this bill propose anything more, so far as common schools are concerned?

In many of our States in the South it has always been difficult to maintain a system of common-school education at all. Many of our people, long before the war as well as since, argued that the power did not exist in the State to tax the property of the people of the State for the education of the children. Many minds accepted that as sound argument; and it was difficult for those who thought otherwise to establish a system of common-school education at all; but by perseverance we have established a system of common schools. My own State has been very reluctant about it always, and never has yet adopted what is called the State system. As far as we could ever go was to the establishment of the county system, by which each county was permitted to establish such schools as it might think proper. While we have advanced thus far, we have made no distinction whatever in regard to color in the advantages which we give of education, only claiming the right, in conformity with the prejudice, if you please to call it so, of the people, of dividing the races into separate schools. I say we have only advanced as far as to a county system, and that applies to all alike except as to the division of blacks and whites in separate schools. Now, sir, if you pass this bill, what will be the consequence? My colleague has depicted it to you as was read from the desk this morning: you upset the whole common-school system of the State of Tennessee, because the whites are in a decided majority in the State; the colored people are in a minority but a very large minority, forming a large part of the people. Now by this one act of legislation you sweep out of existence the whole common-school system of the State. Whom have you benefited? You have benefited no one. You have injured the colored man as well as the poorer classes of the white race—those who are dependent for the education of their children upon the common schools. You have stripped them of all opportunity to give to their children any education whatever. Do you desire this? Will this be to the benefit either of the whole country in general or of that particular locality?

Mr. President, this is upon the idea that you have the power to do this thing. It is based upon the idea that your act is in strict conformity with your Constitution, that it is an exercise of a power clearly vested in the Federal Government. But suppose that after you have by your legislation swept out of existence the common-school system in one or more States it comes to be determined that you have done it beyond your power, what good have you accomplished? Where have you benefited any one? I desire to ask the consideration of Senators to this question as a practical question, as one which should be considered in the light of benefit or injury and not in the light of partisanship or prejudice.

Mr. President, whence are the rights provided for by this bill derived? Where do you obtain the right to attend a theater, or to the accommodations of an inn or of a common carrier? Is either a political right? No one will contend that it is. Then are they rights appertaining to citizenship at all? Is not the alien as much entitled to the benefits of an inn as a citizen? Can the innkeeper refuse the entertainment of an alien any more than he can that of a citizen? Is not the remedy the same? Is it not so with a common carrier? An alien who owes you no allegiance at all, a man born far away, has a right to the equal privileges of the common carrier, the same as a citizen. Is it not so as to all the rights enumerated in this bill, with per possibility the exception of the common school? Whence does a man get any of these rights? By virtue of your Constitution, either State or national? Or does he inherit it by the common law as a privilege of the common law appertaining to man as man and not as a citizen?

But, Mr. President, what will be the effect of this legislation upon the colored race itself as to benefits to be conferred upon that race? Will it put them in the pathway of a more advanced intellectuality? I speak now of the rights conferred here, independent of the question of the common school, or you may take them with the mixed common schools; and I ask is this calculated to advance the colored men in the scale of intellectual manhood? May he not advance in that scale as rapidly under the law as it exists now as he can if this bill be passed? Is it to add to his morality, to his moral nature, to his moral surroundings, or is it to do anything more than the gratification of a desire to be advanced which he by accepting the provisions of this bill tacitly indorses that he can reach in no other mode than by the legislation of the dominant race? If he accepts the provisions of your bill, the colored man who accepts them and desires them tacitly acknowledges that you are the dominant race and that without your legislation he cannot make himself a man. Let him feel, Mr. President, that he is a man, and although you may turn him from your theater, although you may turn him from your house because of your prejudice,

A man's a man for a' that.

Let him feel his manhood and work up to his manhood. Let him rise in spite of your prejudices. Let him command the respect of the race which he claims to be the equal of; and no legislation is required save to make him equal before the law, which has already been done. Does this class distinction prevent men from making themselves felt, either as high intellectual giants or as great workers in the moral world? We have but to cast our eye to our mother-country to answer in the negative. Who does not know that classes exist under the English law, and that the plebeian may not enter into the places set apart for the nobility; and yet, sir, did that prevent the coal-heaver's son from becoming "my lord chancellor," before whom "my lord duke bows?" So it may be with this race. If they have the intellectual powers and can advance in the scale which we would fain hope they have and can; do they need anything more than the fact that they are freemen? May they not carve their own fortune, carve their way to the high offices of dignity, honor, and respectability? Ah, Mr. President, they need but that which you have conferred by the Constitution of this country to command the respect of the world if they have the intellectual capacity to do so; and I am not here to dispute that, for, as I say, I desire to treat them now and shall ever treat them as citizens, my equals in every sense of the word; but it is not admission into social rights that makes the man. The child of poverty who is covered with the dust of the field or the smut of the workshop would be refused equally with the colored man admission to many places, and if he should attempt to enter he would be turned aside; and yet he is the peer of any of us. It is the fact that he lives under a free government that gives him the opportunity to make his mark.

Then, sir, is it not bad policy, looking to the fact that a race must work out its own destiny, that you should so act as to make them think that they are only elevated by your action and by the hand of power? If you make them to feel that they are wards under your guardianship you have failed to increase that element of character which would make them worthy to achieve success. Looking to that as well as to all the other considerations, it seems to me that your legislation is unwise and uncalled for.

But, sir, it is said that they desire this law, or something similar, because it is an indignity to their race; and they feel it as an indignity to their race to be refused admission to the different places here mentioned. Have they no pride of race and of kindred? Is there nothing in their nature that makes them proud of their race as the white man is of his? Think you that it would trouble the Anglo-Saxon for any other race to turn him aside? Think you he would care? He would remember that he was an Anglo-Saxon and glory in it, notwithstanding the indignity which might be sought to be offered to him. Ay, sir; it is a principle that is implanted in the breast of every people. Take him who comes from the bleak and barren hills of Scotia. Does he ever forget the land of his birth and the home of his childhood? Will he not even amid all the surroundings of this free and happy country congregate in the Society of Saint Andrew, and glory in the flag of his native land; and meet in his annual reunion to rejoice that he is a Scotchman, and think, no matter what indignity you may offer to a Scotchman, that he is a Scotchman still? Take a man from Merry Old England, transplant him here, surrounded by all the institutions of our country and all that is attractive here, and he will still, occasionally at least, gather around Saint George's Cross and feel that he is an Englishman. So it is with the instincts that enter into any nation and any people. Are the Africans, or the descendants of the Africans, those whom you seek to benefit by this bill, different from other races in this respect? Have they no pride of nationality? May they not achieve a position by which they are proud to be sons of Africa, no matter who may seek to throw obloquy or shame upon them? Ah, sir, although they may remember with regret the days of their servitude, although they may look back to those days in which their ancestry suffered the enslavement of the dominant race, yet when they shall have reached the high eminence of intellectuality which this Government has thrown open to their efforts, they can then be proud that they have risen from a race once enslaved but now free. And yet you would strike all of this out of their nature, you would strike all of this from their hopes for the future, by making them feel that it is not by their bearing or by their acts that they are to be elevated, but by your legislation and by the force of Federal law. For one, sir, believing that the incentive to achieve success will urge them on with more celerity than this forever keeping them in wardship, I would, if for no other reason, oppose the passage of this bill or any similar measure.

It may be said, as was said by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] that it is essential to a republican government that the antipathies or prejudices which exist between the two races should be removed, and that that can only be done by their mixture in the common schools. The first proposition I deny, and do not by any means admit the second. I think that the colored race, being equal as they are before the law, may achieve a position which will command the respect of every intelligent cultivated man, that they have the opportunity to do it, and it is unnecessary to remove these prejudices in order to maintain a republic. Mr. President, is the fact that you started from poverty, that you started from a low position, any drawback to you in after life when you have achieved success? Does he who wanders from the log-cabin of the pioneer, the child of poverty, into some distant home and accumulates wealth and honorable position, think you, ever forget that home and the surroundings of his early youth if he has the principle of manhood and is worthy of his manhood? Think you, Mr. President, that he does not in after life, when he shall have reached success, glory in the fact that he has achieved it by his own endeavors, by his own industry, by his own character? So I would leave to this race—subservient they may have been, slaves they may have been, but no longer such—an open way to success. I would bid them God speed to reach the topmost round and command respect from everybody.

But I have dwelt alone upon the features of this bill as to its expediency. I have attempted to show that it is inexpedient; that it seeks alone to remove a prejudice by law, to elevate a race by law; that it does not stop at simply conferring the high benefits and the equality before the law which attach now, but that it attempts class legislation, as it were, by advancing above and beyond this equality before the law, and consequently is obnoxious to that objection. I have attempted to show also that there is no benefit to accrue to either the one race or the other, but that by the disruption of the common-school system and by many other things which may be brought about by this law if enacted, absolute injury will occur to those whom it seeks to benefit, and therefore it ought not to pass. I have submitted such remarks thus far based upon the idea of our undoubted authority to pass this bill. But, sir, have we that authority? The time was in our history as a nation when such a proposition would not have been tolerated for a moment. The time was in our history when no mind, I suppose, would have for a moment argued that the power to confer the rights attempted to be secured by this bill existed in the Federal Government. But it is insisted now that, since the late war and the enactment of the several amendments to the Constitution alluded to, greater powers are conferred upon the Federal Government in this respect than attached under the old Constitution, and that by virtue of the fourteenth amendment as interpreted we have the undoubted power to pass the bill. It is a very dangerous proposition to the rights and interests of this race thus sought to be benefited to admit that proposition. I say it is detrimental to their best interests and to their future hopes to admit that proposition. There are of that race in the United States a little over four millions. Under the powers which are urged in defense of this bill it is virtually the submission of the rights of four millions of black people to be judged upon by thirty-five odd millions of whites.

It is a dangerous proposition to thus put their newly acquired rights in the hands of thirty-five millions of whites, and they ought to feel it and see it; because the same thing that might influence them in their adherence to race and which they accuse the white race of might be brought to bear by the white race, by which they would deprive them of liberties which they now are willing to establish. The power to establish vests beyond question the power to remove. The time was, and but a short time ago, when they would have had a poor chance in the Congress of the United States from any section. But one or two men dared to lift their voices in their behalf in this Chamber; and there were but few men in the other Chamber who espoused their cause, at a time when the honorable Senator from Mississippi and myself bore that great love for them which he spoke of, and yet were willing to hold them in slavery. That time existed. In the change of parties it may exist again; and those of us who were willing to be slaveholders when slaveholding was popular, may in the tide of events again be slaveholders when we have the power to be so. I say it may be. It may be that the popular tide will turn, and that the white race, being in numbers at least the dominant race, may again assume to take from the others the liberties conferred by your bill. If I were of the colored race, I would rather trust to local self-government for the protection of my rights than to put them in the legislative department of the Federal Government. In the State of Mississippi they control. My honorable friend the Senator from that State now is their friend. That often happens. But the colored race of the State of Mississippi can better take care of themselves under the local laws of Mississippi, where they rule, than to trust to the tide of turning and shifting majorities of the American Congress. Let Congress change as it may, they are in the majority in Mississippi, and they are safer in the State of Mississippi and in the State of South Carolina than they are in the American Senate, if a majority of the American people should happen to change in politics and in their ideas of the negro race or of its intellectuality. I say, if you look at it merely as a question of expediency; if you look at it from the stand-point of this race itself, they are safer in risking their rights to local self-government than to trust them in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. President, I have been considered Federal in my politics. I have ever believed that the highest interests of the American people were as a united people and under the Constitution of the United States; but I would never voluntarily surrender the inalienable rights of citizenship to the protection of the Federal Government. There are many things which the Federal Government is vested with power over under the Constitution, and I submit to that authority thus vested in it, and believe it to be right and proper and in its legitimate sphere paramount to every other government. My allegiance is due to the United States of America first in the exercise of its legitimate power, but I would hate to vest and to risk the central Government with the dearest rights appertaining to citizenship.

Our Government is a most beautiful and magnificent structure, the States are the pillars and the General Government the mighty dome that crowns all, and let him beware who would strike down the strength and beauty of the fabric by striking the pillars from under the dome; our liberties would not be enhanced, methinks, by the experiment. So I say that were I even a representative man of the race sought to be benefited by this bill, I should hesitate before I should seek to vest my rights, my interests, in the General Government in place of local self-government in many places where my race could command respect, because where they are in power they do command the respect of office-holders at least.

But have we the power under the fourteenth amendment to pass this bill? I know, sir, that in the discussion of this proposition as a legal proposition I shall have to repeat and travel over ground already occupied and ably occupied by those who have preceded me; but I seek now to address myself to the proposition as a legal proposition: Does the fourteenth amendment vest in Congress the power to legislate on the subjects sought to be legislated upon by this bill? If I understood the honorable Senators who have sustained this bill, they derive the power to pass it from the first clause of the fourteenth amendment, that no State shall deprive any citizen of the United States or of any State of the rights and privileges pertaining to citizenship. That is the substance, without quoting the exact language. Now, the important question is, What are the privileges and immunities secured by the fourteenth amendment? I understand those Senators who have sustained the power to insist that they are the inalienable rights which appertain to all freemen, namely: life, liberty, and the right of private property. Those are termed the inalienable rights of us all. I understand them to say these are immunities and privileges guaranteed by the fourteenth amendment. Is this so? Let me illustrate. You say that no State shall abridge the rights and privileges of a citizen. You say that one of these rights and privileges is life. That is one of the inalienable privileges that you say appertain now and are protected by the fourteenth amendment. Suppose a State passes a law to take the life of any man away for crime or for anything else according to its law. Would not that be abridging the rights and immunities guaranteed? If your construction of the first clause of this fourteenth amendment is true, by what authority has a State the right to execute a man, to imprison a man, for crime or anything else? Is it not an abridgment of the inalienable rights guaranteed by the fourteenth amendment? If it is done by the law of the State, does not the Constitution of the United States override the law of the State? And upon what authority could you sustain the execution of a man for murder in any one of the States? It is depriving the citizen of life, the dearest of all the inalienable rights of a citizen. The fourteenth amendment expressly says that a State shall not deprive him of the rights and privileges of a citizen of the United States. Now, if the right to life be a privilege under the Constitution of the United States and by virtue of citizenship of the United States, how can you justify the law of a State which would take life or which would imprison a man in the penitentiary or which would affect any of the rights of property? And yet if your construction of this amendment be correct, it necessarily carries you to that. If the United States is the protector of our lives by virtue of that amendment and we are dependent upon it, then we defy any power, any State, any government, to take it away from us. The government which protects is the government alone which can take life for crime or for anything else.

But the construction of the fourteenth amendment has been before the Supreme Court, the last court of resort in the United States. Two opinions were delivered by that court in the celebrated Slaughter-house case. I submit to those who maintain the power of Congress to pass this bill to tell me in what the difference consists between the majority and the minority judges in that case. It does not consist in the fact that the legislation of the State of Louisiana was there brought in controversy; it does not exist in the fact that both conceded that the law of Louisiana created a monopoly, that it created a privilege and a special privilege to the slaughter-house company which was denied to other citizens. That was conceded both by the majority and the minority of the court; and what was their distinction? What was the difference between them? They both agreed upon another proposition, that the fourteenth amendment acted alone upon the rights and privileges of citizens of the United States. Both the majority and the dissenting judges agreed that it acts upon no other than rights, privileges, and immunities which appertain to citizens of the United States as citizens of the United States. What was their difference? The majority said that the inalienable rights under every free government, and which appertain to man as man, and as an inhabitant of a free country—the right of life, liberty, and the enjoyment of private property—were not rights obtained under the Constitution of the United States and by virtue of citizenship of the United States, but that these rights were secured by the States, and the States alone must judge of the protection or violation of them. The minority said that the inalienable rights of life, liberty, &c., were immunities of a citizen of the United States covered by the fourteenth amendment, and therefore that the legislation of Louisiana, which invaded those rights and privileges which were thus guaranteed, was obnoxious to the fourteenth amendment, and that it should be so declared.

Which of those opinions was correct, for upon that will turn the force, or the want of force, in the judgment the court pronounced? Are the privileges which appertain to a freeman, to a man as the inhabitant of a free country, to wit, life, liberty, and the right of private property, immunities covered by the fourteenth amendment, or are they not? Because if they are, the minority of the court were clearly right in adjudicating that the legislation of the State of Louisiana was obnoxious to that objection; but the majority said no, they are not, but the only rights that are sustained under this amendment are rights conferred by the Constitution and by virtue of citizenship of the United States.

Again the question came up before the court in a very important case which it seems to me is decisive of this question, and that was the application of a woman in the State of Illinois to be admitted to the bar of that State as a practicing attorney. She applied before the courts in the State of Illinois and was refused admission as a practitioner, no law of the State of Illinois prohibiting her by reason of sex, but simply the common law, as interpreted by the highest judicial tribunal of the State of Illinois. She brought that before the Supreme Court of the United States. In their opinion the court concede that she is a citizen of the United States. It is true the majority say that on the face of the papers she was a citizen of the State of Illinois, and that therefore she could not be admitted in violation of the laws of the State of Illinois; because, being a citizen of the State of Illinois, she must look to the laws and constitution of Illinois for her protection, unless the fourteenth amendment made her a citizen of the United States independent of her citizenship of the State of Illinois, and that she would thereby be entitled to admission; and yet they determined distinctly, the majority of the court agreeing with the Slaughter-house case decision and referring to that decision, that it was a subject of legislation over which the Federal Government has no power; and that the right of practicing at the bar in a State court was a right appertaining not by virtue of citizenship of the United States, nor indeed, say the court, by virtue of citizenship at all, because there is no reason why an alien may not be admitted to the bar, but it was not one of those rights which were conferred by virtue of citizenship of the United States. Therefore, while we admit you to be a citizen of the United States and a citizen of the State of Illinois, we cannot override the decision of the State of Illinois, which prohibits your admission.

Mr. President, can it be seriously argued that where a State has a right to prevent a citizen from entering into an office or an avenue of labor, it cannot make police regulations in regard to theaters, houses of amusement, and public inns? Is it possible that you can deny to a citizen a lucrative profession or trade, and yet that you cannot deny to him the simple pleasure of an admission into a house of amusement? The one may affect your power for good in the accumulation of wealth, nay in the support of life itself, and the other be merely the gratification of your taste or the gratification of a desire.

I submit, how can it be argued under these different decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States that there is even the shadow of a pretext that the provisions of this bill are not in conflict with the Constitution? It is not every injury that can be redressed by the Federal Government; it is not every wrong that may be righted by the Federal Government; for if that were so, there would be no necessity for the State governments; they would be an expense without any corresponding benefit.

Before the passage of the fourteenth amendment if a soldier in time of peace had crossed the border line of the District of Columbia, had crossed the Potomac River and been slain in open day, there was no power in the Federal Government to have tried his murderer. There was no power in the Federal Government to have provided for the trial of his murderer certainly prior to the passage of the fourteenth amendment; and surely, in my opinion, not since the passage of the fourteenth amendment, for I do not think it affects the case. So would it have been if a citizen of the State of Virginia had passed into the District of Columbia and been slain, there was no power in the State of Virginia to have provided for the punishment of his slayer in the District of Columbia. The jurisdiction of the two governments was distinct. Life, liberty, and private property were dependent upon the local law, unless within those places where exclusive jurisdiction was given to the United States. If the United States inherently and by virtue of its organization as a Government could protect the citizen's rights upon the soil of the State outside of those places where it had exclusive jurisdiction, what reason was there for an additional government for which there was no necessity, which accomplished no good, which gave no protection that was not given by the other and superior government? The Government of the United States was inaugurated for high and wise purposes. The States could not protect their citizens upon the high seas. They would have commanded little respect in the ports of the world as to the protection of their citizens; and therefore they formed a government which would command the respect of all the world in its foreign relations and protect the commerce of the country to enhance its glory in the eyes of the world; and, as has been so truthfully said by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BOGY,] to protect the liberty of the individual man. But, sir, as glorious and as strong as a centralized government may be, as much as it may command our respect and our pride, it fails to advance us as individual men and make us feel that as men we are free and entitled to command respect.

But, Mr. President, I have detained the Senate longer than I expected when I opened this discussion; and indeed what has been uttered has been uttered by me without preparation, and I am sorry to have been unable to discuss the question in a more concise and befitting manner.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I am fully aware of the unfavorable circumstances under which I rise to discuss this question. We have already been in session fully nine hours, and human nature cannot endure the fatigues of a continuous session for so long a period without feeling some degree of weariness, which in a measure disqualifies for a proper discussion of the subject under consideration. I am also aware that at this hour of the night, when every member of the Senate is exhausted, when there is no disposition to listen to debate, it is calculated to discourage and embarrass very considerably any one that may attempt to address the Senate.

Again, I have been an observer of what has been transpiring while this discussion has been proceeding, the discussion upon a question involving some of the dearest rights of the people of this country, and very frequently, as at present, only a few members of the dominant party are present. I will not say that they are absent, for the reason that they belong to that class of men who love "darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil." It may be that they do not wish to listen to the exposure of this measure, which a party caucus has decreed shall become a law, or perhaps they are taking their repose. So far as I am concerned, I say to them sleep on; take your rest now; there is coming a day when the American people will hold you and your party to a strict responsibility for present indifference to their wishes, and for the great wrong you propose by this bill to inflict upon them.

Mr. President, on a former occasion, when a measure very similar in its provisions to the bill now before the Senate was under consideration, I took occasion to state some of the objections which I had to its provisions; and perhaps that fact, together with the very embarrassing circumstances to which I have alluded under which I rise to address myself to this question, would justify me in giving upon this bill a silent vote; and yet, regarding this matter as one affecting the interests of the people whom I have the honor in part to represent, I can do nothing less than trespass on the patience of the Senate, for a few moments at least, while I state some of the objections that I think properly arise to the measure before the Senate.

Let me say that if the American people had not ceased to be astonished at anything that takes place in this Chamber or in the other House of Congress, they certainly would be very much surprised at the introduction of a proposition of this kind from one of the committees of this body. Whatever folly any individual member of the Senate may commit in the introduction and pressure of measures upon his own responsibility, it was not to be presumed that any committee of the Senate, especially the Judiciary Committee, heretofore regarded as the highest committee of the Senate, could have committed so grave a mistake as to bring forward a proposition so revolting to the sense and so injurious to the interests of the American people. What is this measure? Disguise it as you may, it is nothing more nor less than an attempt on the part of the American Congress to enforce association and companionship between the races in this country. The object of this bill is not to confer upon the colored race any political rights. The thirteenth, the fourteenth, and the fifteenth amendments have conferred political rights upon the colored people. The thirteenth amendment secured them against the bondage of slavery; the fourteenth amendment constituted them citizens of the United States, and the fifteenth amendment secured to them the right to the elective franchise. But this measure goes further. It proposes not, I say again, to confer any political rights upon the people of African descent, but it proposes to enforce familiarity, association, companionship between the white and the colored people of this country. Is not that true? If that is not the object and the purport and the intent of this measure, then I confess that I am incapable of understanding the force of the language used in the bill. Look at its provisions.

That all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of inns, public conveyances on land or water, theaters, and other places of public amusement; and also of common schools and public institutions of learning or benevolence supported in whole or in part by general taxation; and of cemeteries so supported, subject only to the conditions and limitations estab ished by law and applicable alike to citizens of every race and color, regardless f any previous condition of servitude.

That is the object of the bill. It proposes, so far as hotels are con cerned, that the white and the colored people shall have the same advantages, equal advantages; that they shall enter with equa. right into every part of the inn; that the keeper of the inn shall make no discrimination on account of their race or color; that colored men shall sit at the same table beside the white guest, that he shall enter the same parlor and take his seat beside the wife and daughters of the white man, whether the white man is willing or not, because you prohibit any discrimination against him. He is entitled, under the privileges of this bill, to go into every part of that hotel; he may not be excluded from any part thereof, even though a better separate place should be assigned him by the landlord. If the object was not to enforce companionship, why do you not permit in this bill the landlord to set apart a portion of his hotel, so that he might have one parlor for colored people and another parlor for white people, so that he might have one table for the colored man and another table for the white man, giving to one as good accommodations as to the other? Why is it that there is not a provision which allows that? Simply because, I say, the object and purpose of this bill is to force association and companionship between the races.

Is not that true of the theater? Do you not require that every facility, every advantage which the white man may have may be invaded by the colored man, that he may enter and have the same privileges—not privileges and accommodations assigned to him in a separate part of the theater, but the same privileges—that he may go wherever the white man goes; he may go wherever the white lady goes; no one shall discriminate and set apart one portion for colored people and another portion for white people? Why is it that you in this bill declare that there shall be no such discrimination? I repeat again, it is found only in the fact that you desire to enforce familiarity, association, and companionship between the races.

So, again, with your common schools and institutions of learning. Why is it under the provisions of this bill that you may not have separate schools? I am aware that some of the gentlemen who advocate this bill have said that it might be so, but I am equally aware that the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] declared that it might not be so, and my own interpretation of the provisions of this bill is that there is no authority under it to make any assignment for colored schools and for white schools, but that every colored child under the provisions of this bill has the right to enter into the white school though there may be a better school provided for the colored people.

I ask what is the reason of this provision? I maintain that no reason can be found other than the fact that the friends and supporters of this bill desire to enforce the intermixture, the association, and companionship between the races. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] has been the only consistent republican Senator who has uttered his sentiments on this bill. While I do not think that the enunciation of the views and sentiments which he advanced yesterday was such as does him any credit, yet I think that he has been perfectly consistent in carrying to its logical consequences the doctrine of his party as contained in this bill. What did he say? I want the sentiments uttered by that Senator to go forth to the country, and for that purpose I intend that they shall be incorporated in my own speech as his sentiments in order that those in my own State who may see what I say on this subject may also see what is the position of a leading republican Senator on this floor in reference to the rights and to the object of this enforcement of association in the schools of the country. And in order that I may not misrepresent anything that was said by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, I will read from the RECORD what he did say:

> The public school is an epitome of life, and in it children are taught so that they understand those relations and conditions of life which, if not acquired in childhood and youth, are not likely afterward to be gained. To say, as is the construction placed upon so much of this bill as I propose to strike out, that equal facilities shall be given in different schools, is to rob your system of public instruction of that quality by which our people, without regard to race or color, shall be assimilated in ideas, personal, political, and public, so that when they arrive at the period of manhood they shall act together upon public questions with ideas formed under the same influences and directed to the same general results; and therefore, I say, if it were possible, as in the large cities it is possible, to establish separate schools for black children and for white children, it is in the highest degree inexpedient to either establish or tolerate such schools.
> The theory of human equality cannot be taught in families, taking into account the different conditions of the different members and the families composing human society; but in the public school, where children of all classes and conditions are brought together, this doctrine of human equality can be taught, and it is the chief means of securing the perpetuity of republican institutions. And inasmuch as we have in this country four million colored people, I assume that it is a public duty that they and the white people of the country, with whom they are to be associated in political and public affairs, shall be assimilated and made one in the fundamental idea of human equality. Therefore, where it would be possible to establish distinct schools, I am against it as a matter of public policy.
> But throughout the larger part of the South it is not possible to establish separate schools for black children and for white children, that will furnish means of education suited to the wants of either class; and therefore in all that region of country it is a necessity that the schools shall be mixed, in order that they shall be of sufficient size to make them useful in the highest degree; and it is also important that they should be mixed schools, in order that the prejudice which now pervades portions of our people shall be rooted out by the power of general taxation.

And here I will remark that that is a very singular way of rooting out prejudice, by the power of general taxation. I did not know you could tax prejudice out of a man. You might perhaps inculcate it in that way. The taxing power has been used for various purposes, used beyond its legitimate purpose in many instances, as I believe, in this country; but when you attempt to apply the taxing power until a man's prejudices shall subside, I think you go further than has been done in this or any other country in the exercise of the taxing power.

I have read thus much of the speech of the honorable Senator for the purpose of showing what is the animus, what is the intent, what is the desire, of the republican party, of which he is a distinguished leader, that there shall be an assimilation of ideas, and that the children are to be forced into the same school in order that their ideas and views and opinions may become one.

Now, Mr. President, I must be permitted to say, while the Senator from Massachusetts was frank enough to avow the purpose and object of this bill, he knows, as every Senator on this floor who favors the bill knows, that the only effect and operation of it is to be had upon the poorer classes in this country, who are dependent upon common schools. While that Senator and the Senators who support this bill advocate mixed schools, and insist that it is the right of the colored man to send his children to the same school with the white man, there is not one of them—I repeat in the presence of Senators, there is not one of them—who will send his children to any such mixed school. They will select their schools. Ah, sir, fortune has favored them, and they are able to select their schools and send their children to them and pay for their tuition; but the humble poor man—the sons of toil who labor to support their families—the men who have no fortunes, but are dependent upon their industry for their bread—the men who cannot be elected Senators of the United States, the men who are in humble life—it is against them and their children that the provisions of this bill are directed. We had as well deal frankly with this question. I know full well that in no section of this country are mixed common schools patronized by gentlemen of fortune. They select their schools, and Senators know full well that if this bill goes into operation it will not affect their children, while they are avowing their purpose to force the mixed schools whereby the children of the poor white men may be compelled to be educated in associations with the colored children or not educated at all. Sir, this flimsy gauze cannot and will not hide the objects of this bill. The poor people of this country will see, as readily as any of us, that this bill in its details, so far as it is directed to institutions of learning and the common schools of the country, is aimed at them and is not aimed at gentlemen who have fortunes and can educate their children in select schools, and academies, and colleges.

The white men of the country will not only see but will resent this insult to their feelings, this unjustifiable attempt to degrade them and their children to the level of the colored race by compelling their offspring to associate in mixed schools with negro children. They love their children as dearly as the man of wealth loves his, and have as sincere a desire to see them respectable and happy. I repeat they will and ought to resent this insult and wrong attempted to be inflicted upon them and their families.

Mr. President, I have no unkind feeling to the colored people. On the contrary, without boasting of any particular friendship for them, I have never yet seen a human being, white or black, in distress whose sufferings I would not relieve if I could. I have been as kind to the colored people with whom I have been brought in contact as other gentlemen. I have defended them at the bar against the gravest charges when they needed counsel; and, sir, under any circumstances of life I would be as kind to the colored people as any one. Therefore in what I have to say against the mixed schools, I wish no one to understand that I cherish the least unkind feeling toward any colored man or any living being on earth. I would promote his interests in every proper way. By advice and by other means I would assist him in the progress and advance of life; but I have some respect also for my own race, and when you ask me to aid in the passage of a bill which I know is not only to injure, if it does not destroy, the common schools of the white people, but which I am satisfied will injure the colored schools scattered throughout the States, I am compelled to decline your invitation and to express my objection to the bill, and shall do so with a sincere desire to promote the best interests of both races, acknowledging, however, a higher regard for my own race than any other.

But, Mr. President, the provisions of this bill do not stop with the common schools. It is to apply to all benevolent institutions. Now, sir, there are benevolent institutions in this land into which white persons and colored persons can go, and in all those institutions separate arrangements are made so that the one shall not be brought in contact with the other. In many of your hospitals and in your almshouses those arrangements exist. This bill proposes not only that you shall have association and companionship in taverns, in theaters, in the common schools, in the institutions of learning, but even the home which is prepared for the old and infirm, the common almshouse and the home for the indigent and poor. When the old matron, unable to support herself, is compelled to accept the charities of the public and seeks a home in the common almshouse, the provisions of this bill consign her to the same apartments that are assigned to colored people. Through life she may have maintained a separate and distinct existence from them; she may not have been their associate at all; but when she comes in her advanced age and in her misfortune to be supported by the hand of charity, you propose to follow her into the very almshouse of the country; you propose to make the old man and the old woman of the Caucasian race the companions of negroes, with whom they have never associated in life, if compelled to spend the evening of their days in the almshouse. Not only unfortunate old age but helpless and afflicted infancy is not exempt. The orphan asylum where charitable ladies gather the unprotected and helpless children that they may administer to their comfort, if supported in whole or in part by taxation, is brought within the terms of this bill. Even there you admit of no discrimination, no separate apartments, but compel the association of the white children with the colored that are taken there by their friends.

Do not say that you can make any separate arrangement under the provisions of this bill. The object and purport of the measure is to have association in all these places, in the hospital and in the almshouse, everywhere. Companionship and association are the great object sought to be accomplished. You admit of no discrimination, but prohibit it by pains and penalties.

But, Mr. President, without dwelling longer upon this point, let me ask where does the Congress of the United States get the power, the authority, to enact any such law? The constitutional amendments have been appealed to. Prior to the adoption of those amendments no Senator on this floor would have contended that there was anything in the Constitution that would warrant such legislation. By universal consent prior to the adoption of the recent amendments the States had the right to make any laws recognizing distinctions between the races. It is therefore only under the amendments to the Constitution that this power is claimed.

What are those amendments? No one will contend that the thirteenth amendment, which simply prohibited slavery or involuntary servitude in this country, confers any power upon Congress to enact this bill. No one will contend that the fifteenth amendment, which simply confers the elective franchise upon the colored people, confers upon Congress the authority to enact this bill. It is therefore the fourteenth amendment, and that alone, under which the power to enact this proposed law is derived, if it can be derived at all. What was the purport and intent of that amendment of the Constitution? The Supreme Court have said in the very Slaughter-house case which has been brought here in support of this bill that the primary object and purport and intent of that amendment was to confer citizenship upon the colored race, to make them citizens of the United States. That it accomplished that purpose no one questions; but that it does not warrant this legislation is a proposition which I think it is not hard to demonstrate both from argument and from authority. But I will not trespass upon the time of the Senate by reasoning upon this subject abstractly, because the matter is res adjudicata. The Supreme Court have passed upon the true intent and purport of the fourteenth amendment. In the Slaughter-house case for the first time that amendment came in review before that court. What said the court? After stating the object of that amendment to be to confer the right of citizenship upon the colored people, distinguishing between the citizenship of the United States and State citizenship, they went on to define what were the rights of citizenship created by the amendment, and then declared that the rights of citizenship of the State as contradistinguished from citizenship of the United States might be regulated—that is the substance of it—by the State; and that such regulation was no infringement of the fourteenth article of the Constitution. That part of the decision was read the other day by the distinguished Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] but it ought to be repeated in every speech made on this subject, because the country ought to understand from the judicial decisions and determination of the Supreme Court what is the true object, what is the true purport and meaning, of the various recent amendments to the Constitution, and for that reason and to show the utter want of authority for this bill, notwithstanding it was read and commented upon by the distinguished Senator from Ohio the other day in his unanswerable argument against this bill, I shall take occasion to read a part of it again. The court say:

> Was it the purpose of the fourteenth amendment, by the simple declaration that no State should make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, to transfer the security and protection of all the civil rights, which we have mentioned, from the States to the Federal Government? And where it is declared that Congress shall have the power to enforce that article, was it intended to bring within the power of Congress the entire domain of civil rights heretofore belonging exclusively to the States? All this and more must follow, if the proposition of the plaintiffs in error be sound. For not only are these rights subject to the control of Congress whenever in its discretion any of them are supposed to be abridged by State legislation, but that body may also pass laws in advance, limiting and restricting the exercise of legislative power by the States, in their most ordinary and usual functions, as in its judgment it may think proper on all such subjects. And still further, such a construction followed by the reversal of the judgments of the supreme court of Louisiana in these cases, would constitute this court a perpetual censor upon all legislation of the States, on the civil rights of their own citizens, with authority to nullify such as it did not approve as consistent with those rights, as they existed at the time of the adoption of this amendment. The argument we admit is not always the most conclusive which is drawn from the consequences urged against the adoption of a particular construction of an instrument. But when, as in the case before us, these consequences are so serious, so far-reaching and pervading, so great a departure from the structure and spirit of our institutions; when the effect is to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress, in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character; when in fact it radically changes the whole theory of the relations of the State and Federal governments to each other and of both these governments to the people, the argument has a force that is irresistible, in the absence of language which expresses such a purpose too clearly to admit of doubt.
> We are convinced that no such results were intended by the Congress which proposed these amendments, nor by the Legislatures of the States which ratified them.

It will be seen from this extract from the opinion of the court in the Slaughter-house case that the fourteenth amendment does not destroy the right of the States over their own citizens, and was intended only to guard such rights as arise out of citizenship of the United States conferred by that amendment, leaving to the States control over such subjects as appertain to the rights of the people as citizens of the States. This position was not controverted by the dissenting justices, who differed in the application of the police powers of the State to the particular statute of Louisiana under review; on the contrary, they insist that the fourteenth amendment does not impair those rights, but that they still remain vested indefeasibly in the States, and this opinion is repeated at the present term of the court by one of the dissenting judges in the Slaughter-house case, who, apparently from the apprehension that his views might be misunderstood on that subject, took occasion to express himself very clearly in reference to that matter. I read from the opinion of Justice Field concurring in the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Bartemeyer vs. The State of Iowa:

> No one—
> Says the judge—
> has ever pretended, that I am aware of, that the fourteenth amendment interferes in any respect with the police power of the State. Certainly no one who desires to give to that amendment its legitimate operation has ever asserted for it any such effect. It was not adopted for any such purpose. The judges who dissented from the opinion of the majority of the court in the Slaughter-house cases never contended for any such position. But, on the contrary, they recognized the power of the State in its fullest extent, observing that it embraced all regulations affecting the health, good order, morals, peace, and safety of society, that all sorts of restrictions and burdens were imposed under it, and that when these were not in conflict with any constitutional prohibition or fundamental principles, they could not be successfully assailed in a judicial tribunal.

With these views expressed so clearly not only by the majority of the court in the Slaughter-house case, but by the dissenting judges in that case, I am at a loss to know how any legal mind in this body can claim to find within the fourteenth amendment or within any clause of the Constitution the authority for this proposed enactment.

I may have misunderstood the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] this morning, and I may have misunderstood the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] the other day; but their language fell upon my ear as if there was an intimation on their part that in reference to this subject the courts had no jurisdiction to review the action of Congress; that, under the exercise of the powers conferred by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, Congress was the final judge and that its action could not be reviewed. I am not repeating the language, but I am giving what was the impression made upon my mind from the language which fell from the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin to-day as well as from the Senator from Indiana the other day.

Sir, has it come to this? Has the judicial department of this Government no authority to review any enactment under any provision of the Constitution and to pronounce it void, if in the judgment of the court the enactment is void because in conflict with the provisions of the Constitution? Has it come to this, that judicial power is to be claimed for Congress and that the decisions here made are not subject to review in the Federal courts? I say I may have misinterpreted the language of the two distinguished Senators to whom I have referred, but I have stated what the impression from the language used was upon my own mind. I will not say that that language ought to have conveyed that impression, but I believe now, as I thought then, that that was the intimation. I have not had a chance to look at those speeches. One was made to-day, and the other is not in print.

Now, Mr. President, I have spoken of what I believe to be a want of power in Congress to enact this bill. Then why is it proposed? What is the object, the motive for its enactment? I know that Senators disclaim any party considerations actuating them in enacting this proposed statute; and if I were to concede to the members of the majority party who have decreed that this bill shall be passed into a law the most honest, patriotic, and philanthropic motives that could influence the action of human kind, still I ask would the motive alone, however pure, justify the action? Can the motive for any act determine the quality of the act? I believe it is sound in political and moral ethics that the motive is only one of the ingredients that can determine the moral character or the wisdom or the impolicy of a measure. It is to be judged not only by the motive that prompts it, but the circumstances under which the act is performed as well as from the consequences to result from the act; and therefore if I were to concede to Senators on the other side all they claim—that their motive is pure, patriotic, philanthropic, and charitable—yet the circumstances under which it is proposed to enact this law, the means taken to enforce social equality, affiliation, companionship, and association between the races are so repugnant to the feelings of the white people of this country, that that fact alone must condemn it. Without going at present into the consequences to result from this measure even if I were to concede the purest motives to those who favor it and urge its passage, still, I repeat, the circumstances under which they propose the enactment of this law are well calculated to condemn it in the judgment of the American people.

But, sir, with all my charity, and with all the disclaimers that can be made or that have been made in reference to the object and purpose of this bill, I think there are other reasons for this measure than the mere patriotic, charitable, friendly, kindly feeling of gentlemen on the other side to the colored race. Sir, I am sorry to be compelled to say that I believe it in part emanates from antipathy, from hostility, from opposition to the people with whom the Northern States were lately in conflict. Am I not justified in uttering that sentiment? What do we hear upon the floor of the Senate; what do we read in the papers of the country? Why, sir, no longer than the last Sabbath evening I went to the other Hall to attend the anniversary of the American Bible Society. A distinguished doctor of divinity, in addressing the American Bible Society, which spreads its benevolent and beneficent influences over this whole land as well as over foreign lands, supported by the contributions of persons from every section of the country, on that occasion, on the Sabbath day, in the presence of men devoted to the promulgation of Christianity and the doctrines of the Bible throughout the world without reference to any political or religious tenets, offered a direct insult to every southern gentleman who was there. Some of them left the House. I know that at least one officer of that society regretted it. I know that many persons deplored that upon an occasion of that kind the feelings of hostility and animosity that exist should have been manifested. I refer to this instance to show the feeling that still exists in some portions of the country toward the southern people.

Now, I do not say that that gentleman meant to insult anybody, but it has become the common language of his section to speak of "rebels" and "traitors," to speak in terms of opprobrium, in terms of opposition to the southern people, and, perhaps unconscious that he might wound the feelings of anybody or that he might do harm to the cause he was advocating, he was simply uttering the language to which he was accustomed.

Have we not heard similar language in this Hall? Have we not seen evidences of animosity, not to say hatred, to the South in this Chamber? Have we not heard language in debate that justifies us in saying that there is still lingering a feeling of opposition, a desire to oppress the men with whom you were lately in conflict? And am I not justified in saying from what I have heard and seen that a part of the motive which prompts this measure, which must afflict, and afflict most grievously, the people in all the States where any large portion of the population consists of the colored race, is a desire to punish, or at least an indifference to the interests, the wishes, and the desires of the people in the late slaveholding States? No one I presume will deny that I am justified in saying that, in part, it emanates from a desire to conciliate the colored voters. The majority party in this country made them voters and claim their allegiance as party allies. They have had their support in the past, and so far as I am concerned they are welcome to it. Hereafter I want the colored people to vote for the party of their choice. I certainly shall not try, so far as I am concerned, to wean them from their first love. But am I not justified in saying that this measure is brought forward as a measure to bind them in irrevocable bonds to the republican party? I need not travel out of the debates on this measure to find that the object is to please the colored people by Senators who apparently are indifferent to the wants of the white people. The argument is brought forward here that the colored people demand it, and in listening to this debate you would think that their wishes and their desires were all that were to be gratified. The Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] in his speech opening this debate, stated that—

> The colored citizens ask this legislation, not because they seek to force themselves into associations with the whites, but because they have their pride and emulation among themselves.

He states the true ground of the action of the majority on this bill—the colored people demand it. That is one of the reasons why this bill is to be enacted into a law. White men are not consulted. You hear nothing of white men demanding this law. It is the colored men that are referred to as demanding its enactment in all the debates upon this question; and therefore I have a right to presume that one and the principal consideration for the passage of this law is the gratification of the colored voters, that they may continue in the future as they have in the past to vote the republican ticket. You have no right to afflict the white people of this country in order to make party capital and secure forever the negro vote; and I deplore and regret that legislation of that kind should be had in the American Senate. You are welcome to the negro vote, but do not so seriously afflict your own race to retain it.

Now, Mr. President, I propose to speak for a short time upon what I apprehend will be the effects of this bill; and, first, what will be its effect upon hotels and theaters? I ask can any man suppose that its effect will not be to depreciate the property of landlords and lessees of hotels and theaters? Do you suppose that white men will be compelled by your enactment to associate contrary to their wishes with any persons? I tell you, sirs, you cannot do it. The white people of this country know how to protect themselves, and will do it, despite the legislation of Congress. But it may work injury to the innkeeper and to the owner or lessee of the theater; it may depreciate their property, as doubtless it will, and render their occupation unprofitable; it will render the home of the traveler too uncomfortable to be compelled to associate with those he does not desire to associate with in hotels, and he will seek private entertainment; it will expel from places of amusement many who go there for recreation and pleasure, and as a consequence the property of those gentlemen will be greatly depreciated.

Sir, there are some persons I admit in this country that may accept the situation and the doctrines of this bill. There are in this country three classes, I believe, that are willing to associate with colored people. The first is a class of misguided, fanatical gentlemen who suppose that by association with the colored people they may better their condition. I do not believe any such thing; but these gentlemen may believe it, and they are willing to make a sacrifice of themselves in order that they may accomplish a good to the colored race. Of that class there are but few. Then there is another class. There is that class of mankind who have lost their own self-respect by indulgence in vice, or by the commission of crime. That class of persons, conscious in their own bosoms of their own self-degradation, may be willing to accept and practice the doctrines of this bill; but, sir, if those men had not forfeited their own self-respect, they would still maintain the position which nature has assigned them, that fellowship and companionship alone with the race to which they belong, refusing utterly that association and that companionship which are sought to be enforced by the provisions of this proposed law.

Sir, if there is any class of mankind that deserves pity, that deserves commiseration, it is those men who from indulgence in vice have lost their own self-respect. While ever a man can hold up his head among his fellow-men and feel that he is a man, neither poverty nor adverse circumstances can affect his real dignity. He knows, though he be in the depths of poverty, while he is maintaining his own self-respect he is a man. He may be banished from the halls of the great because he is not in the same social circle; but still around his fireside with the companion of his life and with the children that he loves, and loves as dearly as any, he feels that he is one of nature's noblemen and will scorn the association you propose for him in this measure. That class of men who have forfeited that self-respect, may, I say, accept the situation and agree to associate not only in theaters and in hotels, but everywhere else, and they may be proud even of the association. There is also another class of persons, namely, corrupt politicians, who for partisan purposes alone, for the purpose of securing the vote of the colored man, may be willing to associate with him in political meetings and in other places, having no real respect for the negro, but desiring in his heart all the time to profit by his vote. Those men may accept the situation; but after you have exhausted these three classes of men to whom I have referred you will find no others. There is something implanted in the bosom of the white man that tells him not to treat with disrespect the colored man, not to treat him with indignity, not to offend him unnecessarily in any respect, but to preserve himself from contact as an equal with the colored man or with any other distinct race of people. The Anglo-Saxon would not associate willingly as a general thing with Chinese or Japanese. He would preserve his identity with his own race, not because he had any unkind feelings for the colored people or the people of other races, but because he desired to maintain uncontaminated and distinct the race to which he belonged; it is the behest, the instinct of nature. I apprehend that something of that feeling prevails in the colored race too; that they desire, at least the most intelligent and respectable of that race desire to preserve in its purity their own race, and to associate with the white people only so far as they can derive advantage and credit from such association.

But in this argument we have been told that this is all prejudice. The Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] the other day, in discussing one of the provisions of this bill which imposes penalties, spoke of the feeling to which I have referred as a paltry hate, as a prejudice which had been trampled out in blood. Suppose it is prejudice; suppose it is nothing but prejudice; what are the teachings of history? Do men not cling with undying tenacity to prejudice? Why, sir, all history attests that men will die for their prejudices. But, sir, I deny that the unwillingness to associate as equals with colored people is prejudice. There may be prejudice in vulgar minds, but I contend that the desire to preserve in its purity the race to which we belong is not prejudice, but it is the implantation of the Divine Author of our being, and wisely intended to preserve the distinctive character of the race to which we belong. Call it prejudice if you please; it exists, and I hope and trust it may forever exist. It is the only security which you have against the dire consequences which would result from its abolition; I mean the intermixture and amalgamation of races. Destroy it, blot it out "in blood" or in any other way, and I ask you where is the guarantee against the intermarriage and amalgamation of races? If you train up the white and colored children in the same schools, as is desired by the Senator from Massachusetts, and assimilate them in ideas, assimilate them in feeling, assimilate them in views, where is the guarantee that children thus assimilated in ideas and views will not be brought into closer relations in marriage, and that the amalgamation of races will not follow?

Sir, Senators who advocate this measure may perhaps be unwilling to contemplate the consequences of their own doctrines when they are depicted. They may not be willing to accept them; but I ask again whenever the desire to keep apart and separate the different races in this country has been destroyed and perfect assimilation of mind and feeling and thoughts and ideas has come about, where, I ask again, is the guarantee against the consequences to which I have referred? I hope that the colored people of this country will ever keep their race separate and distinct, as God created it, and that the proud race to which I belong may never forfeit the high position assigned it among the people of the earth nor impede its onward progress in civilization by assimilating its destiny with that of any other distinct and separate race in this country or in the world.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] the other day, in opening the discussion, stated what I will read, for I have his words here, and I noted them at the time:

> This bill when enacted, it is believed, will be a finality, removing from legislation, from politics, and from society, an injurious agitation, and securing to every citizen that proud equality which our nation declares to be his right, and which is a boon in defense of which most men would die.

The Senator flatters himself that the enactment of this law is an end of agitation. I agree with the Senator that much evil agitation has been had. You agitated for the abolition of slavery. It has been accomplished, I hope never to be re-established. You agitated for political rights. Political rights have been secured. I am willing that they shall remain as they are, provided the experiment proves that the great interests of this country do not require its reversal. Much injurious agitation has been had, agitation which has caused much affliction and sorrow in the land, agitation which culminated in civil war and bloodshed and which resulted in the deprivation of rights to white men that were conceded to negroes, for it is a matter of history that while you conferred the elective franchise in the Southern States upon the colored people you denied it to the large mass of the white people of that section of country. But let me say, sir, that the agitation which the Senator from New Jersey predicts will cease will not cease so soon as he may anticipate. This bill will touch the American people in a more sensitive part than all your previous legislation. You propose to interfere with their social and domestic relations. Under such legislation I hope they will prove restive and agitate in turn for its repeal and the reversal of the decree which makes this bill a law. Whatever in me lies will be contributed to aid that agitation. I hope the people of this country everywhere will denounce this measure and demand its repeal. I hope they will call upon their public servants who enact this law to assign the reasons for their action. Sir, this agitation will go on. It may be that it will go further than it ought to go, but I warn Senators that all history teaches that when improper measures have been pressed too far reaction sets in and you cannot control it; it is governed by no law and has no limits. For the sake of the colored people of the country no less than for the white race, I hope this matter will not be pressed to that verge when the undercurrent of a reactionary movement may roll back a wave of popular sentiment which will obliterate all that has been done to advance and promote the interests of the colored people in this country. No, sir; agitation will not cease, but will be promoted by this measure. Not the agitation arising from a desire to conciliate the colored race and secure their votes, but the agitation which demands greater respect for the rights and interests of the white people of this country.

Mr. President, what is the true character of this measure? I say, first, it is a matter of injustice. Northern Senators residing in communities where there are but few colored people, and who, therefore, are not to be affected by this measure, come into the Senate and by their legislation force upon the people in States where there are large colored populations a measure which will most grievously affect them Sir, if the provisions of this bill were to reach to the same extent the communities which they represent, they would not be here the advocates of the measure. They are here to press upon others that which they would not accept for themselves provided there were as many colored people in their States and communities as there are in the States in this Union which will be affected by this bill. It is therefore a measure of injustice, gross, flagrant injustice.

Sir, what are the facts? Are these Northern Senators and the constituencies they represent any more careful of the rights of other people than those in the former slaveholding States? How is it in Massachusetts to-day? Is everybody entitled to the elective franchise in Massachusetts? It was conferred on the colored race without any conditions, and yet I ask was it not the law in Massachusetts and is it not the case still that a man in order to vote in the city of Boston must be able to read the Bible? I have a letter now from a gentleman from Boston stating to me that that is the fact, and that he must be able to read it to the satisfaction of the clerk of the court, and that a thousand men in that city for that reason cannot vote.

How is it in Rhode Island? Why, sir, that State discriminates against foreign-born citizens and requires a property qualification of them which is not required of others. How is it in Connecticut? Under the law of that State every man must be registered before he can vote, and before he can be registered and qualified to vote he must prove that he can read. Here is the law. The voter "shall tell whether he is an alien or native born, and when he became twenty-one years of age, and before his admission to be registered he shall read at least one line of the Constitution or statutes in such manner as to show that he is not prompted and not reciting from memory." So that if a man has been unfortunate and unable to acquire any education you discriminate against him in the State of Connecticut and in the State of Massachusetts and do not permit his registration and qualification as an elector; and yet those who represent those sections of the country, under the plea of justice to the negro, come here to enforce upon the States having a large colored population measures which they would not accept for themselves if similarly situated, and which they know will be unjust to white people of those States.

It is not only a measure of injustice, it is a measure of inhumanity. What will it do? It will break up the schools in the States. Even the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] said this morning he was afraid it might have that effect. Why, sir, the public judgment of the people of the States will compel their Legislatures to abolish the school system, and then alike the free schools for white and for colored will be abolished, and, in that view of it, this measure is a measure of inhumanity—of inhumanity not only to the poor white people who are dependent upon public schools, but it is a measure of inhumanity to the colored people, who are not able to maintain schools sufficient to educate all their children.

The people in the Southern States are doing liberal things for the education of the colored people. The recent Legislature of Maryland appropriated $100,000 exclusively to colored schools in that State. That is about equal to $5,000 to each county in the State to maintain colored schools. Does any man suppose that with this law upon the statute-book, when the white and colored pupils are compelled to mix in schools, the people of Maryland will make such liberal provision for the education of the colored people? No, sir. The white people of Maryland, the most of them, can educate their children at select schools, and they will do it. I know that that will be the case in the State which I have the honor in part to represent; and I say here that, sooner than see mixed schools in the State of Delaware, I would be glad to see the Legislature destroy the common-school system in the State.

The Senator from Indiana farthest from me, [Mr. PRATT,] as well as the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] said that this measure is demanded by the colored people. If this legislation is in obedience to their behests, if they are not willing that the white people shall make provision for them in their own way, but demand to be forced into the white schools, then I say upon them must fall the consequences. I deplore the consequences to result from this measure, but I would not willingly see the white children of the State in which I live compelled to go to mixed schools. It would be the poor men alone who would be compelled to send their children to such schools. Men who are able in my State now maintain a large number of select schools notwithstanding we have a good common-school system. Those who now patronize the common schools will forego their advantages sooner than see their children compelled to associate with colored boys and girls.

When this law is passed, if you think to force association and companionship on the poor men and the children of the poor men in the common schools you were never more mistaken. If there is any prejudice anywhere it will be found in that class, and they will be the last men to submit to the practical operations of this legislation.

Mr. President, in all I have said on this subject I disclaim the least unkind feeling to any colored human being. I believe that the best interests of the colored race as of the white race in this country require that this bill should be defeated. I believe that the interest of every one, white and black, requires that the bill should not become a law, and hence I have opposed it with such arguments as I could command at this late hour of the night after being perfectly exhausted with the labors of the day.

There is one consequence to which I have not alluded which I shall most seriously deprecate. It may be that this measure will engender unkind feelings on the part of the white people toward the colored people. There is no question but what in some sections of the country unkind feeling has been instilled by white men without principle into the minds of the colored people against the white race who have no unkind feeling toward them. But if you press this matter too far, when the white men now dependent upon free schools find that their children are driven from the school, when they find that the school system of their States is broken up, it may engender a feeling of dislike that I should be sorry to see kindled in the breast of any class of men. The colored people need our commiseration, our pity. We ought to do nothing that shall rob them of it; but I fear that this proposed legislation will have the effect which I now speak of. I shall be sorry to see it, and I warn Senators, those who live in States that are not to be affected by this legislation, that a very different state of feeling does exist and will exist in reference to mixed schools in those States having large negro populations, and it may be that when this hostile legislation to their interests is forced upon them a feeling of dislike will be kindled which will not inure to the benefit of the colored race. I should deplore and regret it and would do all in my power to avert and to suppress any such rising feeling, but I speak of it as one of the consequences which may probably result from this measure.

Mr. President, I have stated my views on this measure frankly and candidly, prompted by no other consideration than a desire to see the best interests of both races promoted. If I was governed by any party consideration the sooner you enacted this law the better I would like it. I do not profess to be able to see into the future, but I know something of the feelings and the sentiments of the people with whom I live. I know something at least of human nature, and I predict that this legislation will work no injury to the party to which I belong; but I trust that in the consideration of a grave question like this, I could not be so lost to my sense of duty to the country as to be governed by party considerations. I should despise myself if I could believe that any mere desire to advance the political interests of the party to which I belong could prompt me in the presentation of view on this subject in opposition to my convictions. If I was governed by party feeling, I repeat, the sooner you enacted this bill into a law the better. I desire to see the happiness of all the people of this country promoted. I desire to see peace and concord reign throughout our borders. I desire to see the advancement of both races until they have reached their respective destinies. I desire to see the interest of the colored man and the interest of the white man both promoted; but I believe that this legislation will not have that effect.

Now, Mr. President, I shall leave the discussion of this question. I know that the fiat has gone forth, the decree is already registered that this is to become the law of the land. In every proper way I shall seek its reversal; and if the party to which I belong shall come to be in the ascendant in this Chamber and the other end of the Capitol, it will be one of the proudest acts of my life, if I am permitted to be here, to move the repeal of the statute which you now propose to pass.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, an imperious and controlling majority have no right to do wrong. It is true majorities like individuals have physical power to accomplish an end that they have no right to accomplish. When they exercise that power in an unlawful way and for an illegitimate purpose, it is a prostitution of it and a crime.

Now, sir, by the tenor and by the spirit of the Constitution of this country, by the rules and the practices of this body, every one of its members has a right to express his opinions under circumstances of fairness, an opportunity to himself and the Senate upon the commonest question that comes before it. If that is true in reference to questions of small moment, how strong must be the right of every member of the Senate to express his views upon questions of the most solemn moment, upon such questions as those presented by the pending bill are conceded to be. I say to the Senate and I say to the country that I do most sincerely desire to address myself to the question of the power of the Senate to pass this bill, as well as to the propriety and expediency of passing it. And I say further that I am sincerely and anxiously desirous of a just and fair opportunity to express my opinions, not only for the benefit of the Senate, (for whether they shall have great weight or small here, I have a right to express them,) but for the benefit of the country as well. Perhaps arguments coming from one so humble as myself and so young in this body may strike some judgments and produce a result different from what would take place if we should take the vote presently. At all events, I repeat, I have a right to be heard and to be heard under circumstances of fairness and justice to me as well as to the Senate and to the country, whose servant I am, standing in this high place. But, sir, this despotic majority have said by the command of a factious caucus, to use a slang phrase, that the American Senate shall sit it out till the vote is taken, nolens volens. I undertake to say that that is monstrous and insulting to the American people. I have not had an opportunity to be heard. There are other Senators who have not had an opportunity to be heard, and who desire to be heard at large upon this grave and solemn question, involving the integrity of the nation and the character of our country and its Constitution; and we are to be cut off from debate

Why, sir, this body has been sitting already to-day ten and a half hours, and many Senators present were engaged in committee an hour before the Senate met this morning; and yet this despotic majority, in pursuance of the command of a caucus, tell me that if I am to be heard upon this question after the exhaustion of this long sitting and after the Senate is exhausted, I shall go on and talk now a minute if I will, an hour or two hours if I can. Sir, I contend that that is wrong; I contend that it is criminal; and I protest against it in the presence of the Senate and in the presence of the American people. It is a virtual oppression of free speech by a dominant majority who have the physical power to accomplish an end that they have no right to accomplish.

Now, sir, I appeal to the Senate to get into a better humor, to become more senatorial, to become more American, to think of their Constitution a little, its policy and our rights under it, to reconsider their resolve, and to agree that we may adjourn now, and that I may occupy the floor to-morrow for the brief space of an hour in expressing some views that I wish to express in an orderly manner upon the pending bill; and therefore, Mr. President, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BUCKINGHAM in the chair.) The Senator from North Carolina moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, (at nine o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. NORWOOD. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. GORDON] is detained at home by sickness.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Goldthwaite, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Johnston, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Ransom, Saulsbury, Stockton, and Tipton—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Boreman, Boutwell, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Conover, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Sargent, Scott, Spencer, Stewart, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Brownlow, Cameron, Clayton, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Gordon, Hitchcock, Jones, Lewis, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Patterson, Schurz, Sherman, Sprague, Stevenson, Thurman, and Wadleigh—26.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KELLY. Before this vote is taken I desire to say a few words. I do not wish to prolong the discussion, because I know that it is determined that the vote must be taken to-night, and I have no particular complaint to make of this, as my brother from North Carolina has done. If I were in the majority, perhaps I would act in the same way; especially if I had a pet measure that I wished to put through; and therefore I will not complain of anything they do in this matter. Indeed, there is another reason why I am reconciled to it. It appears that the length of the session is determined; that is, a month hence we are to adjourn; and there is a great deal of legislation to be done, and therefore it is perhaps well enough that we should do what we can, even though we stay late at night; and yet upon so grave a constitutional question as this is I would much rather that we should have another day to discuss it. It is not every day that a question of this importance arises in the Senate, one that is so far-reaching in its consequences as this certainly will be. In matters of ordinary legislation I would not ask the Senate, if it desired to terminate the discussion of any topic, to prolong it; but I must confess in this case I do. I would rather the bill should go over until to-morrow or Monday, if we do not sit to-morrow; not that I wish any factious opposition to be made to the passage of the bill. I shall content myself, as I suppose all my brethren on this side will, with giving our votes against it and raising what protest we can against its passage. But there is no use in fighting fate. It is decreed, decreed I suppose by caucus, that the bill shall go through, that it shall become the law of the land. I must confess that I do not like that mode of determining grave questions of constitutional law, that a man's voice and vote shall be bound by the dictum of a caucus. I have an admiration for a man who upon questions of this kind can forget party, can rise above the action of those with whom he is associated, and I have a corresponding contempt for the decrees of a caucus to settle questions of this kind and say to every man, "You must vote so and so whatever your opinions may be."

So much for that. I do not propose to discuss this question at any length to-night. Indeed, it would be an unpardonable waste of time, now that it is decided the vote must take place, to go into a discussion and repeat matters that have already been presented to the Senate. I do not propose to discuss what may be the probable effects of the passage of this bill. Indeed, so far as any partisan advantage or disadvantage may come from it, I think it will result entirely to the advantage of the party to which I belong. I have no fears of the result. I think many Senators who now are swift in their advocacy of this measure, who think that they will reap rich rewards from it, will only find in the end that they have been digging their political graves. I may be mistaken. They think otherwise; I think differently from them. I think the coming elections in the fall will perhaps depend somewhat upon this very question of the centralizing tendencies of the General Government. I do not look upon it in the light that some do, that it is simply a question whether the negro shall go to the public schools or shall not go, whether he shall go to a public inn or shall not. I do not look at it in that light at all. That is a minor view; but the main point here that will attract the attention of the country is the centralizing disposition of the Federal Government to usurp and take away from the States rights which they have enjoyed since the formation of the Government; and that is the issue presented to the people at large.

As I said a while ago, I do not wish to repeat anything that has already been said. I wish to call the attention of the Senate simply to some matters of constitutional law. I care nothing about what the consequences of this act may be. They have been spoken of by other Senators. Whether it will have an evil tendency if the bill be passed, as I have no doubt it will be, whether it will destroy the public schools in the Southern or other States, I do not know; but gentlemen have referred to it who know more about it than I do. I leave that altogether and call attention to the constitutional question.

It is admitted, I believe by all Senators, both on this side and on the other, that prior to the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution there was no power whatever in Congress to legislate upon this subject, and that all the power of legislation is derived from two sections of the fourteenth article, section 1 and section 5 of the fourteenth article of amendment. The first is that—

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

That is coupled with a section which gives to Congress power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of the article. These I understand from the arguments which have been made are the powers which it is claimed authorize Congress to legislate on this subject. It seems to me very apparent, indeed I have no doubt so far as I am concerned myself that this clause is simply an inhibition upon the right of the States to legislate upon this subject, that it was intended that no State should make or enforce by its act, by its legislation, any law which should abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States. It is an inhibition on the States; and the fifth section, that "Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article," was simply giving the authority to Congress to make a case and present it so that it might be taken to the highest court of the United States by appeal from the State courts if there should be any attempt to enforce any obnoxious law of a State. It was intended simply to give the right of appeal, to make a case and transfer it from the courts of a State to the Federal courts to decide upon it; and that when the decision was made that would be a finality in the matter. It was supposed, I dare say, that the State courts have some virtue, some intelligence, and that if the United States courts decide the State law to be unconstitutional the State courts would bow to that decree. They have heretofore done it; and I do not see that their integrity should be questioned now.

It seems, however, that our republican friends place an entirely different construction upon this section. They claim that it is not simply an inhibition against State legislation, but that it gives Congress the affirmative power to legislate upon individuals and to enforce the rights that are supposed to be protected by punishing an individual for their infringement; in other words, that Congress can legislate upon the citizens throughout the United States in the same way that they may legislate for citizens who are within dock-yards, forts, arsenals, or wherever the United States may have exclusive jurisdiction, that the power of legislation in the one case is the same as in the other. I do not look at it so.

It is claimed that the right of every citizen of the United States to go to an inn, or to a public school, or to a theater, is a privilege and immunity; that it is embraced within those two words "privileges and immunities" of citizens of the United States; and therefore Congress has a right to protect these privileges and immunities. That has been a disputed point; but conceding it for the sake of the argument, let me go a little further. There is no question that a man's right to his property is a privilege; and he has a right and immunity from its destruction. So is his liberty, and so is his life; and indeed they are mentioned in this section, for it says: "No State shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." Now, I will put a question to our friends across the way, and especially I call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill, the honorable Senator from New Jersey, to it. If these are privileges and immunities, as unquestionably they are, then Congress has power to protect the life of a citizen, and to punish individuals who may take away the life of a man maliciously; Congress has the power to protect individuals in their property, and to punish for its theft; Congress has the right in case any person is deprived of his liberty and put in prison unlawfully to pass laws to protect that man in his liberty, and to punish any individual who may falsely imprison him or do so without just cause. There can be no escape from this; because if Congress has the power to punish for these minor infractions of law, unquestionably it can protect the privileges and immunities of citizens so far as their lives, their property, and their liberties are concerned. Any one can see that if that be so this Senate and the House of Representatives have the power now to pass a law to punish a man for committing murder, to punish a man for committing burglary, robbery, arson. Such acts are certainly an invasion of the right of an individual; and will it be contended—and I ask the Senator from New Jersey to explain whether this is so or whether it is not so—that Congress can pass a law to punish murder, to punish manslaughter, to punish arson, simply because any individual may be so far lost to his sense of duty as to commit a breach of the law in that respect? If we have a right to pass this bill, unqnestionably the whole subject of criminal legislation has been taken away from the States and conferred upon the Federal Government.

Now let us look at this bill. It proposes that a man shall be punished by a fine not less than $500 nor more than $1,000, and by an imprisonment not less than thirty days nor more than a year for simply depriving a person of the privilege of attending a public theater or of going to a common school; or in case a hotel-keeper refuses to allow another to sit down at his table whenever he may choose, he is liable to the penalty this law imposes. It is not confined to the African race, but if any citizen deprives him of the right to sit down at a public table or to claim to occupy a particular seat at the opera, he is liable to the penalties imposed by this bill.

Mr. CONKLING. If he does it by reason of race.

Mr. KELLY. No, I beg pardon, it is not on account of race; and if the Senator will read it carefully I think he will come to the conclusion that if one citizen deprives another of the privileges and immunities specified in the first section, he is to be punished so and so; it is not, as the Senator suggests, in case he shall do so on account of race. I maintain that under the provisions of this bill if one citizen deprives another white citizen of his right to sit down at a public inn he is liable to the penalties imposed. I maintain that a careful reading of the bill will show that that is so. Nay, more; it will reach so far as this: that if some thoughtless boy should annoy his fellow in school, or in an insulting way treat him as he ought not to do, he can be punished because he is a citizen of the United States and he can be visited with all the penalties imposed by this bill. It says that any person aiding, inciting, or abetting these acts shall be liable to the penalties of the bill. As I said, a school-boy who ought to be punished by his master's whip is liable to be seized by the marshal and taken out of school and tried in the district court of the United States and the penalty imposed. This bill will warrant that punishment.

Mr. President, if for these minor offenses such penalties can be imposed, what shall we say when a man steals another's property? Certainly this Congress is not going to allow the State governments that are so derelict in their duty, that have failed to perform those functions of government which have been assigned to them, to try the right to property, to punish a man for taking the property of another. This Congress that assumes jurisdiction over cases of this kind will surely protect a man in his right of property and life by imposing penalties on the wrong-doer. It would be an unpardonable wrong, it seems to me, if this great assembly, the Congress of the United States, should undertake to protect individuals in these minor rights, as to the manners of the table or a seat in an opera, and yet be forgetful of the right of the citizens to protection in their lives, their liberty, and their property, and intrust all that field to the State governments. Can it be possible that we are going to legislate on these matters, and yet be forgetful of the rights of the citizens in other respects? I think not.

I simply refer to this view of the power of Congress to protect citizens in their rights of property and life to show the absurdity of this rule of construction, because if the Federal Government has a right to punish in the one case it has in the other, and therefore a man may be tried and punished for taking another's life by depriving him of his privilege and immunity to life, and the penalty no doubt, if it is corresponding to this penalty, would be by execution at the hangman's hand. Failing to convict there, I ask could a State court try him a second time? Can a man be tried twice for the same offense? Certainly not. There is a constitutional provision that protects a man from a second trial for any and every offense.

Mr. President, this Government of ours is a divided sovereignty. The States when they formed the Federal Government ceded to it certain of their sovereign rights, retaining others. Wherever the States have a right to punish an offense, the Federal Government has not. Wherever the Federal Government has a right, it has been taken away from the States. Now, one thing is very certain; there can be no mistake about it: if the States have a right to punish for infractions of a law like this, the Federal Government has not. If on the other hand that right has been ceded, has been granted to the Federal Government, then the States have no right whatever to prosecute for the same offense. There can be no debatable ground, no divided sovereignty, no joint occupation of this legal domain. It either belongs to one sovereignty or the other, not to both. There is no such thing as concurrent jurisdiction in criminal cases. That is well settled now. Whatever concurrent jurisdiction there may be between the Federal and State governments in civil matters, so far as criminal jurisdiction is concerned, it either belongs to the States or to the Federal Government.

What, then, will be the result? Whenever such a bill as this is brought to the proper decision of the highest tribunal of the country, I have no fears of the result. But this is certain: if the Federal Government has a right to pass these laws and impose these penalties for refusing to permit any citizen of the United States to ride on any particular railway car, or to go to a theater, or to go to a common school, then all the laws that have been passed by the State governments to protect individuals in these respects amount to a nullity. The Senator from Mississippi said to-day that they had a more stringent law in that State than this is. I say it amounts to nothing; they cannot enforce that law there, and then have the Federal Government enforce it a second time. No man can be punished twice for the same offense, as I stated, and it is simply a question for the colored people whether they are willing to renounce the protection that their own States give them, where they can be tried in perhaps fifty or one hundred counties, where all these matters can be litigated at their own doors, or whether a single Federal court in a State shall have complete jurisdiction over them.

Take the case of the State of New Jersey, and I simply refer to it because the honorable Senator who reported the bill lives there. They have but one United States court there. If offenses of this kind are to be called from one extreme of the State of New Jersey to Trenton and there tried, let me ask what expectation can the people have that speedy and exact justice will be done? And yet that will be the upshot of this. The inevitable result must be, and the Supreme Court of the United States will so hold, that no man can be tried in the State courts and also in the Federal courts for the same offense. That is an impossibility. Either one court or the other must take jurisdiction; and when that jurisdiction is taken, that is an end of the matter. No State can punish for a breach of the post-office laws, for robbing the mail, for offering counterfeit money. This jurisdiction is given to the United States. The United States Government exercises exclusive jurisdiction over these offenses. No State can try them. No more has the United States a right to try for any of the crimes I mentioned a while ago—such as murder, robbery, arson, and the like in the States; but those crimes are punished by State legislation, for the simple reason that the States never granted to the Federal Government the right to punish them, and therefore they retain that right still and they retain it exclusively. As it was said a while ago by one of the Senators, before the fourteenth amendment no person would ever have thought that if a man had crossed the river from this District and gone into Virginia and committed murder, the murderer could be tried in the United States courts for that offense. That would be an offense which would belong exclusively to the State of Virginia to try and to punish the offender. So in cases of this kind.

Mr. President, these are the reasons why I deem the bill to be unconstitutional. It is not because I have any objection or hostility to the African race. I have not the least. I have ever treated them kindly, and I hope I ever shall. God forbid that I should ever raise my voice against the helpless and the poor. I wish them all success in their efforts to rise and be good citizens of the country in which they live; but it is not to be done by forced legislation of this kind. In due process of time all these prejudices may pass away. I have no doubt that legislation will only exasperate them and prevent that silent acquiescence of the community to give them every right, every privilege, that the white race now enjoys. I think the legislation that is now proposed will only be an injury to them. I have no doubt in my own mind that that will be the inevitable result. But, as I said, I have no hostility to them nor to their advancement, nor to anything that may conduce to their welfare or their happiness.

But the sole objection that I have to this bill is that it is an aggression on the part of the Federal Government upon the reserved rights of the States, and that if we can legislate upon this subject now, we can next year legislate so as to prevent one man from assailing another, one citizen from doing an injury to another by taking away his property. It will be simply a question of time. If we allow this first encroachment upon the reserved rights of the States, no one can tell where it will end. It will not depend upon the written Constitution of the country, but upon the simple will of Congress how far they will say that they have a right to go in protecting the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States by direct legislation under the clause which gives power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of the fourteenth article. I say there will be no limit to the jurisdiction of the United States Government. If Congress usurp jurisdiction in this case, if they punish offenses of this kind, it will be but the commencement of that usurpation which will draw all the criminal jurisdiction of the country into this great maelstrom, and you will legislate for thirty-seven States and nine Territories, and make the laws to punish for any infraction of rights in this chamber and in the Hall at the other end of the Capitol; and then, instead of having legislation at home, where every person can have not only the laws made at his door or near his home, but justice administered in the county where he lives, we shall have it administered in but one court in a State and that the Federal court, and every person must go to that court for the redress of his wrongs or to defend himself against unjust prosecution.

There was an intimation made here that legislation of this kind would have a tendency and that the result necessarily would be that the common schools in many of the States would be discontinued. It was said that the people would not submit to this dictatorial legislation of Congress, and that consequently the result would be that the public schools would cease to exist. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] who addressed the Senate this afternoon, as I understood him, seemed to intimate—I do not know whether it was intended as a threat—that if the States should deprive these citizens of the rights and privileges of the common schools, Congress would find some way to enforce these rights. I do not know whether I misunderstood him or not; but I suppose he meant that if the States should abolish the common schools, the Federal Government would undertake to coerce the people of the States, to levy taxes to support common schools, or perhaps acting upon this principle that they have a right to coerce individuals, Congress would pass a law compelling the States to levy a tax to support common schools within their limits. I do not know that any Senator has advocated that, but that will be I have no doubt the result in the end.

If the Southern States or any State in this Union, on account of the legislation which takes place here, on account of the passage of this law, shall destroy or take away the common schools from their citizens, I have no doubt that other Congresses more obsequious than this, courting the popular vote, will say that Congress has the right by appropriate legislation to guarantee the privilege and immunity of citizens to go to school, and that therefore it is incumbent upon Congress to pass some law authorizing the assessment and collection of taxes in the States for that purpose. It would certainly not be stranger than this kind of legislation. Indeed I do not see how any one with a legal mind or reasoning faculties can make the distinction that we have a right to say who shall attend public schools, and yet that we cannot say that they shall be supported in a certain way and enforce taxation for that purpose.

I can see what all this legislation tends to. It is to centralization. It is to that which the framers of the Constitution dreaded when it was first submitted for the approval of the States. We know that in the early days many of those thoughtful statesmen, when it was proposed to adopt the Federal Constitution, said, and said very truly, and they seem to have had the gift of prophecy, that the Federal Government would in the end usurp the reserved rights of the States, and destroy their liberty. How prophetic it has been! Step by step it goes on; year by year one right and another right is taken from States and vested in the Federal courts and in the first Federal Legislature. It is for this reason, and this only, that I have risen to protest, so far as my voice and so far as my vote will go, against this legislation. The other minor matters I care nothing about, because as I said, in my own judgment, on a careful reading of this bill it applies to the infringement of a white man's rights by another white man just as much as to depriving a negro of his rights by a white man. It applies to one citizen taking another's rights away; and as I said, so far as this matter is concerned, it is a mere nothing; it is a bagatelle. The great object that we ought all to have is to preserve that strict line of jurisdiction between the State and Federal Government which it was the object of the framers of the Constitution to continue.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. Let the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is to strike out the second section of the matter adopted by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole as a substitute for the original bill.

The Secretary read the second section.

Mr. TIPTON. I desire to say now, not knowing what may be the condition of my health when we vote, that on the final question I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. HITCHCOCK.] If he were here he would vote for the bill, and I should vote against it.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I most sincerly deplore the spirit manifested by the majority which requires this very important debate to be continued at this unseasonable hour.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will my friend permit me to interrupt him for a minute?

Mr. MERRIMON. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understood that when I was out a few minutes ago the Senator criticised with great severity the majority of the Senate as being imperious and committing a crime by the course they were taking in reference to this bill. I think that the Senator was hardly authorized to make that criticism, inasmuch as he is aware that at his own suggestion a proposition was accepted that we should adjourn over and that those who are opposed to this measure should have the whole of to-morrow to debate it and that the vote be taken at five o'clock, which proposition was finally refused.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I do not think that I trespassed at all upon the rules in the remarks that I made a while ago. I went on to state facts which were not questioned, and which I apprehend cannot be questioned, and from those facts I deduced a conclusion which was that such a proceeding was criminal. I apprehend that there is no rule of the Senate, that there is no provision in the Constitution which authorizes a Senate, that prohibits me from drawing a reasonable inference from ascertained facts. What occurred between the honorable Senator and myself privately, or between himself and other Senators privately, the Senate as a body have nothing in the world to do with. I could not bind anybody else, nor could I bind the Senator himself; and besides, if I were disposed to go into an exposition of what really transpired, I apprehend the country would have the same impression then that they have now of the proceeding that is going on here to-night. I am very sure I am as far from trespassing on the rules of the body or the feelings of any Senator in this body as any one. I am incapable of doing such a thing, and I do not believe I trespassed on any rules of the Senate. I trust I trespassed on the feelings of no one. If I had been out of order, I take it that there are enough gentlemen here who understand their rights and the rights of the majority to make the point and to sustain it if there were sufficient ground to warrant them in doing so.

I said in all sincerity that I deplored the spirit which forces me to proceed with this debate to-night. Already the Senate has been in session eleven hours. I have been in service in and near the Senate Chamber for twelve hours. I feel very much exhausted and scarcely able to proceed with what I have to say; but I must say in justice to myself and the grave subject which I am about to proceed to discuss that I have not (as I did not anticipate addressing the Senate to-day) arranged my thoughts so as to present them in that orderly and forcible manner that I desire. Nevertheless, I will not be driven by a policy like that which is forced upon me and others in the minority to abstain from submitting what I think I ought to say; and I shall therefore proceed to do it quietly, taking my time, and if I shall detain the Senate for a long while, I trust I shall not be blamed for it, but that this imperious and controlling and persevering majority will shoulder the responsibility; and then when I am done with this speech I give my friends on the other side to understand, in no spirit of threat, that if they are disposed to force upon me and those who think as I do the alternative to "sit it out," to use a common phrase, we will see who can sit longest. [Laughter.]

Mr. MERRIMON proceeded to discuss the bill. Having spoken for some minutes, he said:

Mr. President, as the majority have compelled me to proceed in this debate to-night, I think it is as little as they could do to keep their seats and hear what I have to say. [Laughter.] I maintain that it is monstrous that the majority, under the circumstances that every one here present is familiar with, should force me to go on when I have told them that I am very much exhausted after this long session. They ought at least to do me the courtesy to sit and hear a great deal of truth which I desire to pour into their minds and souls. As I see there is not a quorum present in the Senate, if some friend will suggest to me that he will ask a call of the House I will yield for such a motion.

Mr. CONKLING, (after a pause.) If no Senator claims the floor, I hope the question will be taken.

Mr. RANSOM, (at ten o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) If my colleague will give way I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. Question on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. STEWART in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.]

Mr. RANSOM. I thought I had the floor. I move that the Senate adjourn; and I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONKLING. That motion is not in order. No business has intervened since the other motion was voted down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not in order. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. What is the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The Chief Clerk called Mr. ALCORN'S name, and he responded.

Mr. MERRIMON. I think I had the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator did not speak before the first name was called.

Mr. MERRIMON. As I said before, I am very anxious that Senators should be present——

Mr. HAMLIN. If my friend will allow me, there is a parliamentary rule which declares that a man shall sit down when he gets done speaking. [Laughter.]

Mr. MERRIMON. That is the very point. I am not done speaking by a great deal, but I do not want to speak to empty seats.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not think you will get much else to speak to to-night. [Laughter.]

Mr. MERRIMON. I want to speak to my honorable friend, and see if I cannot assign to him good reasons why he ought to vote with me on this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has no power under the rules that he is aware of to require Senators to remain in their seats.

Mr. CONKLING. I would suggest, if the Senator from North Carolina wishes to speak to the Senator from Maine, as that Senator is spending the evening in the cloak-room, he would be compelled to go there in order to have a conversation with him. [Laughter.]

Mr. MERRIMON. I am equally anxious to speak to the honorable Senator from New York. I have no right, I believe, to speak in the cloak-room.

Mr. CONKLING. I have been remaining here all the time for the pleasure of hearing the Senator.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am very much obliged to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina will proceed.

Mr. MERRIMON resumed his argument, and having spoken half an hour, said:

Mr. President, I believe the Senate has gone to sleep again. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. SPENCER in the chair.) If the Senator has finished his remarks, the question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. MERRIMON. I have not concluded my remarks. I thought if I would make that passing remark, the Senate would wake up. I am glad to see that the Chair is not asleep.

Mr. KELLY, (at eleven o'clock and five minutes p. m.) With the permission of the Senator from North Carolina, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 8, noes 31.

Mr. DAVIS. Is there a quorum present?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I only yielded to the motion to go into executive session.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Did the Senator yield the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that he did yield the floor.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg to correct the Chair, with all submission. I did not yield the floor, except for a particular motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You cannot yield for particulars.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The fourth rule reads as follows:

No Senator shall speak more than twice, in any one debate, on the same day, without leave of the Senate, which question shall be decided without debate.

If the Senator yielded the floor, he is within the rule in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. MERRIMON. I did not yield the floor except for a special purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was yielding the floor.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg to inquire whether that is the practice of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The practice of the Senate in the day-time, when everybody is in good nature, is to let debate run very loosely under this rule; but after ten o'clock at night it is usually enforced, [laughter,] and enforcing the rule the Senator is within its provisions, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. MERRIMON. I have to say to the Chair and to the Senate that I am not responsible for the ill-feeling displayed here to-night. I have begged the Senate to adjourn and let me have a fair opportunity to-morrow to debate this question and they would not do it; and, as I said in the outset of my remarks, they must take the responsibility.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. MERRIMON. Do I understand the Chair to rule that I cannot proceed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair rules that the Senator is not entitled to yield the floor unless he yields it absolutely.

Mr. MERRIMON. Then I believe it is in order to move an amendment to the original bill. It is competent, I believe, to do that.

Mr. SPENCER. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama rises to a point of order, which he will state.

Mr. SPENCER. My point of order is that there is already a pending amendment, and the motion of the Senator is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment has not yet been moved. The Chair cannot rule upon it until he hears what it is.

Mr. MERRIMON. I move to amend section 1 of the original bill by striking out the words "by reason of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is out of order. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. MERRIMON. Then I move—I trust the Chair will give me an opportunity to make my point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. MERRIMON. I ask to know the condition of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] moved to strike out the second section, and the pending question is, shall that amendment be agreed to? Upon that amendment the Senator from North Carolina has spoken twice. The question is on the amendment. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. MERRIMON. Is a motion to amend the amendment in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. MERRIMON. Then I move to amend the second section in the twenty-second line by striking out the words:

But this proviso shall not apply to criminal proceedings, either under this act or the criminal law of the State.

That is the last sentence in the second section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the amendment be reported from the desk.

The Chief Clerk read Mr. MERRIMON'S amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. MERRIMON. I desire now, sir, to proceed to debate——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I make the point of order that the fourth rule provides that the debate shall only be spoken in by the Senator twice, and this is the same debate. The rule cannot be evaded by a motion to strike out a word or a sentence in the section that is before the Senate.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am sorry to find that my excellent friend from Vermont has become a strict constructionist.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The fourth rule reads as follows:

No Senator shall speak more than twice, in any one debate.

Not upon any one question, but "in any one debate." This is a debate upon this bill, and in the opinion of the Chair, strictly construing this rule, the Senator is not entitled to further participate in this debate.

Mr. MERRIMON. I submit whether it has not been the uniform ruling in the Senate, whether it is not the rule in Jefferson's Manual that that word "debate" is construed to mean the debate on any single proposition, and upon as many propositions as occur under any general proposition?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the practice in that particular has been like the practice in every other particular where the point of order is not raised: it is done according to the will and wish and convenience of the Senate; but when the point of order is raised, the Chair must rule as the rules require. This is one debate on this bill. The Senator from North Carolina has spoken twice in this debate. The Senator from Vermont insisting upon the rule, the Chair must enforce it, and the Senator from North Carolina can speak no further.

Mr. DAVIS. Do I understand the ruling of the Chair to be that after a point of order has been made no Senator can speak more than twice on an amendment to a bill or on a bill, no matter what the length of it may be; say an appropriation bill, for instance?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator understands the Chair to rule that "no Senator shall speak more than twice, in any one debate, on the same day, without leave of the Senate, which question"—that is, the question of leave—"shall be decided without debate."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, Mr. President, I move that the Senator from North Carolina have leave to speak once more on this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senator from North Carolina have leave to address the Senate once more in this debate, which motion must be decided without debate.

The motion was agreed to unanimously.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I am gratified to see that the Senate is so ready to do me this much courtesy after having driven me to debate this question to-night. It must be manifest that I am proceeding with the debate under very adverse circumstances.

Mr. MERRIMON resumed his argument; and having spoken twenty-three minutes, was interrupted by Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, (at eleven o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BOREMAN in the chair.) The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. The point of order is that there is not a quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That point cannot be made while a Senator is on the floor unless he yields the floor.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I insist that I can raise the question that there is not a quorum of Senators present without his yielding the floor. We cannot proceed to do any kind of business in the absence of a quorum. I have the right to make that point of order, and I have the right to take the floor from the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Certainly I have, on any question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator on the floor is speaking out of order, the Senator can make that point upon him, but he cannot raise the question of a quorum when a Senator has the floor unless that Senator yields the floor.

Mr. MERRIMON. I trust I shall be pardoned. I am obliged to the gentlemen who listen to me, but I have been detained here by the majority, and I think they ought to listen to me. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. It was for that very reason that I rose. I thought the gentleman was making a very able argument that ought to be listened to.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg to say to my honorable friend that it is a pure matter of taste whether Senators will listen or not. If I had been guilty of keeping any gentleman here, I should certainly sit and listen to him until he got through what he had to say, and I beg to say to the Senate that I am not near done yet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will proceed.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator is doing so well that he should not complain.

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not know whether I am doing well or not. I am simply exercising the right conferred upon me by the Constitution of my country. I take very large views of my rights as an American citizen. I am glad that I am an American citizen. I trust that I shall always remain such under the Constitution of my country. I do not want those rights to be abridged and frittered away, and therefore it is that I speak earnestly, and that I shall not yield a point without a struggle.

But, sir, I beg your pardon for these little side remarks, and I will pass on with my argument.

Mr. MERRIMON resumed and continued his speech until one o'clock and twenty-eight minutes a. m., (Saturday morning,) when he was interrupted by Mr. STOCKTON. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. MERRIMON. I will yield with the understanding that I do not lose the floor, for I am not through with what I have to say.

Mr. STOCKTON. I should like to ask the Chair whether, if I make a motion—it is a very late hour now—that when the Senate adjourns it adjourn until Monday next, I shall take the Senator now speaking from the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the floor being waived for that purpose. The Senator from New Jersey moves that when the Senate adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next at eleven o'clock.

The question being put, it was declared that the motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I call for a division on that motion.

Mr. STOCKTON. I submit the point whether the question has not been decided by the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair announced his opinion upon the vote, but immediately a division was called for, which is within the rule.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] desired me to state that he was paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.]

Mr. RANSOM. I desire to say that on all the phases of this question the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] are paired.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 12, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Johnston, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Ransom, Saulsbury, and Stockton—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Sargent, Spencer, Stewart, Wadleigh, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—32.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Boreman, Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Jones, Kelly, Lewis, Morton, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Sprague, Stevenson, Thurman, and Tipton—29.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina will proceed.

[Mr. MERRIMON resumed and concluded his argument. His remarks in full will appear in the Appendix.]

[Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, next addressed the Senate. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, as I shall vote against this bill in its present form, I wish to state very briefly why I shall do so. Without discussing other provisions of the bill, one makes it impossible for me to vote for it, and that is the provision in regard to State juries. I know of no more power in the Government of the United States to determine the component elements of a State jury than of a State bench or of a State Legislature. I can see no argument which shows the power of this Government to organize State juries that does not apply to State Legislatures; a power which, in my judgment, is clearly not conferred upon this Government. I cannot vote for a bill as an entirety which contains even one provision which I deem unconstitutional. For that reason I shall vote against this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WEST in the chair.) The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON,] which will be reported from the desk.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was to strike out the last clause of the second section, in the following words:

> But this proviso shall not apply to criminal proceedings, either under this act or the criminal law of any State.

Mr. MERRIMON. I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina withdraws the proposed amendment. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.]

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Before that question is put I desire to perfect the section, there being an inaccuracy in it, in the second line of the second section, by striking out the word "citizen" and inserting instead "person entitled to its benefits;" so as to make it harmonious with the first section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey to the second section of the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, to strike out the second section, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when Mr. BAYARD'S name was called.) I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. BAYARD] is paired on this question with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER.] If my colleague were here he would vote for this amendment, and the Senator from Michigan would vote against it.

Mr. RANSOM, (when Mr. CAMERON'S name was called.) I was requested by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] to say that they had paired on this bill. On this question the Senator from Pennsylvania would vote "nay" and the Senator from Ohio "yea," and on the bill they would vote just the other way—the Senator from Pennsylvania "yea," and the Senator from Ohio "nay."

Mr. ALCORN, (when Mr. CLAYTON'S name was called.) I desire to say that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLAYTON] left this evening very much indisposed. If he were here he would vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. WRIGHT, (when the name of Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, was called.) I am requested by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] to say that he is paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. DENNIS] upon this amendment, and upon all questions connected with this bill. The Senator from Michigan would vote "nay" and the Senator from Maryland would vote "yea" on this amendment.

Mr. COOPER, (when the name of Mr. GOLDTHWAITE was called.) I am requested by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. GOLDTHWAITE] to announce that he is paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] If the Senator from Alabama were here he would vote "yea" and the Senator from Ohio "nay" on the question of this amendment.

Mr. LOGAN, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.] Were he here he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay" on this amendment.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CHANDLER. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] If he were present he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay on this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] requested the Chair to state that he was paired with his colleague [Mr. TIPTON] on this question.

Mr. RANSOM. I ought to have stated that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] are paired on this bill. Mr. STEVENSON would vote "yea" and Mr. MORTON would vote "nay" on this particular amendment.

The result was announced—yeas 13, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Johnston, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Ransom, Saulsbury, and Stockton—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Boutwell, Buckingham, Carpenter, Conkling, Conover, Edmunds Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Sargent, Scott, Spencer, Stewart, Wadleigh, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—32.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Boreman, Brownlow, Cameron, Chandler, Clayton, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Jones, Lewis, Logan, Morton, Schurz, Sherman, Sprague, Stevenson, Thurman, and Tipton—28.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SARGENT. I now move the amendment of which I gave notice this afternoon. It is to add to the first section the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit any State or school district from providing separate schools for persons of different sex or color, where such separate schools are equal in all respects to others of the same grade established by such authority, and supported by an equal pro rata expenditure of school funds.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LOGAN, (when his name was called.) Understanding that the Senator with whom I am paired would vote in the same way that I would on this amendment, I do not consider the pair as applicable, and I shall vote "yea."

The roll-call being concluded, the result was announced—yeas 21, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Johnston, Kelly, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Norwood, Ransom, Sargent, Saulsbury, Scott, Stewart, and Stockton—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Boutwell, Buckingham, Carpenter, Conkling, Edmunds, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Spencer, Wadleigh, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Brownlow, Cameron, Chandler, Clayton, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Jones, Lewis, Morton, Schurz, Sherman, Sprague, Stevenson, Thurman, and Tipton—26.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I now make the motion to amend the first section according to the notice heretofore given. In section 1, commencing in line 9, I propose to strike out "and also of common schools and public institutions of learning or benevolence supported in whole or in part by general taxation," and in lieu thereof to insert, "and also of every common school and public institution of learning or benevolence, endowed by the United States, or founded by any State, or that may hereafter be endowed by any State, or supported, in whole or in part, by public taxation."

I only wish to say that this amendment is designed to make clearer than the text of the bill seems to do what I suppose is the intention of the committee, and the intention of the Senate, judging especially from the vote just taken; and in one sentence I may say that it places upon an equality every citizen of the country in every public institution of learning, and only exempts from the operation of the statute private schools and private institutions, those that are maintained or founded by private funds.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Senator from Georgia [Mr GORDON] submitted an amendment to strike out the portion of the bill that the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts applies to. I desire to ask whether the vote upon the amendment of the Senator from Georgia cannot be taken first?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to perfect the part to be stricken out will of course be put first.

Mr. BOUTWELL. On the amendment offered by me I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEWART. I shall have to vote against this amendment. I do not wish to discuss it; but I believe that it may embarrass many of the present generation who would otherwise be able to secure education, and prevent their having as good an opportunity to start fair in the race of life as they otherwise would. The great thing for the colored man, after all and the only thing that has any real force in it, was giving him equality of rights at the ballot-box. For that I contended I think as zealously as any one here, as those who were then members of the Senate will bear me witness. I said before he had the ballot that there was nothing else you could give an American citizen whereby he could so effectually protect his rights.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I should like to ask the Senator then for what reason schools are established, maintained by law, and supported by public taxation, unless there is some virtue in legislation in favor of the interests of citizens beyond giving them the right to vote?

Mr. STEWART. I do not see much pertinency in that question, for what reason free-school systems are established by legislation. I think that, after all, the ballot is the only thing which will secure an equal and fair distribution of the school fund. I think that the power of the ballot has shown itself more forcibly in the votes that are being taken here this morning than in anything else—the absolute power of the ballot. Your civil-rights bills are shown to amount to very little without the ballot. I recollect very well when it was not so easy to obtain votes for measures of this sort. The ballot gives these votes here, and it is the ballot that will give the negro his right to schools in the different localities. I do not want to legislate for the colored man where he can help himself. The principle of our Government is that each individual shall look out for himself. We place equal power in the hands of every citizen, and it is the duty of each citizen to take care of himself. Any legislation beyond that must be justified on some peculiar ground. Any legislation that attempts to protect any class after you give them the ballot must have some special justification. While the negro was chained, while he was prevented from exercising his rights as a citizen, while he was in that condition there was reason for legislation. Then he was not much else than a slave. Then I always contended that your civil-rights bill and your bills to protect him were useless; that the thing could not be done by legislation. It cannot now be done by legislation. This bill would be an absolute nullity if the colored man did not have the ballot. With the ballot he will get all the rights after a while that he is entitled to without this legislation. There are some States where his vote is not of much importance now, but it will become more and more important; and all the rights he is entitled to he will get, and he will get them by local legislation.

The necessity of general legislation to help a particular class is not so plain. To legislate particularly to protect him I do not see the necessity of to that extent which requires me to vote for the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, and run the risk of embarrassing the education of the present generation. It has been alleged that there are places where he does not have his rights; that in some of the Southern States he does not have a fair distribution of the school fund. I am afraid if you pass this bill he will have no education at all. I am afraid that this legislation is not calculated to advance him one step. I cannot see clearly its beneficial effects, and not seeing them clearly I am not so anxious to vote for it. It is not a question of constitutional power, for I have no doubt on that point; and if I thought it would further education I would not hesitate to vote for it. It is a mere question of expediency whether or not by this legislation you will aid to educate the colored man beyond what he would otherwise get. If by voting for mixed schools I thought I could accomplish that purpose and educate the colored man where he would not otherwise be educated, I would vote for them; but I am afraid they would not have that precise effect. Consequently I think it ought to be left optional to have schools mixed or separate as the people themselves desire. I do not think at all events now we should take the step to compel mixed schools. I do not believe the necessity exists for it. We can pass the bill without that feature, and if the necessity for that should appear hereafter, we can do that when it is necessary for the sake of education to do it; if not, do not let us do it.

I believe this is not striking at the real evil in this country as far as education is concerned. I offered an amendment to the Constitution and submitted it once or twice, requiring each State to have a system of common schools whereby each child should have an opportunity to become educated. There is the difficulty. The difficulty is not in mixed or unmixed schools, but there are some States that have not an efficient and adequate system of common schools whereby every child may be educated. I believe great good would result if this Congress would devote itself to the task of amending the Constitution of the United States so as to require every State to have an efficient system of common schools. If that were in the Constitution; if it where absolutely necessary for every State to have such a system and in case it failed Congress might step in; if the Constitution required every State to have a school system, and if the State failed provided that Congress might legislate, then you would have power to say that they should have mixed schools or unmixed schools, and you would have the power to make that law effective. But while it is left to the States to have systems of free schools or not, and while the several States are wavering in the balance whether they will have those schools or not, I say it is endangering in many of the States the education of the present generation, I fear. At all events, before a measure of this kind is passed we might wait one year.

I do not believe there is any Senator here who can give us a good reason for mixed schools being forced by the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, or for putting this proposition in such a shape that for the present it shall not be left optional with the people of this country to arrange their schools as they please in this regard. This may not be a very serious question to the people of the North, but it will be a serious question to the people of other States if their children are deprived of education even for a single year in a single State, and there is no necessity for loading this bill with that provision. I do not believe it is for the interest of the colored people. If it is I call upon them to agitate the question. It has been suggested that they are discontented. I want them to be discontented like every other class of citizens until they get all that belongs to them politically; but I want them to come forward as men and claim their right to office, and not continue to be represented in the local Legislatures or elsewhere by proxy. I want to see them represent themselves and come forward and exert themselves and demand their rights, and I believe they will. I believe they will vindicate their manhood. They have got the ballot, and I want to see them vindicate their manhood by representing themselves wherever they can as men. I believe that will develop them. But I doubt very seriously whether it is expedient for us to pass a law which may endanger that very education we so much desire.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts because the law would then read in this wise: "That all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of all the privileges, advantages, &c., of every common school." I do not suppose that is what we mean, that all persons shall be entitled to the accommodations of every common school. I think the language is much better as it is, that all persons shall be entitled to the privileges of the common schools. That leaves the schools, colored schools or white schools, as they are, and expresses just as clearly, for I do not want any misunderstanding about that—the bill as it stands without the amendment of the Senator from California does give any person a right to any of these schools.

Mr. STEWART. Right there I should like to inquire of the Senator having the bill in charge if the law as it stands would be violated by the organization of separate schools so that white children should attend one and colored children the other?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I suppose it is perfectly competent to have one school for the whites to go to, another school for the colored children to go to; and I suppose by the law as it stands a colored child has a right to go to a white school, or a white child to go to a colored school.

Mr. STEWART. But it would be no violation of law if they had separate schools?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No, it would not be a violation of the law. Then as to the other parts of this amendment, "and public institution of learning or benevolence endowed by the United States or that may hereafter be endowed by any State," I have to say that if there is an institution in a State, I do not think we ought to put it in the power of the State to change the character of that institution by endowing it. I do not think we ought to put it in the power of a State by making an endowment to an institution to change it from a private to a public institution, The other part of the amendment, "or endowment by the United States," I am in favor of; that would include the agricultural colleges.

Mr. BOUTWELL. There is, in the highest sense of art, a little want of euphony between the language which the committee have employed and that which I have been compelled to employ in order to make my amendment effective, which is to give to all persons, that is to every person equally, a right in every public school. What e feared is just exactly that condition of things which the honorabll chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary intimates may happen. I wish to break down the prejudice in the public mind by which it is possible in some cities and sections of the country to make separate schools and give to children, who when they become men are bound by the same political bonds to a government based upon the doctrine of equality, ideas which are inconsistent with the existence of such institutions; for it is only by instilling into the minds of the children and the youth of the country the idea that there is no difference by nature or birth or race or color or caste, that we can take security for the continuance of the institutions under which we live; and every system which tolerates, encourages, or lays the foundation for the dissemination of different ideas, is a system hostile to republican government. Inasmuch as these four million colored people are made by the Constitution citizens of the country, as they and their posterity through all time are to have a lot and part with us as citizens, I say now, not waiting for an uncertain future, but now when this subject is under consideration in the Senate of the United States, and under consideration by circumstances which make us amenable to posterity, let us do that thing which is right in the eye of the Constitution; and nothing is right but absolute equality of rights.

Mr. STEWART. Suppose the bill would have the effect to prevent more children, white and colored both, from being educated than it would aid to become educated, would the Senator then vote for it?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will not barter the uncertain present of evil by surrendering the certain future of good. When the contest of 1765 opened, our fathers might very well have changed their position and said, "We will accept the present temporary evil rather than demand and maintain at the cost of revolution and life that which we know to be just and right."

Mr. STEWART. Did they not do that very thing?

Mr. BOUTWELL. No, sir.

Mr. STEWART. Did they not accept the enormous evil of slavery rather than not have a constitution adopted, when they admitted it was wrong?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Yes; without seeing into the future. If we stood in their place, not having sacrificed hundreds of thousands of human lives and imposed upon the Treasury and the future prosperity of the country an enormous debt, we should have some excuse; but we stand here with nearly a century of evil, culminating in a civil war of which there is no example in history, and I trust there will be no like exhibition in the future; and we are inexcusable if now, having suffered by the surrender of justice to injustice, we follow the steps which they took and imitate the example which they set. That is what the Senator from Nevada asks us to do.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question. I ask whether he proposes by his amendment to compel colored children to go to white schools?

Mr. BOUTWELL. That I cannot do; but I will do everything which the Constitution authorizes to be done—to see to it that the children are trained together for purposes of life, and education is the fitting for it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. You do not propose to compel them?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not contemplate that. I cannot do that.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The law as it stands gives them the right to go to a white school.

Mr. BOUTWELL. That is exactly what we do not know. Some Senators say that it does; some Senators say that it does not. I have my doubts.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It says that all persons shall have the right to all these facilities in the common schools.

Mr. BOUTWELL. But there are Senators who say, and there are persons outside who will say, a great portion of the people of the country will say, that if a school-house is set up on one side of a street for black children and another on the opposite side set up for white children and they are compelled respectively to go to the schools established, and it turns out that the appropriation made for each school is equal to the appropriation made for the other, that the teachers are of equal capacity, that the same branches are taught, then equal facilities are furnished, which is the expression employed by the committee.

Mr. STEWART. The question which I asked the Senator I think was pertinent. He was appealing to the example of the fathers, and he said, "Suppose they had at that time consented to wrong, where would we be now?" I instanced the wrong that they admitted and consented to; and but for their doing it we should not have been at all. We should not have had any war for the Union if they had not at that time admitted the wrong which did exist, for they could not have established the Union of these States at that time on any other basis. They admitted slavery to be wrong, and yet formed the Union. In Government there are many times when you cannot have anything without allowing some evils to exist. In other words, you cannot have the millennium by one act of legislation. That act which would make all things good and all things right and all things just and all things lovely never has been discovered. I believe that when you have established the fundamental principle that each American citizen shall have a like power, shall have the ballot; when you have established that all citizens have an equal right to protect themselves; when you have laid that foundation and given to each the same power and the same rights to protect himself, and when it is obvious from what this race has done, the wonders accomplished in the way of progress and education, that they will use that power to assert their rights, why not leave the matter to them? It is clear and obvious that they are going to have all their rights under the Constitution.

It is said that it is necessary now, in order to preserve the Republic, to require the children of colored people and white people to go to the same school, whether they desire it or not, and that we should not leave it optional even with them to separate themselves, but must force them into the same school, and this for the accomplishing of a great moral idea! Now, the moral idea there is in this thing is education, and nothing else. We are not legislating for equality before the law; for thanks to the founders of the Republic and the patriotic American people, each citizen with the ballot in his hand is equal to any other man under the law. Each has the same rights, whether he be a colored man or a white man, whether he be born in a foreign country and become naturalized in this—no matter where he was born or what his color, he can make the politician dance to his music and obey his voice by the ballot. That is what governs the country; that is what makes the negro equal before the law.

We are now considering a question of expediency in legislation, a question how we can best promote free schools and education. We are not considering the rights of the negro or the rights of the white man, because they are absolutely equal if there is anything worth a straw in our Government; and that they are equal and that they have that power, is very evident from the number of advocates who have been enlisted in behalf of the negroes since they were given the ballot.

My friend from Massachusetts knows how our ranks have been augmented since that event, for he acted a conspicuous part in giving the ballot to the negro. He knows very well how the forces that advocate these rights have been augmented by the ballot. He hears that potent voice. Eight hundred thousand votes in America are calculated to make the politicians tremble. They will have their rights, and I am thankful and I rejoice that they will; but while I rejoice at that I am now legislating for a practical end—to see how the present generation can best be educated. Twenty years will not pass, a generation will not pass, until it will be admitted everywhere that the negroes shall have as good a chance to be educated as anybody; but you have commenced with this work of education wrongly. It is still in the power of the States to have no system of common free schools; and many of the States for nearly a century have failed to exercise the power to establish free schools. Many of the States are unaccustomed to any system of free schools, and they will establish none; and in those States if the Government does not aid in the work of education your law is inoperative. Who is benefited? Not the poor black boy, nor the poor white boy; both are neglected, and no law is violated. A struggle is going on in those States; and the friends of free schools are likely to triumph in every one of them.

Add this burden to them, however, and you seal the fate forever of many of the present generation, both black and white. I say you should not do this unless you are willing to take hold of the question of education in earnest, and to amend the Constitution so as to require every State to have a system of free schools. You should do that before you attempt to regulate the matter now in such a manner as will prevent the establishment of any such system in many of the States. Before you embarrass it you ought to pause. You ought to see an apparent necessity for denying to the children of Virginia the right to be educated. You ought to weigh well before you say that the present generation in Kentucky, whites and blacks, shall remain in ignorance; for ignorance strikes at the very foundation of republican institutions. You ought to consider most seriously, shall the children, white and black, in Tennessee—for there I am confident such will be the result—be uneducated? Is this really a measure for education or for politics? If for education, then the amendment of the Senator from California is right; if to conciliate eight hundred thousand voters at the expense of the loss of education in many States, then the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is right. If it is a practical measure of education, leave it sufficiently free to have practical operation. If it is a practical measure of politics and not education, then declare some theory which shall prevent education, some theory that shall consign to ignorance large masses of the people of this country for the sake of politics.

I do not believe that but for these eight hundred thousand votes there would be ten votes, or even five votes, in this Chamber for this particular clause. I am glad they have got the votes, because it shows how they will get their education. I am glad they have the votes, and I am rejoiced to see them vindicate their manhood. I tell you that, so far as accomplishing the purpose for which you are legislating is concerned, one respectable colored man in either House of Congress who can speak for his race, who can show that they have intellectual capacity and moral worth, is worth more than this bill. I would invite them to come to Congress. I would invite them to go to the State Legislatures and vindicate their manhood and trample upon this prejudice. They have got the power to do it. I say that so far as I am concerned I am not voting for this bill for politics. I only vote for it as a practical mode of education. No political consideration can make me vote in a manner which I fear will deny to any child the right to be educated. I would as soon deny to him or her bread. Unless it can be shown that this is the best way to educate the children, for now they need it, I will not vote for it. I have not heard the reason, and I do not believe it can be assigned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I would remark that the committee, in the language which they have adopted with some care, followed the language of the original bill as introduced by Mr. Sumner.

Mr. BOUTWELL. But generally changed Mr. Sumner's language everywhere else.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Not changed in any respect except in the manner in which it is presented. The same identical words have been preserved.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the amendment be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to strike out in section 1, commencing in line 9, the following words:

> And also of common schools and public institutions of learning or benevolence, supported in whole or in part by general taxation.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

> And also of every common school and public institution of learning or benevolence endowed by the United States or founded by any State, or that may hereafter be endowed by any State, or supported in whole or in part by public taxation.

Mr. STOCKTON. I think perhaps it not improper that gentlemen sitting on our side of the Chamber should understand what is meant by this. I listened with much attention to the Senator from Massachusetts. I have understood him to say, not now, but before, that there was nothing in this proposition, no point to it unless the young of both races and sexes were to be educated together, and so educated together that all distinctions of race and color were to be wiped out by that education.

Mr. BOUTWELL rose.

Mr. STOCKTON. Did I misunderstand the Senator?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I think the Senator from New Jersey did. In the first place I did not propose by this amendment to raise the question, nor does the amendment deal with the question, of educating the sexes together or separately; nor do I expect by educating persons of different colors together to wipe out all distinctions of race and color, only to assimilate them in ideas as to government and the institutions of the country.

Mr. STOCKTON. Then I was mistaken in understanding that the Senator from Massachusetts thought that one of the advantages of mixed schools was that the young people growing up should have their minds eradicated from the prejudices which affect the present generation. Am I mistaken in that?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Not as the Senator states it now; but if he will recall his own language, he will find that he said he understood the Senator from Massachusetts proposed by educating the children all together to wipe out all distinctions of race and color. I did not expect to do that, but to remove the prejudices which exist between persons of different races and different colors, and substitute the idea of human equality.

Mr. STOCKTON. The Senator will excuse me. I do not hear him distinctly. Will he be kind enough to repeat his statement?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I did not intend to be understood as saying that by educating children of different races and different colors together in the same school, thereby "all distinctions," using the language employed by the Senator from New Jersey, "of race and color would be wiped out;" but I do expect by having children of different races and different colors educated in the same school, that this prejudice against race and color will be removed and the idea of universal human equality as the basis, in my judgment, of republican institutions will be substituted in place of this unnatural and unjust prejudice.

Mr. STOCKTON. Then the Senator will excuse me for asking another question, for I do not wish to misunderstand him. Am I to understand that the words that he has just used are his own definition of the reasons why he supports this bill?

Mr. BOUTWELL. The reasons why I support my amendment?

Mr. STOCKTON. That is what I mean. That is all I wished to know. If I misstated the Senator in my first expression, of course it was because I did not perfectly understand him. I understand him now. Now, I wish to ask my colleague whether he supports this bill on the ground that it is supported by the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not wish to enter into a speech just at present, as we have been here all night. I did make a speech some two weeks ago, in which I stated the grounds on which I supported the bill.

Mr. STOCKTON. Then, Mr. President, I think I am not wrong in saying that the Senator from New Jersey, my colleague, on the advanced ground of the Senator from Massachusetts proposes to pass this bill. He proposes that the rising generation shall be educated together, so that what the gentlemen call the prejudices of race and color shall be, if possible, eradicated. That is to be the system of education, and that is the proposition of the bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I trust that my colleague does not wish to put me in a false position or to misrepresent what I say. I did not say that I supported this bill on the grounds stated by the Senator from Massachusetts. On the contrary, I am opposed to that Senator's amendment, and I did say that the reasons for my support of this bill I had stated fully in the speech that I made on it.

Mr. STOCKTON. Then it seems that the Senator from New Jersey, my colleague, supports this bill on one theory, and the Senator from Massachusetts supports it on another. I know that he has an amendment of his own; but that amendment, it does seem to me, and the proposition of the bill are the same. All that I ask and all that I have asked of these gentlemen is to be candid, to be truthful to the American people, and to tell them whether they mean that or whether they do not; and a question put at any time to either one or the other leads to an explanation.

I ask again of my colleague, and I ask again of the Senator from Massachusetts—and if asking can get an answer, I will get it before this bill passes—do you mean or do you not mean that you propose by a compulsory system to educate the young people of different colors together, with the wish and the hope that all prejudices shall be eradicated and that they shall be one? Do you mean practical amalgamation or not? Do you mean miscegenation or not? Do you mean to degrade the white race of this country, to prostitute the power you have to degrade the white people of this country? Do you mean that, or do you not mean it? I ask the question of my colleague and of the Senator from Massachusetts. Answer me, one or the other.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Not exactly recognizing the right of the Senator from New Jersey to catechise me in that style, still, out of the regard I entertain for him, I will answer him in the negative.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WRIGHT in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. LOGAN. On the main question I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.] On this amendment, however, I am informed by his colleague that he would vote in the same way as I would, and therefore I shall vote "nay."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 5, nays 42; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Boutwell, Robertson, Spencer, and West—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Buckingham, Carpenter, Conkling, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Edmunds, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Kelly, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Sargent, Saulsbury, Scott, Stewart, Stockton, Wadleigh, Washburn, Windom, and Wright—42.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Brownlow, Cameron, Chandler, Clayton, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Jones, Lewis, Morton, Schurz, Sherman, Sprague, Stevenson, Thurman, and Tipton—26.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SCOTT. I move to amend by striking out all after the word "otherwise" in line 24 of section 1 to the close of the section.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Before passing from the section we are upon I desire to have the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] acted upon. I suppose we might as well take the vote on that now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia calls attention to an amendment submitted by the Senator from Georgia some days ago.

Mr. SCOTT. I have no objection to withdrawing my amendment for the present that that may be voted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment referred to by the Senator from Virginia will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to strike out in section 1, commencing in line 9, the following words:

And also of common schools and public institutions of learning or benevolence, supported, in whole or in part, by general taxation.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I call for the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when Mr. BAYARD's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. BAYARD] is paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] on all questions connected with this bill. If he were here he would vote "yea" on this motion, and the Senator from Michigan would vote "nay."

Mr. NORWOOD, (when Mr. GORDON's name was called.) It is proper that I should state that my colleague [Mr. GORDON] is detained at his home by sickness. This is his amendment, and no doubt he would like to record his vote for it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to state that on this question I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] If present he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 14, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Boreman, Cooper, Davis, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Johnston, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Ransom, Saulsbury, and Stockton—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Boutwell, Buckingham, Chandler, Conkling, Conover, Edmunds, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Scott, Spencer, Stewart, Wadleigh, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Brownlow, Cameron, Carpenter, Clayton, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Jones, Lewis, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Sargent, Schurz, Sherman, Sprague, Stevenson, Thurman, and Tipton—29.

Mr. SCOTT. I now renew the amendment of which I gave notice before, to strike out in section 3, commencing in line 24, the following words:

And any district attorney who shall willfully fail to institute and prosecute the proceedings herein required shall, for every such offense, forfeit and pay the sum of $500 to the person aggrieved thereby, to be recovered by an action on the case, with full costs, and shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000.

The previous part of the section imposes the duty on district attorneys, marshals, deputy marshals, and United States commissioners of instituting proceedings and prosecuting offenses arising under this act. This closing part of the section, then, subjects to civil liability and also to criminal prosecution the district attorney alone among these officers for failing to institute and prosecute these cases. Even if the discrimination alone were in it, that would be enough reason for striking it out; but it is in addition to that subjecting a quasi judicial officer to a penalty for the exercise of his discretion. I trust the Senator having the bill in charge will see his way clear to consent that this clause shall be stricken out.

I desire to offer another amendment requiring these proceedings to be instituted upon information furnished by the party aggrieved, so that it shall not be in the power of any parties to bring the law itself into disrepute by having unfounded prosecutions instituted. I should like that power taken away.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have no objection to those amendments. They commend themselves to my judgment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania offer as part of this amendment a provision that the public officers proceeding for a public crime shall only proceed upon the information of some particular person? Is that a part of the amendment which he now offers?

Mr. SCOTT. I have given notice of my intention to offer that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from Pennsylvania has indicated two distinct amendments.

Mr. SCOTT. I cannot offer them both at once; but I have given notice that I will offer that to which the Senator has just referred.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I reserve what I have to say about that amendment until it comes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. I now move in line 13 of the same section, after the word "required," to insert "upon information furnished by the party aggrieved;" so as to make the clause read:

And the district attorneys, marshals, and deputy marshals of the United States, and commissioners appointed by the circuit and territorial courts of the United States, with powers of arresting and imprisoning or bailing offenders against the laws of the United States, are hereby specially authorized and required, upon information furnished by the party aggrieved, to institute proceedings against every person who shall violate the provisions of this act.

It is not my purpose to exclude all other kinds of information by offering this amendment, but as the law would then stand, an information, in the technical sense of the word, furnished by any citizen would be sufficient to found these proceedings upon; but I do wish here to make it the duty of the officer, upon information furnished by the party aggrieved, to proceed to institute these proceedings, and also to require that the officer himself shall be furnished with such information as will give him reasonable ground to believe that there is sufficient basis for instituting the prosecution before he does proceed; in other words, that it shall not be his duty upon any loose rumor carried to him by anybody to institute a proceeding. My purpose is not to weaken the act, but rather to give it strength, and to prevent its being brought into disrepute by unfounded prosecutions being instituted upon mere rumors carried to the prosecuting officer. If I have failed in that purpose, I shall beg to withdraw my amendment, if the Senator from Vermont shall satisfy me that it weakens the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand that the Senator from Pennsylvania does not mean to limit the district attorneys of the United States in these prosecutions to moving only upon information furnished by the party aggrieved. He means to leave an independent power in the prosecuting officer, as in other cases of crime, to proceed upon information derived from any source if he believes it to be real information.

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I am afraid the Senator from Pennsylvania has not employed happy language to accomplish that purpose, because when we impose this duty specially on these officers instead of leaving it to the general principles of law to prosecute these crimes, and then say it is their duty to prosecute these crimes on information furnished by the party aggrieved, to my mind it is a clear exclusion so far as this section goes of any authority to institute a proceeding upon other information than that furnished by a party aggrieved. I do not mean that it would stop his proceeding if he had cumulative information; but if the party aggrieved should happen to be slain in his effort to assert his rights, so that, except through a medium, he could not be heard from, the district attorney under the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania would have no authority, so far as this act is concerned, to proceed at all, for the reason that the party aggrieved cannot furnish the information, and he is to proceed upon information furnished by that party. He cannot get the information furnished by that party; and therefore he cannot proceed at all. If this clause were out altogether so as to leave it merely to the general duties of district attorneys to prosecute all crimes against the laws of the United States, under their official responsibility and their official oath, not to make causeless prosecution or malicious or merely vexatious ones, then of course the district attorney would proceed upon any information that was satisfactory to him.

We do not leave it to the mere general sense of duty, because some district attorneys, in places where there was a public prejudice, might say, "This act does not require me to prosecute, and the old acts conferring duties on me do not say anything about this; and therefore I do not feel that I am obliged to do anything." So this act steps in, as some former ones have done—for I believe this section is even a diminution of some of the former ones about civil rights—and says that it is made the special duty of these prosecuting officers of the United States to proceed against persons who violate the provisions of this act. This is a special duty enjoined on them, just as in many instances courts are required to give certain subjects specially in charge to grand juries at every term, though without the law they would have the right and authority to do it. Now, if the Senator adds this language to a special duty imposed upon the district attorney as stated in this section, that he is to perform that duty upon a particular kind of information prescribed, if that information is not forthcoming he is not to perform it at all. So that, in my opinion, the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania really emasculates the special injunction that this section was designed to impose upon the prosecuting officers; and that was that, for purposes of justice and for the protection of whatever rights the fourteenth amendment gives—because this bill, be it understood, creates no rights, gives no new ones; it only gives whatever rights the Constitution has caused to inhere in the citizen—these officers should be specially enjoined to act. This amendment emasculates the act in undertaking to say that the district attorney shall proceed upon particular information, because expressio unius exclusio alterius.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator from Vermont and I, in the purpose at which we both aim, do not differ. Let me call his attention to what first induced me to offer this amendment. It will be noticed that one of the officers who is required by this section to institute and prosecute suits is the very officer before whom the question is to be determined judicially whether there is sufficient cause to put a party accused on his trial, namely, the commissioner of the court. It is before him that the offender is to be taken, and the evidence is to be examined, and he upon that evidence is to determine whether there is sufficient cause to hold the alleged offender to trial. It struck me as somewhat anomalous that that officer, who is to pass on the evidence, should himself institute the prosecution. Suppose he gets the information that this offense has been committed, is he himself, of his own volition, without having one before him who is to make the necessary affidavit, to issue his warrant and bring the offender before him, and then on this mere allegation bind him over? It seems to me that some proceeding should be had in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings by which some person acquainted with the facts may be brought in contact with those officers, so that the necessary information may be had. If the Senator from Vermont thinks it necessary to add "or other reliable evidence" to the words which I have proposed here, I have no objection to that. I do not wish to screen these officers from the duty thus sought to be imposed upon them, but I do not wish to see unfounded cases carried into the United States courts upon the merest and most vague information carried by any person, whether actuated by proper or improper motives, to these officers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Neither do I wish to do anything of the kind. All that this act as it is now provides on this subject, is that it is the duty of these officers to institute proceedings against people who have violated the act, not those who are suspected of it, but those who in the ordinary course are persons honestly thought by these officials to be guilty. What the Senator says about its being the duty of the commissioner to institute proceedings without any affidavit or other complaint, official or otherwise, I think is hypercriticism. It is true the act says the district attorney, marshal, deputy marshal, and commissioners are hereby authorized and required to institute proceedings against every person who shall violate the provisions of the act. I do not understand that to mean that the marshal is to issue a warrant or that the commissioner is to issue it, but that the institution of a proceeding is that the district attorney shall complain and the commissioner shall issue the warrant upon the proper complaint, and the marshal shall execute it. This word "institution," therefore, is to be taken distributively, each officer performing the legal duty which the nature of his office implies that he shall perform. I think that is the clear meaning; and, therefore, it is not liable to the criticism that the marshal, for instance, is to issue the warrant and the district attorney is to approve it, and the commissioner to execute it. That is not the fair interpretation.

Mr. SCOTT. Does not the plain language require the commissioner to institute proceedings?

Mr. EDMUNDS. So it does; but what is the institution of a proceeding? It contains two elements, certainly in every judicial proceeding the complaint of the proper party, and the action upon it by the proper tribunal. That is what institutes proceedings. If I cause a suit to be instituted against my friend two things must occur. I must apply to the proper magistrate or other judicial officer for my warrant or complaint; and the proper magistrate, in order to the complete institution of the proceeding, must sign that warrant or complaint, so that the proceeding as a proceeding under the law is instituted. My complaint does not make an instituted proceeding; it is incomplete. The mere fact that a party goes to a magistrate is not an institution of a suit. There must be a judicial step taken, and that is issuing the warrant or proper process by the judicial officer. Then, it being instituted thus far, the proceeding is carried on; and it is instituted against the person, and he is made a party to it completely by the service of process. This method of description runs through various statutes of the United States, from which the lamented Senator from Massachusetts copied this third section with a great deal more phraseology than this section contains now; and the committee have merely trimmed it down to its bare poles, as the sailors would say, to preserve the substance and leave off a great deal of verbiage that the other acts contain. I hope the Senator will not insist on the amendment, because it emasculates, I think, this part of the section.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Under this section as it stands, I do not see how district attorneys have any discretion as to the institution of prosecutions and criminal proceedings. To illustrate, suppose that some person goes to the district attorney and requests proceedings to be instituted, and the district attorney is honestly of the opinion that the evidence in the case does not warrant any such thing, that there is not sufficient evidence on which to prosecute, and for that reason, acting honestly and in good faith, he refuses to institute proceedings at the public expense; then for that refusal he may be tried under this section.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; that part is stricken out already.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I was not aware of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] to the third section.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected; there being, on a division—ayes 16, noes 22.

Mr. MCCREERY. I offer the following as an addition to the first section:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to apply to schools already established.

The amendment was rejected; ayes 11, noes not counted.

Mr. ALCORN. I offer the following amendment:

In section 1, line 11, after the word "taxation" insert "or in whole or in part supported or endowed by the United States or by any State."

It is known that the older States have many institutions which have been endowed by the Government of the United States, and many of the Western States have institutions which have been endowed by large donations of land by the Government of the United States, and some of them have heretofore been endowed by the States. It will be observed that this bill does not reach them at all. I propose that since you have made, as the bill does properly make, the common schools open to all, the colleges endowed by the United States or the States shall likewise be open to all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. ALCORN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If this amendment is not adopted, I give notice that on the tenth line after the word "benevolence" I intend to move to insert the words "endowed by the United States, or supported in whole or in part, or."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 9, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Flanagan, Harvey, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Robertson, Spencer, and West—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Boutwell, Buckingham, Carpenter, Conkling, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Sargent, Saulsbury, Scott, Stewart, Stockton, Wadleigh, Washburn, Windom, and Wright—37.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Brownlow, Cameron, Chandler, Clayton, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Jones, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Schurz, Sherman, Sprague, Stevenson, Thurman, and Tipton—27.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WEST. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That motion is not in order now.

Mr. HAMLIN. I object to the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not in order. The question recurs on the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole as amended.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. In the eleventh line of the first section after the word "taxation" I move to insert "and also the institutions known as agricultural colleges endowed by the United States."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest to the Senator that it should come in at the end of that line.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Very well; I so modify the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported for information.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed after the word "supported," in line 11 of section 1, to insert "and also the institutions known as agricultural colleges endowed by the United States."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. In section 4, line 9, instead of "$5,000" I move to insert $1,000," so as to make that penalty harmonious with the other.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. On line 9 of section 1, I move to insert after the word "of" the word "the," and after the word "schools" to insert the word "system."

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the same old question again.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well, it may be the same old question; but it is a question that I have a right to raise and to raise in this form.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Undoubtedly; but the fact remains as before.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well, sir. My amendment would make the section read "and also of the common-school system." I am willing to give the colored people the full benefit of the system. I think they should have the full benefit of the system.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So do I; and I think they should also have the benefit of the system of railways; and if you have the word "system" in one part you ought to have it in the other. The whole effect of this proposition is to authorize States on account of color to deny the right to ride in a particular railroad car, or to go to a particular common school. If there is anything in the bill, it is exactly contrary to that. If there is anything in the fourteenth amendment it is exactly opposite to that. The fourteenth amendment does not authorize us to make any trades with States either way on the subject, or regulate the action of States. What the Constitution authorizes us to do is to enforce equality; and it is not half-equality, for there is no such thing as half-equality. It is entire equality or nothing at all. Now, the Senator proposes to say that everybody shall have an equal right in a system of common schools. That is the law of all the States now. Everybody has an equal right, and always had in old slave times in the system of railways; that is, one car was provided for the colored men and another for the white man, and so on. To put in these words here or in any part of the bill is merely to say in substance and effect that this bill shall have no force in asserting the equality that the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution asserts, if that asserts any equality at all; and of course the bill goes on the theory that it does. This amendment, therefore, ought not to be adopted, in my opinion.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not know that the fourteenth amendment enjoins upon us that we shall have mixed schools. I do not know that the fourteenth amendment performs any of the offices the Senator speaks of. If it requires that there shall be an equal education commonly extended to all people of the United States of any color, the section certainly, with this amendment of mine, enforces that right. I doubt if the office of the fourteenth amendment is to provide that I should receive any man into my house; that my liberties shall be encroached upon for the benefit of any man, be he white or black. I doubt if the fourteenth amendment provides that females shall be intruded into male schools or males into female schools; and yet this would be the office of the fourteenth amendment under the logic of the Senator from Vermont.

There is one thing more important to the people of the United States, to its future, to the future of its institutions, than any other, and that is the education of the coming generation, the education of the present and the future. Senators very well know that there are inveterate and determined assaults upon the common-school system in every part of the country by powerful religious organizations. I do not criticise their right to entertain the suspicion which they have of the public-school system, or their right to declare against it, or their right to assault it. I suppose they have the same right to think that the system should be overthrown, and to teach that doctrine in pastoral letters and enjoin it upon their followers and those who believe in their faith, as I have to say that I think the common-school system is the very safety of our institutions. But, sir, this is a powerful and most potent influence, working day by day to strike down your common-school system, not merely in the city of New York and Boston and Philadelphia, but in the State of California, of Missouri, in every State in this Union. Senators know that it is one of the serious questions of the times whether the common-school system can be maintained against this most powerful, far-reaching influence; an influence that is inflamed or inspired by strong religious sentiment, even fanaticism; which has at its back vast wealth, which has as its weapon a strong sway over the minds of its devotees. This influence levels its blows continuously. It is an influence that never dies, but goes on week after week and month after month and year after year. It is as immortal as any human force or institution can be. I am not criticising it; I am merely stating a fact, and your common schools in this country are standing up with difficulty under this continuous assault.

Now, sir, you propose to re-enforce that adverse influence against your common-school system. You propose to bring what may be perhaps an unreasonable prejudice, but a prejudice nevertheless—a prejudice powerful, permeating every part of the country, and existing more or less in every man's mind; I dare say existing in the mind of the Senator from Massachusetts who made his enthusiastic speech a few moments ago for the abolition of the idea in the minds of our children that there is any distinction of race or color or sex. I say that that powerful prejudice exists in every part of the country. If you now bring this re-enforcement to the forces which assault your common-school system and strive to strike it down, the result is not hard to predict.

Senators know that there are States in the Union, not merely in the South but in the North, where this influence set at work will break up and utterly destroy, certainly for some time to come and perhaps for a long time to come, the efficiency of the common-school system. I have no doubt this is true of the State of New Jersey, and that the Senator from New Jersey on my left [Mr. STOCKTON] when speaking on this matter was prophetic. I have no doubt it is the case in the State of Maryland. It was stated on this floor and was not contradicted, and I believe it cannot be contradicted, that there are in Maryland liberal endowments for the colored normal school, and so down to the very infant school for the education of the colored persons, as liberal, as fair, as munificently provided as those for the whites; and that both classes, the whites and the blacks, are gaining a valuable education under this system. But by the effect of this legislation, which is insisted on here for political purposes, in order to gain the eye of the colored people and encourage them to adhere to the republican party—for that is what it amounts to, for political purposes—we are sacrificing the higher interests of the country, and we are giving occasion to the enemies of our common-school system to bring an argument against it that cannot be withstood. I consider that these are more important considerations than the question whether the republican party shall have more or less of the colored vote of this country. I think it is more important both to the colored race and to the white race that the means of education which are now being extended throughout this country, and in most of the country are so perfect in their operation, are so well supported by public opinion, shall not be endangered, shall not be overthrown. It is more important to the colored race and to the white that these shall be maintained in their present vigor and increased, rather than that we shall bring against them for doubtful advantages the irresistible passions of mankind; the prejudices which, however we may deny it, still operate with great force, to result in destroying the system or curtailing its usefulness.

The Senator from Massachusetts says that we ought to overlook any temporary inconvenience; that we ought to overlook, for the sake of the principle which he asserts exists here, any consequences in the present. I say that these consequences are too great, both now and for the future, for us to overlook them. We ought to legislate here as statesmen, having in view not merely abstract ideas or theoretical principles or sublimated ideas, but to observe the condition of the times and know whether by any law which we may pass here we inflict an injury upon the country; whether we retard its prosperity; whether we overthrow its educational systems; whether we entail ignorance upon the coming generations; whether we destroy institutions which have proved their value, and which no man in his good senses, unbiased by bigotry, can deny are of inestimable value, ay, indispensable to the country. We can talk in an enthusiastic manner if we see fit, and pretend to be regardless of consequences. We may insist that we are led in a certain direction by our principles and should disregard all prudence in order to follow them; but that is not wise statesmanship. We ought to look to the condition of the country, to see where this legislation leaves its great interests; and for that reason I offer this amendment, giving to all persons of any race, of any color, of any sex, equal rights in our common-school system. Who asks more than that asks too much. That certainly is sufficient, and I do not think there is good judgment in making it a penal offense to prevent the intrusion either of a boy into a girl's school or of a colored person into a white school or of a white person into a colored school. If you say that the fourteenth amendment absolutely levels all distinctions and justifies you in putting heavy penalties to prevent a system of separate schools, then I say you cannot separate your sexes; you must put them all into the same school, and the boy who demands to enter a female school has just as much right to do it under the fourteenth amendment. Following your principle, lauded here, you are required to enforce this by a law and penalties just as much as you are that a person of a particular color shall be allowed to enter into schools of another color. I would give all the full benefit of the school system, and I would do no more.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall not detain the Senate at this early or late hour of the morning, whichever it is, with any very formal reply to the Senator from California; but he unfortunately I think adopts the democratic idea of the fourteenth amendment, and that is that it does not level absolutely and destroy distinctions of race, color, and previous condition of servitude. He holds with the gentlemen of the other party that all the fourteenth amendment means is just what the Constitution meant before, and that is that every man, woman, and child in a State shall have whatever rights the laws of that State choose to give every man, woman, and child in that State.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator misrepresents me entirely.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the effect of the Senator's argument. I do not understand the Senator to say that that is his position or to be aware of it, or I have no doubt he would not be there.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no doubt that you know that you misrepresent me in stating those as my opinions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that remark out of order. It is equivalent to charging a Senator with misrepresentation, intentional and willful.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg the Chair—although of course the Chair is bound to enforce the rules of the Senate for public decency——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has no anxiety on the subject except to enforce the rule.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask the Senator to allow me to say this: He knows that I have often given utterance on this floor and elsewhere, to his certain knowledge, to sentiments entirely different from those which he attributes to me. Furthermore, in anything that I have said on this occasion I have not said anything to justify his remarks. Therefore he should know that by so stating them he was misrepresenting me; whether designedly or not I do not know.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am very much obliged to the Senator for his very ample apology for that dignified and senatorial demeanor that he exhibits on this occasion. So I will drop the Senator and come to his discourse, if he will allow me to leave him in that predicament.

Mr. SARGENT. I made no apology.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of course not. I did not expect it. I trust the Senator did not understand me as really supposing that he had made an apology. So I hope the Senator will permit me now to leave him, if he will pardon me, and come to his discourse.

I repeat what I said before, that in my judgment the Senator from California, from the tenor of his remarks, occupies the position that the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber generally do; and I will say for his benefit that I did not thereby intend to impute to him any personal wrong or other thing. He has just as good a right to his opinions as the democrats have to theirs and as I have to mine. I do not quarrel with that. That is one of the rights which the fourteenth amendment secures to him as it does to me. But the Senator's argument results in exactly this: that the fourteenth amendment does not, as it respects common schools, level a distinction which a State may have a right to make on account of race and color. If it does not level that distinction, then it does not level a distinction that a State has a right to make on the same account in respect to a railway, or a highway, or a steamboat, or any other thing; for the fourteenth amendment is general and sweeping. It either means that there shall be equality of right—not a trade or a business of expediency which is left to Congress, but a declaration of the right of a citizen which no distinction of race or origin can affect—or else it does not touch on the subject at all. There cannot be any dodging that. I suppose that both sides agree to that: either that the democratic view of the amendment is right, that it does not touch these subjects at all, and therefore we cannot interfere with the right of the State to regulate its common schools, discriminating against color, discriminating against race, discriminating against religion, or anything that the State chooses to discriminate against; or else it does confer upon citizens of the United States a right, and that right is inherent, one that cannot be divided or paltered with or traded away. It is either an absolute right that the Constitution gives to the citizen, or it is nothing at all and does not touch the case.

This bill proceeds upon the idea that the Constitution does secure to the citizen certain inherent rights, because they are rights, and then it merely undertakes to enforce those rights, not to enter into a parley with the States about them and say "you may or may not enforce them as you may think is desirable," or say "you may enforce them in this way or that way." It only undertakes to declare that whatever right the citizen has under the fourteenth amendment, that right shall be protected, and the bill asserts, implies, assumes that that right is one which enables the Congress to say, and makes it its duty to say, that no citizen shall be discriminated against on account of his origin or on account of his color.

If that is so, then the Senator's argument is the democratic argument, inasmuch as he says the State has the right to regulate this business of common schools and to exclude people on account of their color one way or the other. If the State has that right, we cannot interfere with it. If the State has not that right, we cannot confer it by an act of Congress, because such an act of Congress would be in violation of the fourteenth amendment itself. The Senator's amendment proposes to recognize the right in a State to discriminate on account of color, and if it does recognize that right, it recognizes it as a right inherent in the State and which the fourteenth amendment does not touch. If it does not touch it, then there is not a right in your bill that is constitutional. On the other hand, if the fourteenth amendment does touch it, and this right to discriminate on account of color is not in the State, then I repeat, the Congress of the United States has no power to confer such a right upon a State to make discriminations between its citizens on account of color. It does not undertake to confer any rights at all on the States. That is a misapprehension.

That being the case, the Senator I think is in error——

Mr. MERRIMON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator will excuse me at this late hour of the morning. I believe I did not interrupt him in his discourse. I should hear him with pleasure were it not that I know the Senate are impatient to finish this bill and to have me finish what I have to say. I hope he will not think it a discourtesy if I decline to yield at this moment.

The Senator from California has alluded to religious influences as being likely to be exasperated in a certain direction by a provision of this kind, as having aid given to them to overthrow the system of common schools. Why, sir, I think the Senator from California if he were to inquire into the history of that Church to which he refers——

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Under the circumstances, I suppose I must.

Mr. SARGENT. I shall have to take back what I said about the Senator intentionally misrepresenting me, because it is evident that he certainly misunderstood me from beginning to end. I think it must have been owing to my faulty form of expression. I did not say anything about exasperating any religious society. I spoke about re-enforcing a certain influence by starting another in the same direction. Certainly that is what I meant to say.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I certainly have not intended to misrepresent the Senator, and I hope I shall not be betrayed into any remark which will either violate my own sense of propriety or the rules of the Senate in replying to what he says.

I was proceeding to say that I understood the Senator to allude to the religious influence of a certain church, and that that influence against common schools would be exasperated, excited, re-enforced, to use one of his own words. I think the misunderstanding between the Senator and me arises from the fact that I am paraphrasing, as I think, his argument, and I do not use his precise language because I cannot remember it—that this church influence is to be made stronger, excited, more powerful from the fact that we make this provision supporting the inherent right of the citizens of the country not to be discriminated against on account of color.

Why, Mr. President, I think the history of that Church will show the Senator from California that there is no instance yet known in its long and somewhat sublime history in some respects, as little as I agree with its tenets, where it has ever made a discrimination, in its benevolence, or in its places of worship, or in its propagandism, in any of the thousand sources of charity and benevolence which that great and terrible institution possesses, on account of race or color or origin. I wish I could say as much for other religions. If there is any one thing which in my humble opinion would redeem the Catholic Church from some just criticisms and lead us who disagree with it to give it something of gentleness and charity, it is the fact that better than any other sect it has never discriminated against a child of God. Everywhere its mantle of charity has not halted at the door of any living being on account of his race or his color or his sect. Its benevolence, however misguided its purposes may be, has been catholic in the broadest sense; it has been as wide as the world of man is wide. Therefore I should rather say that we are to drive into the influences of that religion a great race in this country by denying to them in the halls of legislation benefits which in that Church they everywhere receive without prejudice and without discrimination of any kind.

So, Mr. President, it appears to me that the allusion to religious questions which the honorable Senator has brought to our notice should rather lead us to stand by the spirit of this bill, by the spirit of the fourteenth amendment, if he touches the question at all, and say, "As it is a matter of right, we cannot trade or palter about it, but must take it altogether or not at all," than to say, "We will leave a part of it in the State and we will take a part of it to ourselves," and so on; because a race that is seeking for light would, if we shut our hands to these appeals, turn to those institutions that have always given it, and, I suppose, will always give it.

But, sir, I do not think it is an argument which perhaps ought to be brought into this Chamber at all. I hope the time will be rare indeed when we shall be obliged to discuss here or elsewhere in this country any question upon sectarian grounds or under sectarian influences in any way.

Now, Mr. President, let me refer for a single moment to a practical question which has not yet been stated here, and I shall have done. It is said that this bill is likely to do injury by breaking up schools in the places where, for the sake of the colored people, they are most needed. What sort of comfort do the colored people get in the schools of the Southern States now? Ostensibly there is a system, as the Senator from California very properly characterized it, of common schools, which on the statute-book is for all, the white on the one side, and the colored on the other; but when the officers of the law come to apply that system, when the power of the State comes to execute the law, you find everywhere—I do not say everywhere, speaking by the book, because I have not looked into the records of every State—but you find in three of the chief States whose Senators, some of them, have participated in this debate, that there is hard and unjust discrimination against the colored man and in favor of the white.

In the State of Virginia by the last school report, for I take it from the official school report of Virginia, of the school population between the ages of five and twenty-one the white children were 253,411, the colored, 170,696, making 424,107 school children. The proportion of colored to the number of school children therefore is .402, 40 per cent. in round statement. Now, of the number of schools established for these children, there are 2,787 white schools and only 909 colored schools, making a total of 3,696, being only 24 per cent. in round statement—it is .243 exactly—but 24 per cent. of school facilities furnished to the colored population; only a little more than one-half of the proportion of schools that the number of scholars of that race require.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Will the Senator allow me to say a word at this point?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have already declined to yield to the Senator from North Carolina. The Senator will have an opportunity when I have finished. My only objection to yielding is that I am taking up too much time and it must not be chargeable to me. These figures I take, as I say, from the official school report of the State of Virginia for the last year, or the last report I could obtain; I think it is for the very last year.

In North Carolina, according to the last school report, of children of the school age between six and twenty-one, the white children were 233,751, the colored children 114,852, making a total of 348,603. The proportion of colored children to the total number therefore is .329, or in round numbers 33 per cent. Now, of the public schools there are white 2,565, colored 746, making 3,311 schools. The proportion of colored schools to white schools therefore is .225; or 22 per cent. of schools and 33 per cent. of children who ought to be entitled to the advantage of them.

When you come to the State of Georgia, the school report for 1873–74, the very last one made, shows that of the school population between the ages of six and eighteen, the white children are 198,516, the colored children 150,198, making a total of 348,714. The proportion of colored children to white children is therefore .427, or 43 per cent., in round statement. Of the schools, there are 1,379 white schools and 356 colored schools, making 1,735 schools. The proportion of colored schools to white is .127, or 13 per cent., there being 43 per cent. of colored children and 13 per cent. of colored schools; and in the State of Georgia the bulk of the current income derived from annual taxation is derived from the polls of the people of that State. The colored people in ratio to the population pay five-elevenths of it, almost one-half; and as a fact I believe that the law of Georgia, which requires the payment of this poll tax before one can vote, is enforced rigidly against the colored man and is not enforced rigidly against the white man. But it is not necessary to go into that question to see who pays for these schools, because I hold that the property of every State should pay for the education of all its children, for the sake of property, to put it upon no higher ground.

I refer to these figures from the official reports from these three States to show you that the danger is not by this act of right that you are to overthrow systems or schools; the danger is by not acting that under a pretense of what is called equality of the system it is intended to grind out every means of education that the colored man can have, and to feed the white at the expense of the black, in order that the ancient order of things, the aristocracy of races, may again be restored. That is my belief. Therefore, as a practical question, I say let us run the risk in doing this right thing of some momentary disturbance, in order that the great practical fact of a great wrong that now exists in these States may be redressed as well as that the inherent right which the Constitution gives may be protected and defended.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words in reply to what the Senator from Vermont has said about the school system of the State of Virginia. The inequality which the Senator claims to exist in the State of Virginia is only apparent, not real, and is very easily explained. In that State there are a large number of counties where there are no colored people, and schools have to be established there. Take the county of Lee, for instance, one of the largest counties in the State; there are only two colored families in it. That county probably has eight or ten schools, and so of other counties through the State; and that ratio of population makes it necessary that there should be a much larger number of schools for the whites than for the colored people. The colored people reside principally in one part of the State and in the towns. The same number of schools therefore are not necessary for them as for the whites, owing to the distribution of the population over the territory of the State.

In regard to the disparity in the numbers that go to school, that is also very easily explained. The colored people have not the same ardor for education now that they had at the close of the war. The Senator smiles. I know more about that than the Senator does a great deal. The fathers and mothers of the colored children prefer in a great many cases to be idle themselves and hire out their children to work, and therefore the number of colored children in Virginia and in the Southern States that go to school, in proportion to the number of those of proper age to go to school, is diminished by that fact. In the first place the colored people are poor, and they very often require the labor of their children to aid them in obtaining a subsistence, and in many cases the parents prefer to be idle themselves and make their children work. That fact deprives a number of colored children of the benefit of education where the school is ready for them. They do not go to it because their parents prefer to employ them at work.

But, sir, I insist that in the State of Virginia there is no discrimination at all; that precisely equal privileges are given to the colored people with those given to the white people. The same sort of schoolhouses are built for them, the same sort of teachers are employed, and all the advantages are given to the one race that are given to the other. If the colored people in a district desire a competent colored teacher, they have but to write to the normal school and they will receive such a teacher. The Normal Agricultural College is educating teachers for the State. That is a school for colored teachers, and it is doing a great deal of good. It is a very successful school. It has a large number of pupils. The system of instruction is good, the discipline is good, the whole arrangement is good, and the school is an eminent success, and it is educating a large number of colored people.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President——

Mr. NORWOOD. Will the Senator from California yield to me a moment?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir; with pleasure.

Mr. NORWOOD. I desire to ask the Senator from Vermont if he can state, as he seems to have all the statistics before him, how many children of the number of colored children he has named in the State of Georgia there are in attendance upon the public schools?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will furnish the Senator with the report of the school commissioner of his State, and he can have it read if he wishes to do so. I am not able to turn to it at the moment. The Senator can have the book.

Mr. NORWOOD. The Senator from Vermont is giving the Senate information about a subject of which I do not think he is practically informed. He has looked at this report and taken out a few of the statistics collected by the superintendent of public schools, but he does not tell us about the geography of that State and how the whites and the blacks are located in it. The northern part of Georgia is occupied principally by whites; the lower portion of it by blacks—so much so, that for many years the lower portion was called the Black Belt. There the negroes are principally congregated, and they have become more segregated in that section of the State since the war than they were before, for their tendency is toward the warmer climate. Whites reside there as well as the blacks; but there is no necessity for many schools for the black children in the northern portion of the State. They are very sparse there. In some of the counties there are scarcely any blacks at all.

Again, the blacks do not send their children to school, as the Senator from Virginia has said, with the same avidity that they did just after the war closed. They keep their children at home. They have to do it from necessity. They are poor, as we all know, and they have to use their children to labor for their maintenance. They hire them out as servants; and besides that, many of the blacks themselves do not labor. They spend their time in idleness; and the Senator will find, if he will examine the criminal statistics of that State, that about 80 per cent. of the criminals there are blacks. These are some of the facts which will account for what the Senator seems to think is a discrimination drawn in the common-school system of Georgia against the blacks in favor of the whites. In reality it does not exist.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, I think it entirely unnecessary to say for myself that I have been ever since the first years of my manhood a thorough, straightforward, and consistent republican; and when any one who has stood with me for years in Congress and has known my course on these questions says that I am with the democratic party, in sympathy with them in their ideas, advocating their measures, seeking to advance their policy, it looks to me so much like intentional misrepresentation, that I might perhaps in an unguarded moment speak of it more severely than I would wish.

Now, sir, I think that I might not only complain of misrepresentation of my motives on this occasion, but also of the manner in which that which was to be replied to in what I said was represented in order to make it more easy to reply to it. It is a paltry trick to set up a man of straw and knock it down; and it is easy to say "my opponent says so and so and believes so and so," and then show that to be absurd or false. I do not think any Senator could well have understood me to say that for sectarian reasons or on sectarian considerations this bill ought not to pass, or could have understood me as appealing to a religious prejudice to prevent the passage of this bill or favor the passage of the amendment which I propose. I simply said that there was a certain great force in motion in opposition to the common-school system. I expressly said that I did not desire to criticise it. I stated the fact; and then said in effect that while there were so many people for certain reasons satisfactory to themselves, which I did not criticise, opposed to the common-school system, here was a proposition which would set certain other people in opposition to that school system, which would set another force in operation against it. Was it necessary then to read a homily upon the impropriety of attacks upon the Catholic Church or sectarian discussions within this Hall, and to express a hope that the future would not see a renewal of those discussions, or that the time might not come when they would be frequent? It seems to me that that statement, in its implication, of my purpose and of my argument was a misrepresentation. It may not have been. It may have been made in perfect good faith; though as I said before it does not seem so to me. I may be wrong in thinking it was not in perfect good faith. I certainly said nothing of the kind to which the Senator replied. If he listened to me he must have known it.

It is possible that the Senator from Vermont sometimes says things that are more harsh, that are more irritating, that approach nearer the verge of insult than he has any idea of himself. Sometimes, with keen, cold, merciless sarcasm, he retorts upon an opponent, probably not supposing he is otherwise than in an ordinary state of amiability, in his usual frame of mind. He is skillful in fence, and cuts sometimes very sharply, more so than he thinks; and sometimes, perhaps in his eagerness in pursuing an idea, unconsciously, unintentionally, he entirely misrepresents an opponent, even to the extent of inverting his motives, misstating his political status, denying his sincerity, or even impeaching his honesty.

Now, sir, one single remark in reply to that only which can be considered as argument in reply to my positions, and that is, that the amendment which I propose, by providing that there may be separate schools, is a violation of the fourteenth amendment, upon the same principle that a denial of the right of a colored man to ride in the same car, or to have identical accommodations in the same hotel, would be a violation of the fourteenth amendment. I do not believe either of those cases cited as illustrations would be a denial of any right guaranteed by the fourteenth amendment. The fourteenth amendment was not intended merely to say that black men should have rights, but that black and white men and women should have rights. It was a guarantee of equality of right to every person within the jurisdiction of the United States, be he black or white. It is a very common thing for me and for every Senator here, and every white man in the country, when he goes to a railroad train without his wife on his arm or some female friend, to be assigned to a car separate from some other car more privileged than the one he takes, by its female society, though not perhaps better in its fittings, which is assigned to ladies or to gentlemen who have ladies with them. Is that a violation of the fourteenth amendment? Suppose the man who is thus required to take the second car on the train instead of the first should be black instead of white, would the difference in color make a violation of the fourteenth amendment?

I do not believe these things are of enough importance for us to legislate upon them here. They regulate themselves. I doubt if any white man ever felt outraged because he was told to take one car rather than another, on account of a discrimination in the car he should take. Why, then, should the black man?

So with reference to the hotel table. In most of the hotels, in all of them I believe in New York and in the larger cities, the tables are small, circular tables where families sit, or two or three persons who happen to be friends, and the guests are assigned by the landlord to the places they take. A person entering the dining-room does not take a seat at any table he sees fit; he is put here or there, wherever the landlord pleases. And in assigning rooms at a hotel, the landlord may put him in the fourth story or the first; and if he does not like his accommodation he can go to some other hotel. He has no direction in the matter, and certainly no right to demand under the fourteenth amendment that he shall be put in the third story instead of the fourth, or the second instead of the third. These hotel illustrations fail for that very reason. The fourteenth amendment does not apply to them at all. They are simply incidents of business which have existed for years, and will exist for years whether the fourteenth amendment exists or not.

If the car to which a white man without a lady is assigned, or the black man is assigned, is just as good as any other of the train, drawn by the same engine, at an equal rate of speed, where is the harm done by that regulation? And why should we interfere with the business of railroad companies and hotel-keepers in this inquisitive way, putting our noses into the smallest details of business?

The old maxim was that that was the best government which governed the least. Here you propose to govern down to the very lowest item, the smallest account of business. You are going to have your laws so searching that by and by you will inquire into the quality of a man's dinner. You now want to inquire into the quality of the bedroom in which he sleeps at a hotel; you want to inquire as to the upholstering of the seat on which he sits in a railroad car; and I should like to know where the investigation will stop.

I say these things are not required by the fourteenth amendment, and consequently the amendment which I offer to this bill is not a violation of the fourteenth amendment. I say this while believing, and thoroughly believing, in the equal rights of all men, white or black; I say it from a republican stand-point; I say it because I believe as a republican that I have no right to lay a rude hand upon the system of public education; I have no right to do anything which will overthrow it into the dust; I have no right to re-enforce the forces which are now operating against it and while it is struggling with difficulty in many places in the country for its life.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I regret that the honorable Senator from Vermont seems inclined on all occasions when it is appropriate or convenient to construe adversely and to the prejudice of the people of the South whatever may come under his review or animadversion. If he had posted himself as well about the facts that he has cited in reference to my State as he has in reference to a part of them, he could in his remarks have done the State justice.

In the State of North Carolina the whole western portion of the State has very few colored people in it. The white people are scattered all over the State from one end of it to the other, and therefore it appears that there is an undue proportion of schools, in point of number, for the white children. Those sections of the States where the colored people live are densely populated, and fewer schools in proportion answer the purpose. The superintendent of education of North Carolina has always been a republican of the straitest sect, I believe. I do him the justice here to say that he is a very competent and, I believe, a very honest man. I believe that he discharges his duty faithfully, and I believe that he sees that the laws of that State in respect to schools are faithfully executed; and in order to show you the sort of law which he does execute, I beg to read two sections from our school laws. Section 20 provides in these words:

The school committee shall consult the convenience of the white residents in settling the boundaries of districts for white schools, and of colored residents in settling the boundaries for colored schools. The schools of the two races shall be separate; the districts the same or not, according to the convenience of the parties concerned. In cases where there are two sets of districts in a township they shall be designated as school districts Nos. 1, 2, 3, &c., for white schools, or school districts, Nos. 1, 2, 3, &c., for colored schools, as the case may be, of township ——, of, &c., as before stated.

In reference to the apportionment of the school fund, section 30 of the law provides in these words:

The county board of education of every county shall, on the first Monday of February of each year, or as soon thereafter as practicable, apportion among the several townships in the county, according to the number of children in each, between the ages of six and twenty-one years, (which number shall be ascertained by a census to be taken by the school committee and reported to the county board of education,) all school funds which may then be in the possession of or due to the county treasurer, specifying how much thereof is apportioned to the children of each race, and give notice thereof to the school committees of the several townships of the county. And the school committees in the several townships shall apportion the same in like manner among the several school districts, and publish the same by an advertisement posted on the court-house door of each county. The sums thus apportioned to the several townships shall be subject to the orders of the school committees thereof for payment of the school expenses mentioned in section 9, as amended in this act: Provided, however, That in no case shall the school fund thus apportioned to either race be expended for the education of the other race: And provided further, That so much of said school fund as shall not be expended in any school district for the education of the race for which it was apportioned in any year, shall be added to the final apportionment to said race in said school districts for the succeeding year. If the pupils of any public school reside in different townships, the school committees of each shall give an order to the teacher for such part of the amount due him, as is proportionate to the number of pupils attending his school from their township.

I do not care to make any comment upon those two sections. I had occasion to read a letter addressed to me from the superintendent of education this morning which spoke for itself. I believe that justice is as fairly administered to the colored people in my State as to the white people, and the same provision is made for each.

Mr. NORWOOD. If the Senate will indulge me one moment, simply to confirm what I stated as matter of fact without any statistics before me, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the proportion of white and colored children in those counties which lie in the northern portion of the State. I stated a while ago that there are very few colored children there. I read from the State School Commissioner's Return of Enumeration of School population:

Enumeration of school population.

Counties.	Whites.	Blacks.
Banks	1,255	324
Carroll	3,464	365
Cherokee	3,295	418
Dade	857	58
Douglas	1,156	298
Fannin	1,908	29
Fayette	1,900	804
Gilmer	2,284	33

Enumeration of school population—Continued.

Counties.	Whites.	Blacks.
Gordon	2,669	352
Gwinnett	2,837	721
Habersham	1,279	243
Hall	2,545	331
Haralson	1,062	87
Lumpkin	1,493	137
Madison	1,180	399
Milton	1,325	180
Murray	1,605	234
Paulding	2,080	129
Pickens	1,752	59
Rabun	1,141	66
Rockdale	1,930	575
Towns	834	41
Union	1,986	34

I have called over those because they are the northern tier of counties in the State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] to amend the ninth line of section 1 as heretofore indicated.

Mr. SARGENT and Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 16, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Boreman, Cooper, Davis, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Johnston, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Ransom, Sargent, Saulsbury, Stewart, and Stockton—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Boutwell, Buckingham, Carpenter, Conkling, Edmunds, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Scott, Spencer, Wadleigh, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Brownlow, Cameron, Chandler, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Jones, Lewis, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Schurz, Sherman, Sprague, Stevenson, Thurman, and Tipton—29.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the first section of the amended bill in section 1, line 5, by inserting before the word "persons" the words "citizens and other;" so that it will read:

That all citizens and other persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled, &c.

I do this because the first clause of the fourteenth amendment respecting privileges and immunities uses the word "citizens," and then a later clause uses the word "persons." I wish to have the language of the Constitution in respect to enumerating citizens expressly put in that part of the bill.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I move to strike out the fourth section of the bill, which refers to the selection of jurors; and upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. BAYARD] is paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 15, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Carpenter, Cooper, Davis, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Johnston, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Ransom, Sargent, Saulsbury, and Stockton—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Boutwell, Buckingham, Conkling, Edmunds, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Scott, Spencer, Stewart, Wadleigh, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Boreman, Brownlow, Cameron, Chandler, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Jones, Lewis, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Schurz, Sherman, Sprague, Stevenson, Thurman, and Tipton—30.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, as amended.

The amendment was concurred in; being to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause and to insert as a substitute—

That all citizens and other persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of inns, public conveyances on land or water, theaters, and other places of public amusement; and also of common schools and public institutions of learning or benevolence supported, in whole or in part, by general taxation, and of cemeteries so supported, and also the institutions known as agricultural colleges endowed by the United States, subject only to the conditions and limitations established by law, and applicable alike to citizens of every race and color, regardless of any previous condition of servitude.

SEC. 2. That any person who shall violate the foregoing section by denying to any person entitled to its benefits, except for reasons by law applicable to citizens of every race and color, and regardless of any previous condition of servitude, the full enjoyment of any of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, or privileges in said section enumerated, or by aiding or inciting such denial, shall, for every such offense, forfeit and pay the sum of $500 to the person aggrieved thereby, to be recovered in an action on the case, with full costs; and shall also, for every such offense, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not more than $1,000, or shall be imprisoned not more than one year: Provided, That the party aggrieved shall not recover more than one penalty; and when the offense is a refusal of burial, the penalty may be recovered by the heirs at law of the person whose body has been refused burial: And provided further, That all persons may elect to sue for the penalty aforesaid or to proceed under their rights at
